CHAPTER 1

PRE-TRIAL RELEASE AND DETENTION

The first question a newly arrested defendant typically has for her counsel is: "Can I get out?" To respond meaningfully to this question, counsel must have a firm understanding of the rather byzantine statutory scheme governing pre-trial release and detention in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, as well as the District of Columbia Court of Appeals' case law on these statutes. The statutes set forth presumptions of release and detention, rebuttable presumptions of release and detention, enumerated factors the court must consider in deciding whether to detain or release and a myriad of other rules and considerations over which counsel must have a firm grasp in order to gain release for her client. Counsel must also have a well-grounded understanding of the various programs and monitoring schemes available through the Pretrial Services Agency ("PSA"), so that counsel can advocate for pre-trial release. This section provides an introduction and overview of pre-trial release and detention in Superior Court. A mere reading of this section, however, is no substitute for a careful reading of the statutory scheme itself.

I. THE STATUTE

A. The Starting Point – D.C. Code § 23-1321

Pre-trial release and detention are governed by the Bail Reform Act, D.C. Code §§ 23-1321 to 1332. All release decisions have constitutional underpinnings in the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of excessive bail, see, e.g., Stack v. Boyle, 342 U.S. 1, 4-5 (1951), and the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, s*ee United States v. Salerno*, 481 U.S. 739, 746 (1987).

In setting release conditions, the court should consider the following: the nature and circumstances of the charge; the weight of the evidence; the person's family ties, employment, financial resources, character, physical and mental condition, past conduct, length of residence in the community, prior convictions, and record of appearance in court; flight to avoid prosecution; or failure to appear at court proceedings. § 1322(e).

1. Non-financial Conditions of Release

Unconditional release is presumed: the defendant "shall" be released "on personal recognizance, or upon execution of an unsecured appearance bond . . . unless the judicial officer determines that the release will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required or will endanger the safety of any other person or the community." § 23-1321(b). While safety concerns can support imposition of other conditions, they cannot be used to support a money bond, which may be imposed only to minimize the risk of flight. See § 1321(c)(3); Jones v. United States, 347 A.2d 399, 401 (D.C. 1975); Villines v. United States, 312 A.2d 304, 306 (D.C. 1973).

If more is required than personal recognizance or an unsecured appearance bond, the court must impose the least restrictive condition(s) that will reasonably assure appearance or safety. § 23-

1321(c)(1)(B). In addition to the mandatory condition that the client not commit a crime while on release, § 1321(c)(1)(A), other possible conditions include third-party custody; maintaining or seeking employment or an educational program; restrictions on "personal associations, place of abode, or travel"; avoiding contact with witnesses or possession of weapons; reporting to a specified agency; curfew; avoiding use of controlled substances and excessive use of alcohol;[1] medical, substance abuse or mental health treatment, including in-patient treatment; custody except release for employment or education; cash or bail bond; or "any other condition that is reasonably necessary to assure the appearance of the person as required and to assure the safety of any other person and the community."[2] § 1321(c)(1)(B).

Courts should impose non-financial conditions of release flexibly, depending on the individual defendant's situation. United States v. Leathers, 412 F.2d 169, 172 (D.C. Cir. 1969). "Third-party custody is the first and preferred condition of release to be used in conjunction with or in lieu of personal recognizance." Jones v. United States, 347 A.2d 399, 401 (D.C. 1975). Only as a later resort should a work-release condition or half-way house placement be imposed. Leathers, 412 F.2d at 172. Counsel should inform clients that placement in a halfway house may involve temporary incarceration at the jail due to unavailable space in halfway houses. Wait lists are created for individuals ordered to halfway houses. To obtain information on the wait list for halfway house placement, counsel can either call the duty day attorney and request information about the wait list or inquire at the Defender Services Office in Superior Court on the C-level for a list posting the estimated number of individuals awaiting halfway house placement.

Alternative Release Options: Counsel should be creative in suggesting release conditions in those cases where simple release on personal recognizance will not satisfy the court's concerns about safety or risk of flight. The Heightened Intensive Supervision Program (HISP) provides structured programming and close supervision for defendants, and is therefore an alternative to preventive detention in some cases. HISP is administered by PSA (Pre-trial Services Agency), and is available at any point, including the first appearance, in the progression of the case. For any and all requirements of HISP, counsel should contact Pre-trial Services to determine if her client is eligible and the release conditions required of the client. HISP is a program based on a Memorandum of Understanding among PSA, the Department of Corrections (DOC), and the Superior Court of the District of Columbia.

In setting release conditions under § 1321, the severity of the pending charges alone cannot support a finding against the presumption in favor of non-financial conditions if the defendant has ties to the community and sufficient non-financial conditions are available:

[1] The trial court has statutory authority to require pre-trial drug testing as a condition of release, at least where there is evidence to support an individualized suspicion that the defendant might use illegal drugs. Oliver v. United States, 682 A.2d 186, 189-90 (D.C. 1996). Oliver did not decide whether an individualized suspicion is always required, but counsel should argue that the Fourth Amendment requires such a finding before drug testing is ordered.

[2] The courts occasionally impose "stay-away" orders under this last section, requiring that clients with drug charges stay out of high drug traffic areas or that alleged prostitutes stay out of areas where prostitution is common. Attacks on the constitutionality of such orders have been unsuccessful. See Matter of A.H., 459 A.2d 1045 (D.C. 1983) (no First Amendment violation where pre-trial release condition included order to stay away from Islamic Center). Counsel should oppose any such condition that is unduly restrictive, impractical or unnecessary.

> The District Judge apparently rested his finding of a risk of flight upon the severity of the sentence that could be imposed on appellant if she were convicted on the murder charge. If this factor were alone determinative, however, release would never be possible in a capital case, and the statutory scheme that Congress so carefully established for such cases would be nullified completely. In evaluating the likelihood of flight, the potential penalty has relevance, but here we are much more persuaded by the stability of appellant's relationship to the community. She has lived in the District for about ten years, and has displayed a record of steady employment, the continuation of which upon release is assured. These community roots strongly dispute any threat of flight. To this we may add that she surrendered voluntarily to the police several hours after the incident giving rise to the indictment.

White v. United States, 412 F.2d 145, 146-47 (D.C. Cir. 1968).

An extensive record of arrests and ensuing court appearances may also establish reliability in meeting court obligations. "Consistent appearance when flight is possible is an important indicator of whether a defendant is likely to appear once again." Wood v. United States, 391 F.2d 981, 984 (D.C. Cir. 1968). (Wood also quotes Stack v. Boyle: "each accused is entitled to any benefits due to his good record." Stack, 342 U.S. at 1; Wood, 391 F.2d at 984).

2. Money Bonds

While safety is a legitimate consideration in setting non-monetary conditions of release, it cannot be used to justify imposition of a money bond. § 23-1321(c)(3). Money bonds may be imposed only to minimize the risk of flight. And even then, if the money bond imposed results in pre-trial detention, the bond must be reduced or other conditions of release imposed in place of the money bond. § 23-1321(c)(3). Thus, if the court decides that monetary conditions are necessary to induce future appearances, it "may impose such a financial condition to reasonably assure the defendant's presence at all court proceedings that does not result in the preventive detention of the person, except as provided in § 23-1322 (b)." § 23-1321(c)(3). This section is intended to:

> prohibit[ ] the judicial officer from imposing a financial bond that results in pre-trial detention. . . .The intent is to eliminate "sub rosa" preventive detention (i.e.[,] preventive detention accomplished by setting money bonds beyond the supposed financial means of the defendant) and to replace it with a more open and honest process.

Bill 9-360, the "Bail Reform Amendment Act of 1991", Council of the District of Columbia Report, 5 (1992). Thus, if a defendant cannot post the bond set, counsel should immediately file a bond review motion, asking the court to reduce the bond or to consider non-financial conditions to assure future court appearances. A defendant who, "after 24 hours from the time of the release hearing, continues to be detained as a result of inability to meet the [financial] conditions of release, shall upon application be entitled to have the conditions reviewed by the judicial officer who imposed them." § 1321(c)(4). If the bond is not lowered or if the defendant cannot make the lowered bond, § 1321(c)(3) provides that the defendant should be released on conditions, unless the government moves for and obtains an order of preventive detention pursuant to § 1322(b).

Money bonds come in three basic types: cash, surety, and "ten percent." A "ten percent" bond requires that 10% of the face value of the bond be posted with the court (at the Finance Office) to be retained until the conclusion of the case and forfeited if the client fails to appear. See Allegheny Mut. Cas. Co. v. United States, 622 A.2d 1099, 1100 n.1 (D.C. 1993) (listing factors relevant to determination of bond forfeiture); accord Indiana Lumbermen's Mut. Ins. Co. v. United States, 640 A.2d 1036, 1037-38 (D.C. 1994). A surety bond requires posting through a bond agency, which will require payment of ten percent of the bond as a non-returnable fee, and may require additional collateral, which must be returned if the client makes all appearances. A cash bond requires the client to post the entire amount with the court; the entire amount is returned at the conclusion of the case unless the client fails to appear. Usually, the least onerous of these options is the ten percent bond. Cash bonds are usually ordered only as an alternative to surety bonds – "cash or surety." The cash bond option can be useful because some agencies do not take certain clients (those with a demonstrated history of failures to appear) or certain cases (crimes of violence, life offenses, etc.). Lists of bond agencies are available in the Finance Office and in the yellow pages of the telephone book under Bail Bonds.

Clients held on bond must be released if the grand jury does not return an indictment within nine months of the presentment. D.C. Code § 23-102; Super. Ct. Crim. R. 48(c).

Bond Review Motions:

- ✓ File a bond review motion when defendant cannot post the bond set
- ✓ Ask court to reduce the bond or to consider non-financial conditions to assure future court appearances

B. Three-Day and Five-Day Holds – §§ 23-1322 (a), (b) & 1325(a)

A temporary hold without bond for a period of three calendar days is statutorily permitted if: (1) the government has requested detention without bond for the entire pre-trial period; or (2) the defendant is a narcotics addict.[3] A temporary hold without bond for a period of five business days is statutorily permitted if the defendant is on probation, parole, or release in a pending felony or release for sentencing. Before the court can grant the government's request for either a three-day or five-day hold, the court must determine that there is probable cause to support the arrest.

1. Probable Cause

Any significant restraint on liberty following arrest without a warrant requires a prompt probable cause determination by the court. Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 114 (1975).

[3] See D.C. Code § 23-1323.

> This issue can be determined reliably without an adversary hearing. The standard is the same as that for arrest. That standard – probable cause to believe the suspect has committed a crime – traditionally has been decided by a magistrate in a nonadversary proceeding on hearsay and written testimony, and the Court has approved these informal modes of proof.

Id. at 120 (footnote omitted).

Fourth Amendment strictures may come into play without incarceration. "Even pre-trial release may be accompanied by burdensome conditions that effect a significant restraint of liberty." Id. at 114. "[T]he probable cause determination . . . is required . . . for those suspects who suffer restraints on liberty other than the condition that they appear for trial." Id. at 125 n.26. Gerstein did not specify what conditions call for a probable cause determination. Id.

The Gerstein requirements are codified in Superior Court Criminal Rule 5(c). In order to obtain conditions of release that constitute a significant restraint on the defendant's liberty, the prosecution must file a sworn statement of facts establishing probable cause. If probable cause is not found, the court must either release the client or give the government until the end of the next working day to perfect the proffer. Generally, "Gerstein proffers" are provided to the court and counsel at the initial hearing in the form of the statement of facts from the PD 163 or the arrest warrant affidavit and are signed and sworn to by a police officer involved in the case.

While the initial hearing is generally short and there are pressures from the bench to expedite matters, counsel should be particularly diligent in reading the Gerstein. When reviewing the Gerstein and preparing for probable cause arguments, it is helpful for counsel to have the D.C. Code Book and D.C. Jury Instructions for the charged offenses. Counsel should compare the factual allegations in the Gerstein to the elements of the charged offense and determine whether all of the elements have been met within the four corners of the Gerstein. Additionally, if the Gerstein does not have a reference to jurisdiction or specific information identifying the client as the individual who committed the offense, these may be other grounds to challenge probable cause. Some additional probable cause arguments may include the fact that there is no physical or scientific evidence to support the allegations; no weapons were recovered; the Gerstein relies solely upon information from one unreliable witness; or there are inconsistent statements made by the witnesses cited in the Gerstein. Even in cases where probable cause appears to exist on the face of the Gerstein, counsel should proffer an argument against probable cause. Submitting on the Gerstein often gives the client the impression that no one is fighting for him or her. Establishing good client relations during this first hearing will serve counsel well down the road.

Gerstein*:

- ✓ Carefully read the Gerstein
- ✓ Review the D.C. Code Book and D.C. Jury Instructions for the charged offenses
- ✓ Compare factual allegations in Gerstein to elements of charged offenses

Challenges to Probable Cause based on the Gerstein include:

- ✓ No reference to jurisdiction
- ✓ Absence of information identifying your client as the person who committed the crime
- ✓ Physical or scientific evidence does not support allegations
- ✓ Gerstein relies solely on information from one unreliable witness
- ✓ If a request for blood, hair, saliva, or semen is made, challenge this request if the government has not established that it has evidence to compare with your client's sample

2. Three-Day Holds – § 23-1322(b) and § 23-1325(a) (Preventive Detention)

a. Section 1322(b)

Once probable cause has been established via the Gerstein, pre-trial detention may be ordered if: (1) the person is charged with a crime of violence or dangerous crime as defined in § 23-1331; (2) the person is charged with obstruction of justice (§ 22-722); (3) there is a "serious risk" that the person will obstruct or attempt to obstruct justice; or (4) there is "a serious risk that the person will flee." § 1322(b)(1)(A)-(D).[4] The government must still show clear and convincing evidence that no conditions of release will adequately assure either the defendant's appearance in court or public safety. See Blackson v. United States, 897 A.2d 187, 194 (D.C. 2006). If the government is unable to make this showing, the defendant must be released. See id. at 198.

The detention hearing "shall be held immediately upon the person's first appearance[5] before the judicial officer unless that person, or the attorney for the government, seeks a continuance." § 1322(d)(1). A government continuance of the detention hearing cannot exceed three calendar

[4] The statute allows the government to seek detention in any case, even petty misdemeanors, based on serious risk of flight. Obviously, counsel should vigorously oppose detention in all cases, but especially in misdemeanor cases. Counsel should raise all applicable constitutional challenges and note that the speedy trial provisions of § 1322(h) (see infra Section II.C.1), requiring trial within 100 days, do not adequately protect the rights of those charged with crimes with much shorter maximum sentences than felonies.

[5] Analyzing the comparable provision in the federal statute, United States v. Montalvo-Murillo, 495 U.S. 711, 720-21 (1990), held that when the government negligently fails to seek a preventive detention at the defendant's first appearance, it is not barred forever from doing so. However, the Court left open what remedy is available if the delay in seeking detention is "intentional" or "aggravated." Id. at 721. On the other hand, the statute expressly authorizes the government to seek detention by ex parte written motion after the first court appearance when it "subsequently" learns information indicating that the defendant is eligible for detention. § 1322(d)(7).

As a practical matter, in serious cases (e.g., first degree sex abuse, kidnapping, and carjacking) counsel should consider asking the client to waive his three-day rights and continue the hearing for a week or two. A longer continuance will enable counsel to investigate the case and develop positive social factors for release.

One additional matter that arises in serious cases, especially sex offenses, is that the government makes a request for a blood, hair, and saliva order. If one of these orders is granted, a police officer will be permitted to take samples from the client at a date ascertained in the presentment hearing at the jail or at the Metropolitan Police Department. Counsel should object to the government's request for this order if, within the four corners of the Gerstein, the government has not established that it has any blood, hair, or saliva to compare with the client's sample. Additionally, counsel can object if the request for all three of these samples is not relevant to the specific items that the police recovered.

Section 1322(d)(1) provides that "[d]uring a continuance, the person shall be detained." Counsel should argue that the government must make a prima facie showing of clear and convincing evidence that no combination of conditions can reasonably assure future appearances or the safety of the community before a defendant may be detained during the continuance period. Section 1322 does not directly address this point, but § 1321(b) requires the court to order release at the first appearance, unless it determines that release will not reasonably assure future appearances or the safety of the community. Counsel should also argue that findings under § 1322(b)(1)(A)-(D) only establish that the government has a right to seek detention – no more[7] – and that holding a defendant without bond for a total of at least three (usually four or five) days following arrest without even a preliminary finding of dangerousness or risk of flight violates due process.

In practice, a three-day continuance is automatically granted on government request at presentment if probable cause has been established. If detention is also sought under § 1322(a), the court may order that both hearings proceed within the five business days allowed by that section (under the rationale that judicial economy is enough "good cause" for the additional continuance permitted under the statute). While counsel may be able to resist this addition of several days to the § 1322(b) time period, counsel should warn the client that detention will be imposed if the government asks for it and the charge is a dangerous crime or crime of violence.

[6] Because each defendant has a right to a prompt hearing, hearings in codefendant cases should be severed if one defendant is granted a continuance to which another objects. See United States v. Araneda, 899 F.2d 368, 370 (5th Cir. 1990); United States v. Hurtado, 779 F.2d 1467, 1476 (11th Cir. 1985).

[7] "[T]he mere fact that the defendant is charged with one of the offenses described in [the statute] and is subject to a hearing is not meant to establish a prima facie case for detention of the defendant, as this issue is a separate one to be determined in the detention hearing." John B. Howard, Jr., Note, The Trial of Pre-trial Dangerousness: Preventive Detention After United States v. Salerno, 75 Va. L. Rev. 639, 649 (1989); see also K.F. Berg, The Bail Reform Act of 1984, 34 Emory L.J. 685, 704 (1985) ("this initial finding [under 18 U.S.C. § 3142(f)(1)(A)-(D)] merely establishes the government's right to a detention hearing on the issue of dangerousness; it is not a sufficient basis by itself for a court to enter an order of detention without hearing further evidence").

Three-day hold cases in the Violent Crimes Unit of the U.S. Attorney's Office are assigned at presentment to individual judges on the accelerated felony calendar.[8]

b. Section 1325(a)

Clients charged with first-degree murder or assault with intent to kill while armed are subject to pre-trial detention pursuant to § 23-1325(a). Unlike § 23-1322, there is no "hold" provision for § 23-1325(a). This section embodies a presumption for release: the client "shall be treated in accordance with the provisions of section 23-1321" – have release conditions set – unless there is clear and convincing evidence that no combination of conditions could assure that the client will not flee or pose a danger to the community.

3. Five-Day Holds – § 23-1322(a) for Defendants on Release, Probation or Parole

Once probable cause has been established via the Gerstein, a five-day bondless hold may be imposed if the defendant is on release, probation or parole, and the court finds the defendant may flee or pose a danger to a person or to the community if released. § 23-1322(a). The hold is not automatic; the court should set release conditions as in any other case unless there is an indication of dangerousness or a likelihood of flight, and must find probable cause on the new case.

At the next hearing, which must be held within five business days, the court will hear live testimony to make a probable cause determination and determine release conditions in the new case. In cases where the client is on release in a felony case and the new case is a felony or misdemeanor, the court will also hold a preliminary hearing at that time. While a judge is assigned to the case at presentment, the case will be heard by the commissioner on the preliminary hearing calendar unless the new case is on an Accelerated Felony Trial calendar (AFTC) or Felony I calendar. In those cases the AFTC or Felony I judge will hear the case. The hearing commissioner or new judge cannot change the conditions of release set by the felony judge in the pending felony case. If the client is on release pending sentencing, the judge on the old case will ordinarily advise the commissioner on what release conditions (if any) to impose.

For clients on probation or parole, counsel should determine compliance with supervision and whether the supervising authority intends to commence revocation proceedings immediately or wait until the new charge is resolved. Counsel may also attempt to obtain and provide information that will persuade the supervisor not to recommend revocation. If the parole board takes action to hold the defendant, a bond will usually be set in the new case.

If probation revocation procedures are initiated, the preliminary hearing may be conducted by either the probation judge or a commissioner. This hearing is the first stage of probation revocation. Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 781-82 (1973); Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 480-83 (1972); United States v. Peters, 103 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 2217 (D.C. Super. Ct. 1975)

[8] If the government requests only a five-day hold, counsel should inquire on the record whether it intends to seek § 1322(b) detention if it is unable to secure revocation. This inquiry will protect the defendant's right to a prompt hearing after the five-day hold without any further delay. See United States v. Alatishe, 768 F.2d 364, 368-69 (D.C. Cir. 1985) ("preferred course" is to conduct both hearings without further delay).

(Greene, C.J.), reproduced in part in Matter of A.W., 353 A.2d 686, 688-96 (D.C. 1976) (Nebeker, J., concurring). The preliminary hearing serves as the "Peters I" hearing.

Peters formulated a two-stage procedure for probation revocation, now known as "Peters I" and "Peters II" hearings. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32.1 provides more detailed procedures. If probable cause is found at the Peters I hearing, the court may detain a probationer without bond in the probation case, pending the Peters II hearing.[9] Release conditions are also set in the new case. If the defendant is ultimately held in the old case, the defense attorney should request a nominal monetary bond in the new case to ensure that the defendant receives jail credit.

4. Hold for Narcotics Addicts

Rarely invoked, § 23-1323 authorizes detention for up to three calendar days if the defendant is charged with a "crime of violence"[10] and may be an addict. The detention must be "under medical supervision, to determine whether the person is an addict." § 1323(a). An "addict" is "any individual who habitually uses any narcotic drug as defined by section 4731 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to endanger the public morals, health, safety, or welfare." § 23-1331(5). After the evaluation, the court must treat the person in accordance with the § 23-1321 criteria, but may hold a preventive detention hearing under § 23-1322 or a hearing under § 23-1323(c). See infra Section C.

5. Requests for Medical Alerts

If the client is detained at the initial presentment, counsel should interview the client and ascertain if he or she has any medical or mental health needs. When counsel determines that the client may have special medical or mental health needs, including prescription of certain drugs, counsel should request that a "Medical Alert" form accompany the client to the jail. Counsel should either fill out this form or make sure to review it before it is signed by the judge. This notice should inform jail officials and employees that the client should receive special medical attention or care.

C. The Pre-trial Detention Hearing

As discussed above, three statutory provisions authorize detention without bond: (1) the general detention provision, § 23-1322(b); (2) the addict detention provision, § 23-1323; and (3) a special provision applicable if the client is charged with first-degree murder or assault with intent to kill while armed, § 23-1325(a).

1. Section 1322(b)

Detention hearings are initiated by government motion orally while the client is before the court or by ex parte written motion any time after presentment. § 23-1322(d)(1), (6), (7). If the client

[9] Although a probationer can be held without bond pending final revocation, Rule 32.1(a)(3) provides time limits within which a final revocation decision must be made.

is before the court when the motion is made, the detention hearing "shall be held immediately"; however, the government may have a three-day continuance, and the defense is entitled to a five-day continuance upon request. § 1322(d)(1). The accused is entitled to advance notice of the allegations that will be made at the hearing. United States v. Edwards, 430 A.2d 1321, 1339-40 (D.C. 1981) ("due process entitles the accused to notice of all the charges about past and present conduct he or she will face at the pre-trial detention hearing." Id. at 1351) (Ferren J., concurring). Counsel should assert this right when the detention issue is first raised.

a. Jencks Act applies

Pursuant to Superior Court Criminal Rule 46(f)(1) and 32.1(c), Rule 26.2 (the Jencks Act) applies at detention and probation-revocation hearings. Thus, the government must provide the defense with copies of all Jencks Act statements of any witnesses it calls at the detention hearing for counsel's use during cross-examination, unless it shows "good cause"[11] not to do so. Generally, the government does not provide Jencks material until immediately before the hearing begins. However, counsel should make efforts to contact the assigned assistant prior to the hearing and request any Jencks material such as police reports, officers' notes, videotapes, or any other relevant information that the government may rely upon. If the government attempts to add testimony during the hearing outside of the information provided in the Gerstein and Jencks materials, such as additional material that the government may rely upon for dangerousness arguments, counsel should object that she was not given adequate notice of this information and that any admission of such information may require additional time for counsel to prepare to challenge the information. As the Comment to the rule explains, "The production of a witness's prior statements at a detention hearing will assist the Court in its effort to assess the credibility and reliability of the information presented to it."

Typically, the government calls police officers or detectives to provide hearsay testimony to eyewitnesses' accounts. Counsel should request not only the officer's own statements – police reports, running resumes or notes – but also any notes or statements reflecting the eyewitness's account on which the officer's testimony is based. See Clancy v. United States, 365 U.S. 312, 314-15 (1961) (memorandum detailing account of witness who was interviewed by FBI agent was agent's statement because agent adopted the memorandum and testified about the interview). If the government chooses not to provide a statement that it is ordered to disclose, the court must "not consider the testimony of [the] witness whose statement is withheld." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 46(f)(2).

[11] It is recognized…that pre-trial detention hearings are often held very early in a prosecution, and that a particular witness's statement may not yet be on file, or even known about. Thus, the rule recognizes that in a particular case, the Court may decide that good cause exists for not applying the rule.

Comment to Rule 46(f).

Jencks Material:

- ✓ Make every effort to request any Jencks material such as police reports, officers' notes, videotapes, or any other relevant information that the government may rely upon

b. Standard of proof

Once the hearing has commenced,

> [t]he government must . . . demonstrate probable cause to believe that the charged crime has been committed by the arrestee, but that is not enough. In a full-blown adversary hearing, the Government must convince a neutral decisionmaker by clear and convincing evidence that no conditions of release can reasonably assure the safety of the community or any person.

United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 750 (1987) (construing identical federal statute); D.C. Code § 23-1322(b)(2). The court has discretion to insist that the government produce live testimony rather than hearsay if necessary to determine the weight of the evidence. United States v. Lewis, 769 F. Supp. 1189, 1191-93 (D. Kan. 1991).[12] Probable cause that the defendant committed the offense, alone, is not clear and convincing evidence of the defendant's dangerousness. See Lynch v. United States, 557 A.2d 580, 582 n.5 (D.C. 1989). The nature of the charge, in and of itself, is not enough to establish clear and convincing evidence of dangerousness. Pope v. United States, 739 A.2d 819, 826 (D.C. 1999) (charge of AWIK alone insufficient to justify preventive detention). Even if an indictment has been returned, the defendant has a right to present evidence and have that evidence considered by the judge before ordering detention. Tyler v. United States, 705 A.2d 270 (D.C. 1997) (en banc).

c. Rebuttable presumption

The statute creates a rebuttable presumption that no conditions of release will reasonably assure the appearance of the person or the safety of the community if the court finds probable cause[13] that the person: (1) committed a dangerous or violent crime while armed with a firearm or imitation firearm; (2) has threatened or attempted to threaten police, witnesses or jurors; (3) committed a dangerous or violent crime and has previously been convicted of committing a dangerous or violent crime while on release for another offense; (4) committed a dangerous or violent crime while on release for another offense; (5) committed 2 or more dangerous crimes or [12] The accused may testify and present witnesses. § 1322(d)(3)-(4). Tactically, it is unlikely that the defense will want its witnesses deposed so early in the case, as their testimony can later be used to impeach them. § 1322(d)(3). The statute specifically permits the court to rely on defense proffers, § 1322(d)(4), and most judges have been willing to accept defense proffers on factors relating to the defendant's history and character. See § 1322(e)(3).

crimes of violence in separate incidents that are joined in the case before the court; (6) committed robbery in which the victim sustained a physical injury; (7) carried a pistol without a license (D.C. Code § 22-4504(a)), carried a rifle or shotgun (D.C. Code § 22-4504(a-1)), possessed a firearm during a crime of violence (D.C. Code § 22-4504(b)), unlawfully possessed a firearm (D.C. Code § 22-4503), or was in a motor vehicle knowing that there was a firearm inside (new offense that the permanent version of the Omnibus Public Safety and Justice Amendment Act of 2009 will codify); or (8) failed to comply with the requirements of the gun-offender registry while on probation, parole, or supervised release for committing a dangerous crime or a crime of violence while armed with or having readily available a firearm (or imitation) or other deadly or dangerous weapon as described in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a). §§ 1322(c)(1)-(8).[14] Even if the court finds probable cause, the presumption alone cannot satisfy the government's burden of proving by clear and convincing evidence that there are no conditions of release that can assure the safety of the community. The legislative history of the Bail Reform Amendment Emergency Act includes a letter dated January 17, 1992, to the Judiciary Committee, in which the United States Attorney acknowledges that the > rebuttable presumption acts only to shift temporarily the burden of production to the defendant to come forward with some evidence why he would not pose a danger to the community if released pre-trial. The government must still produce enough evidence to convince the court that there is clear and convincing evidence of the defendant's danger to the community.

In other words, the statute creates only a "bursting bubble" presumption. Cf. St. Mary's Honor Center v. Hicks, 509 U.S. 502 (1993). Once the defendant produces some evidence[15] that he would not pose a danger if released, the presumption is no longer relevant and evaporates leaving the government with its full burden of proof. Id. at 510-11.

It is essential that the defense present a suitable structured program of release to prevent a finding that no conditions of release will assure safety. See Blunt v. United States, 322 A.2d 579, 582 (D.C. 1974) (pointing to defendant's failure to provide appropriate program in upholding conclusion that no other conditions would assure safety). It may be advisable to present witnesses – third-party custodians, relatives, or employers – to testify about proposed release programs.

d. Written findings of fact required

When detention is ordered under § 1322, the court must issue written findings of fact and reasons. § 23-1322(g)(1). The government usually prepares proposed findings, a copy of which is served on defense counsel. Hearing commissioners are especially likely to endorse the proposed findings as submitted. That document will remain in the court file, and will be relied upon if, for example, counsel files a motion for modification of the bond status. Counsel should carefully review the submission, and immediately file any objections, proposing alterations or amendments. The defendant can appeal the preventive detention order pursuant to § 23-1324, and, as with bond appeals, this right should be exercised in appropriate circumstances.

[15] The judge must assume the truth of the evidence the defendant produces rebutting dangerous is true. No credibility assessment is done at this stage. Cf. St. Mary's Honor Center, 509 U.S. at 508-09.

e. Indictment in 90 days and trial in 100 days

Preventive detention pursuant to § 1322 creates a right to trial within one hundred days from the date of arrest, provided the defense does not request a continuance.[16] § 1322(h). Section 1322(h) authorizes a twenty-day extension on a written government petition, if "good cause" is found. Best v. United States, 651 A.2d 790, 792-93 (D.C. 1994), held that the trial court cannot extend the period of pre-trial detention beyond 100 days absent a motion by the government and that the court has no "inherent authority" to extend periods of detention beyond those specified in § 1322(h). If the trial does not begin within the time limits, the "defendant shall be treated in accordance with § 23-1321(a)." § 1322(h)(3). See Mack v. United States, 637 A.2d 430, 433-34 (D.C. 1994) (remedy for non-compliance with time requirements is not dismissal, but to reconsider conditions of release).

The statute requires indictment within ninety days of arrest. § 1322(h). If the government actually does consume the bulk of the detention period in the pre-indictment phase, the defense will be hampered by an inordinately brief pre-trial preparation period. Discovery should therefore be sought at the earliest possible opportunity. Counsel should request pre-indictment discovery, and file a motion to compel if it is denied. "[I]f a defendant is locked up, he is hindered in his ability to gather evidence, contact witnesses, or otherwise prepare his defense." Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514, 533 (1972). The resulting "inability of a defendant adequately to prepare his case skews the fairness of the entire system." Id. at 532. The defense must obtain discovery as early as possible to compensate for the prejudice it is suffering from the government-requested detention, which gives the government a significant tactical advantage.

2. Section 1325(a)

For defendants charged with first-degree murder or assault with the intent to kill while armed, the statutory presumption is that the court shall treat the defendant "in accordance with the provisions of section 23-1321." Preventive detention may be ordered if the court finds that there is no condition or combination of conditions that will assure that the defendant will not flee or pose a danger to the community. § 23-1325(a).

Although the statute is silent on the subject, Lynch v. United States, 557 A.2d 580, 582 (D.C. 1989) (en banc), requires that arrestees, under § 23-1325(a) receive the same type of hearing afforded individuals subject to detention under § 23-1322. The defendant is entitled to counsel, to cross-examine witnesses, to testify, present witnesses, and to proffer relevant information. Moreover, although hearsay may be allowed, Lynch acknowledged that hearsay alone will not always suffice to meet the clear and convincing standard for dangerousness. Id. at 582 n.6. If, after considering the § 23-1321(b) factors, the court finds that no release conditions will ensure against flight or danger to the community, the court must explicitly state, orally or in writing, its findings that support probable cause (or more than probable cause) as well as its findings that support clear and convincing evidence of dangerousness and/or flight where no combination of release conditions will protect the community and/or assure the defendant's presence in court.

The government must prove dangerousness by clear and convincing evidence.[17] However, this standard applies to the ultimate determination of dangerousness which the trial court must make, not to each individual fact on which the court relies. Lynch, 557 A.2d at 582. In Lynch, only probable cause was required as to the charged murder because additional factors (the defendant's juvenile and adult record and drug usage) supported the finding of clear and convincing evidence of dangerousness. When there are no triggering factors other than the charged offense, the government must prove the offense by more than probable cause. Id. at 582 n.5; see also Jones v. United States, 687 A.2d 574 (D.C. 1996) (clear and convincing evidence of dangerousness was satisfied where charged offense was proven by a "substantial probability," not just probable cause). Moreover, although Lynch reiterated that hearsay may be allowed, it acknowledged that hearsay alone will not always suffice to meet the clear and convincing standard for dangerousness. 557 A.2d at 582 n.6.

The clear and convincing evidence standard also applies to a finding that the person may flee. Kleinbart v. United States, 604 A.2d 861, 869-71 (D.C. 1992).

If an indictment is not returned within nine months of presentment, the defendant must be released. Price v. United States, 476 A.2d 644, 647 (D.C. 1984); D.C. Code § 23-102; Super. Ct. Crim. R. 48(c). The nine months begins to run from the date of the first probable cause determination (presentment), not from the date of the preliminary hearing. Price, 476 A.2d at 646. If an indictment is returned after release, the person can be detained only after a de novo hearing under § 23-1325(a), and a finding that the defendant would either fail to appear at future proceedings or pose a danger to the community if released. Id. Substantially before the expiration of nine months, counsel should move for dismissal pursuant to Rule 48(b): "If there is unnecessary delay in presenting the charge to a grand jury or in filing an information against a defendant who has been held to answer to the Court . . . the Court may dismiss the indictment, information or complaint." See Lynch, 557 A.2d 580; cf. Salerno, 481 U.S. at 747 (emphasizing "stringent time limitations of the [federal] Speedy Trial Act" in upholding detention without specific time limit). If the government cannot or will not proffer a substantial and legitimate justification for the delay, the court may be persuaded to dismiss the complaint or set conditions of release.

In 1990, the trial court dismissed two murder complaints due to pre-indictment delays of 105 and 98 days respectively. United States v. Hargrove, F-14490-89; United States v. Watkins, F-[17] A judicial finding of substantial probability that the defendant committed first-degree murder while armed with, or having readily available, a firearm or imitation firearm creates a rebuttable presumption that no conditions of release will ensure the safety of the community. § 23-1325(a).

14490-89 & F-159-90 (D.C. Super. Ct. May 2, 1990). The court found a "pattern and practice by the government of misuse of the grand jury process" in cases in which the government persuaded the court to detain the defendants without bond. It found longer delays in first-degree murder cases in which the defendant is preventively detained than in other felony cases, including rapes, robberies and other homicides where preventive detention was not available, and found > no showing of diligence by the government, no demonstration of the reasonableness of the length of delay by any objective standard, no explanation of acceptable reasons for the delay, and obvious prejudice to the accused, as well as overwhelming evidence that the government's conduct in this case reflects the manner in which it almost invariably chooses to proceed in the processing of all first degree murder cases in the grand jury.

The court also established general procedures for all preventive detention cases on its Felony I calendar, requiring an arraignment within sixty days of presentment or a written explanation by the government of the steps taken to present the case to the grand jury, what additional steps must be taken before indictment, the reasons for the delay, and whether further investigation has revealed any exculpatory information regarding dangerousness. Counsel should urge other courts to follow this procedure.

II. REVIEW AND APPEAL OF CONDITIONS OF RELEASE

A client who has not been released within 24 hours after the initial hearing may apply for review of the conditions by the judicial officer who imposed them. D.C. Code §§ 23-1321(c)(4), 1324(b). Given that clients may not be held based on inability to make a money bond, § 1321(c)(3), counsel should immediately file motions for clients who cannot post a bond. (A sample motion is provided in Appendix A.). "Review of [a] magistrate judge's determination of conditions of release . . . shall be made, upon motion, by the judge to whom the case is assigned. Where the case has not been assigned to a judge at the time the motion is filed, review shall be made by a judge to whom the case is assigned for purposes of review." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 117(b)(1). Bond review motions are often decided without a hearing; in appropriate cases hearings should be sought.[18]

Upon the filing of a bond review motion, PSA is to review its report, seek to verify new information, and modify its recommendation if appropriate. § 23-1303(b). By obtaining new facts or verifying facts previously supplied to PSA, counsel may contribute to a more favorable recommendation. This is often a persuasive factor to highlight. As a practical matter, however, the PSA review is done only if specifically requested by the court.

Motion for bond review: In general, the motion should address the unfavorable factors that influenced the court at the initial hearing, as well as the more positive factors. If lack of community ties is evident, a third-party custodian or residential placement should be obtained. Twenty-four hour residential third party custody may be called for in serious cases. See Bouknight v. United States, 305 A.2d 524, 526-27 (D.C. 1973) (Nebeker, J., separate statement). If an employer is willing to rehire the client, a letter to that effect should be attached to the application.

[18] Counsel and PSA are sometimes unable to verify information about the defendant's ties before the first court appearance. If counsel anticipates that information can be obtained overnight, counsel should so advise the court and ask that the client be brought in from jail the next day so that the court can consider oral representations. If the judicial officer setting conditions of release also presides at the preliminary hearing, an oral review motion may be permitted at that time.

Because successive review applications are rarely effective and because counsel should make as strong a record as possible for appellate review, it is generally more effective to file the motion only after an entire release plan has been established.[19]

Denial of a bond application is immediately appealable. See § 23-1324(b). Such appeals are heard without the necessity of briefs, often as a motion for summary reversal, stating the supporting law and facts, with an affidavit by counsel concerning the background information required by Form 4;[20] they are decided on an expedited basis. Martin v. United States, 614 A.2d 51, 53 (D.C. 1992), denied a motion for summary reversal of the preventive detention order and, sua sponte, summarily affirmed the order. Though the court acknowledged that "sua sponte summary affirmance is 'unusual,'" id. at 54, to avoid such a result and preserve the right to full briefing and argument on the merits, counsel may wish to file an expedited appeal rather than a motion for summary reversal.

Denial of a motion to reconsider a pretrial detention is also considered an appealable final order, even if the defendant did not appeal the original detention. Blackson v. United States, 897 A.2d 187, 192-93 (D.C. 2006). Such a motion can be brought even if based on non-newly discovered information. Id. at 193, n. 10 (stating that D.C. Code § 23-1322(d)(6) does not preclude a reconsideration motion based on previously known information).

III. POST RELEASE PROBLEMS: REVOCATION OF RELEASE, CONTEMPT, AND REJECTION OF "TAINTED" MONEY

A. Revocation

Violation of conditions of release may be met with revocation proceedings and prosecution for contempt. See D.C. Code § 23-1329(a). If release conditions include a curfew, PSA will call the client at odd hours to ensure compliance, and inform the court of violations. A new arrest occurring after curfew might alone lead to contempt proceedings, as may a failure to participate in drug treatment, positive drug test, or failure to report for testing.

To revoke release, the court must find, after a hearing, that there is clear and convincing evidence of the violation and that there is no combination of conditions that will reasonably [19] Of course, counsel should not hesitate to file successive motions if new release plans can be developed or other circumstances change (including, for example, repeated trial delays chargeable to the government).

[20] The Court of Appeals has stressed the need for careful compliance with the requirements of Rule 9 for filing the affidavit in the form prescribed by Form 4, which requires a detailed interview with the client. Villines v. United States, 312 A.2d 304, 306-07 (D.C. 1973).

assure the defendant's appearance or the safety of the community. § 1329(b).[21] Revocation cannot be used as punishment. Bitter v. United States, 389 U.S. 15, 17 (1967). But see Sherrod v. United States, 478 A.2d 644, 661-62 (D.C. 1984) (no error in mid-trial revocation of bond). Bitter reversed a conviction where bail had been revoked after the defendant arrived at court thirty-seven minutes late, finding that the order of commitment "had the appearance and effect of punishment." 389 U.S. at 17.

2014 Supplement

Gilliam v. United States*, 46 A.3d 360 (D.C. 2012). Court may find violation of Bail Reform Act where defendant appears in court on requested day, but leaves before being officially released by judicial officer.

B. Contempt

Contempt for violation of a release order is usually prosecuted under § 1329, which carries a maximum penalty of six months imprisonment and a fine of $1,000. The government must establish that the defendant violated a condition of release which was in writing and which was sufficiently clear and specific to serve as a guide for the person's conduct. Smith v. United States, 677 A.2d 1022, 1030-31 (D.C. 1996); see also In re Peak, 759 A.2d 612, 614 (D.C. 2000) (trial court has authority to enter a release order even if underlying injunction is "void"). The proceeding is expedited and heard by the court without a jury, but the defendant enjoys other fundamental procedural protections such as the right to testify and present evidence. Beckham v. United States, 609 A.2d 1122, 1125 (D.C. 1992); In re Wiggins, 359 A.2d 579, 580-81 & n.5 (D.C. 1976). The government can choose not to use these expedited procedures and instead prosecute the defendant for felony criminal contempt pursuant to D.C. Code § 11-944, which carries a maximum penalty of fifteen years to life imprisonment. See Caldwell v. United States, 595 A.2d 961, 964-66 (D.C. 1991). Felony contempt prosecutions are generally unnecessary and should be rare, in part because the trial court may not impose a sentence that is disproportionate to the contumacious act. Id. at 968-72. A contempt conviction, based on commission of a new offense while on release, bars later prosecution of the substantive offense if all elements of the substantive offense were proved in the contempt prosecution. United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 689 (1993).

To be contumacious, the act must be willful. Thus, Parker v. United States, 373 A.2d 906, 907 (D.C. 1977), reversed a contempt conviction based on a rearrest; while commission of a crime could be willful, arrest could not. Similarly, late arrival for court is not contumacious unless "the defendant behaved with willful, deliberate, or reckless disregard of the obligation to appear on time." Thompson v. United States, 690 A.2d 479, 482 (D.C. 1997) (citing to Williams v. United States, 576 A.2d 1339, 1342 (D.C. 1990) (defendant's tardiness on one occasion insufficient to prove elements of contempt); see also Swisher v. United States, 572 A.2d 85, 92 (D.C. 1990) (explaining procedures required for contempt hearing based on failure to appear). The act and willfulness must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

[21] Counsel should avoid allowing the defendant to speak directly to the court during a hearing on a motion to revoke conditions, because any such statements could be used against the defendant at a later contempt proceeding. See, e.g., Foster v. United States, 618 A.2d 191 (D.C. 1992).

C. "Tainted" Money

If release conditions include a money bond, the court can inquire into the source of money or property being used to post bond and reject the collateral if it "will not reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required." § 23-1321(c)(2). This type of inquiry was first initiated in cases related to drug charges; the rationale is that money gleaned through illegitimate or criminal sources would afford no moral assurance of the defendant's reappearance. United States v. Nebbia, 357 F.2d 303, 304 (2d Cir. 1966); United States v. Fedullo, 525 F. Supp. 1210 (D.N.J. 1981). Such inquiry could present serious Fifth Amendment problems. Nebbia, 357 F.2d at 305-06. Because this provision has only recently been invoked, counsel must rely on federal case law to prepare for the inquiry.

IV. EXTRADITION

Extradition is the surrender of a person from one state to another for the purpose of criminal prosecution.

> A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

U.S. Const. art. IV, § 2, cl. 2. Under this provision, one state may demand from another state the delivery of a person who has been accused or convicted of a crime within its jurisdiction. (There is no constitutional authority for extradition in connection with civil matters.)

The states in which the fugitive is wanted and is located are the "demanding" and "asylum" states, respectively. Absent an indictment, Kirkland v. Preston, 385 F.2d 670 (D.C. Cir. 1967) establishes that before extradition may be ordered, the asylum state must be independently satisfied that the extradition request shows probable cause. A "fugitive" is anyone being sought by a foreign state; the term does not imply an attempt to flee or hide. See Walker v. United States, 775 A.2d 1107 (D.C. 2001) (a conviction establishes probable cause to extradite; the fact that defendant lawfully moved from Maryland to D.C. is immaterial for extradition purposes because "fled" simply means "left" the demanding state). The asylum state must deliver fugitives upon proper demand, Kentucky v. Dennison, 65 U.S. 66, 107 (1861), and federal courts can compel performance of this duty. Puerto Rico v. Branstad, 483 U.S. 219, 228 (1987) (reversing Dennison in part).

Extradition is a two-step process involving the executive (governor), see Dennison, 65 U.S. at 102-03, and judicial authorities. In the District of Columbia, the Chief Judge acts in both capacities. See generally D.C. Code §§ 23-701 to 707; Super. Ct. Crim. R. 40-I.[22] In ordering apprehension and delivery of fugitives, the Chief Judge acts in an executive capacity. Martin v. Maryland, 287 A.2d 823, 826 (D.C. 1972). In conducting an extradition hearing, the court acts in a judicial capacity and must afford the accused the same rights to challenge the writ of extradition as if the hearing were upon a writ of habeas corpus. § 23-704(d); Martin, 287 A.2d at 826; see also Outlaw v. United States, 806 A.2d 1192 (D.C. 2002) (trial court erred in finding no violation of federal rules governing extradition and the right to a probable cause hearing in the jurisdiction of arrest, where the defendant signed a waiver form after being given materially inaccurate information pertaining to his procedural rights that it would have been a probable cause hearing; conviction also upheld on grounds that impact of the error did not prejudice defendant).

A. The Initial Stages

Extradition begins when an arrest warrant, bench warrant or indictment, issued in the demanding state, is forwarded to the MPD Fugitive Squad, which then obtains a D.C. arrest warrant charging the individual as a fugitive. § 23-701. When an arrest is made, in most respects the police process the arrestee like any other defendant.[23] Presentment is in courtroom C-10, on the charge of being a fugitive, with a Special Proceedings case number; case jackets are kept in the Special Proceedings Clerk's office.

At presentment, the fugitive may either demand an extradition hearing or waive formal proceedings pursuant to §§ 23-702(f) and 704(f). If a hearing is waived, the court signs an order for return to the demanding state. Only with consent of the United States Attorney may the court then release the fugitive upon conditions thought necessary to ensure appearance in the demanding state. § 702(f)(2). If the person is detained without bond, the demanding state must arrange transportation within three days, excluding weekends and holidays; the court may extend this for an additional three days if it finds "good reason" to do so. § 702(f)(4).

If extradition is contested, a hearing must be set within thirty days. § 702(b). (Extraditions are always set for Wednesday mornings.) Conditions of release are determined in a manner similar to that authorized by § 23-1321 for criminal defendants. § 702(b). However, the fugitive charge creates "a presumption that the person is unlikely to appear if released, which may be overcome only by clear and convincing proof." Id. Moreover, if the requisition from the demanding state has arrived and is filed in the court jacket, the fugitive must be detained. § 702(g).[24]

Before the hearing, the demanding state must forward its requisition (often referred to as "the governor's papers") to the District. These papers contain the formal request for rendition of the [23] If the client is facing both a D.C. charge and a fugitive warrant, the government must dismiss one and proceed on the other. Dismissal of the extradition request does not end the matter, as the demanding state may seek to renew the action after completion of the District's prosecution. Usually this is accomplished by lodging the out-of-state warrant as a detainer which is executed after completion of the D.C. prosecution.

[24] In determining whether to recommend that a client waive or challenge extradition, counsel should keep two things in mind. First, time in custody in the District before extradition is not credited to any sentence imposed in the demanding state. Second, release is unlikely if the charge is serious or there is any indication of flight or deceit in avoiding the police, but is often granted if the charge is minor or the defendant has previously tried to make arrangements to deal with it. These factors must be thoroughly discussed before the initial hearing.

fugitive and are usually sent to the chambers of the Chief Judge, where counsel may inspect them before the hearing. The government is represented by the United States Attorney's Office, Grand Jury/Intake Section, 555 Fourth Street, N.W., 2nd floor.

Some clients request a hearing and release so that they have thirty days to go voluntarily to the demanding state to surrender themselves. This allows the client to choose the time of arrest, to arrange in advance for counsel or bond, and to avoid the several days in holding waiting to be picked up by the demanding state.

If the client initially challenges extradition but later wants to waive the hearing, counsel should inform the Special Proceedings office, which will arrange for the case to be called in courtroom C-10 the next day for entry of the waiver.

B. The Hearing

Extradition is a "summary procedure," in which the asylum state court "may do no more than ascertain whether the requisites of the Extradition Act have been met." California v. Superior Court (Smolin), 482 U.S. 400, 407-08 (1987). The court must order return to the demanding state upon a finding that the fugitive: (1) is the person named in the requisition; (2) "is substantially charged with a crime in the demanding state;" and (3) is a fugitive from justice – that was in the demanding state at the time the offense was committed. Martin, 287 A.2d at 825. These findings may be based solely on properly certified governor's papers. See, e.g., Maktos v. Matthews, 194 F.2d 354, 355 (D.C. Cir. 1952).

Most extradition hearings ultimately result in concessions or waivers if the proper paperwork has arrived from the demanding state. To overcome the prima facie case created by a properly certified requisition, the fugitive must produce clear and convincing evidence of the defense. Moncrief v. Anderson, 342 F.2d 902, 904 (D.C. Cir. 1964). The demanding state has no specific burden of proof; it must only present evidence that is "satisfactory" to the court. Strict rules of evidence do not apply. Gibson v. Beall, 249 F.2d 489, 490 (D.C. Cir. 1957); Fed. R. Evid. 1101(d)(3).

C. Defenses

The defenses to extradition are as limited as the findings that the court must make. Defenses that must await return to the demanding state include that the indictment was not drawn up in compliance with the laws of the demanding state, Dennison, 65 U.S. at 107; defenses relating to guilt or innocence, Smolin, 482 U.S. at 407-08; inability of the indictment to withstand a motion to dismiss, demurrer or MJOA, id. at 410-11; Fourth and Fifth amendment arguments, Martin, 287 A.2d at 826-27; running of the statute of limitations, Smolin, 482 U.S. at 411; Eighth Amendment claims of cruel and unusual punishment, Pacileo v. Walker, 449 U.S. 86, 87 (1980); and defenses based on questions of credibility or clerical errors, Bruzaud v. Matthews, 207 F.2d 25, 26-27 (D.C. Cir. 1953).

Neither insanity nor alibi is a defense (although the defense may present evidence that the defendant was not in the demanding state when the crime was committed). Charlton v. Kelly, 229 U.S. 447, 462 (1913); Munsey v. Clough, 196 U.S. 364, 375 (1905). It has not yet been decided whether competence can be raised. Shreeves v. United States, 395 A.2d 774, 782 n.11 (D.C. 1978); see also Lathan v. Reid, 280 F.2d 66, 69 (D.C. Cir. 1960); Texas v. Bellone, SP-1164-81 (D.C. Super. Ct. Oct. 14, 1981) (unpublished oral order) (Moultrie, C.J.) (permitting examination for competence relevant to possible defenses to extradition, i.e., whether fugitive knew his identity and whereabouts on date of alleged offense). Nor has it been clearly decided whether a double jeopardy defense is available. Barrett v. Bigger, 17 F.2d 669, 670 (D.C. Cir. 1927).

1. The requisition is not in order on its face

The governor's papers must be "certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate" of the demanding state. 18 U.S.C. § 3182.[25] Upon certification, the papers are presumed to be legal and regular. Lee Won Sing v. Cottone, 123 F.2d 169, 174 (D.C. Cir. 1941). In addition to the certification, the papers must contain an indictment or affidavit. 18 U.S.C. § 3182. They usually also contain the seal or stamp of the demanding state, an attestation by a clerk of the court that the operative paper is authentic, certification by a judge that the attesting clerk is a clerk of the court, and a certification by a clerk that the judge is a judge of the court. The exact form in which the requisition is prepared depends on the demanding state's requirements for authentication. See Lee Won Sing at 171-72. One can defend on the ground that the extradition documents are not in order on their face. Michigan v. Doran, 439 U.S. 282, 289 (1978). Defects in the requisition can be corrected by testimony at the hearing. Tucker v. Virginia, 308 A.2d 783, 785 (D.C. 1973).

2. The defendant is not the person named

An identity of names between the person sought and the person in court is prima facie evidence that they are the same person. See Jacobs v. United States, 24 F.2d 890, 891 (D.C. Cir. 1928). However, the warrant may contain a physical description of the fugitive that is demonstrably not the same as the client's, a date of birth that can be disproven, or an FBI number different from the client's. Some of this information may be available via computer through PSA or Legal Services.

3. The fugitive is not charged with a crime

Whether a fugitive is substantially charged with a crime is a question of law, determined from the face of the governor's papers. Smolin, 482 U.S. at 409; Moncrief, 342 F.2d at 904 n.3. The papers must include an affidavit or indictment; a warrant will not suffice. 18 U.S.C. § 3182. An indictment makes out a prima facie case; its sufficiency cannot be challenged in the asylum state. Smolin, 482 U.S. at 410-11. While a finding of probable cause is required, the asylum state cannot review a finding that was made by a neutral judicial officer in the demanding state based on an affidavit, or is evidenced by the existence of an indictment. Doran, 439 U.S. at 290; Ex parte United States, 287 U.S. 241, 250 (1932). No more inquiry is permitted than whether the document "set[s] forth facts that clearly satisfy each element of the crime" charged. Smolin, 482 U.S. at 409; cf. Smolin, 482 U.S at 412-22 (Stevens, J., dissenting on the ground that the charge was clearly invalid).

4. The defendant was not in the demanding state when the offense was committed

To be a "fugitive," one need only have been in the demanding state when the offense is alleged to have been committed. The demanding state's indictment creates a presumption of fugitivity. Moncrief, 342 F.2d at 904. While the defense cannot present standard alibi evidence, it can present proof that the defendant was in a different state or country at the time of the incident alleged in the indictment. Id.

D. Appeals

When the court determines that the government has established its prima facie case and that the fugitive has failed to overcome it by clear and convincing evidence, it signs an order of surrender authorizing the accused to be turned over to an agent from the demanding state. The fugitive then has twenty-four hours to appeal. D.C. Code § 23-704(e). An appeal will lie if a judge of the Court of Appeals issues a certificate of probable cause. Id. The appeal is treated in an expedited manner. Taking an appeal requires an immediate motion (oral, or with a previously prepared written motion) to stay the order pending appeal, in order to avoid premature return to the demanding state. Counsel should discuss this decision with the client before the hearing begins.

APPENDIX A

SUPERIOR COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA
Criminal Division – Misdemeanor Branch

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

v.

JOHN SMITH

Criminal No. M-0000-00
Judge X
Trial: 00/00/00

APPLICATION FOR REVIEW AND MODIFICATION OF CONDITIONS OF RELEASE

John Smith, through counsel, requests that this Court review and modify present conditions of release, pursuant to D.C. Code § 23-1321(c)(4), to permit his release into third-party custody. As grounds for this motion, counsel states:

On March 6, 2000, Mr. Smith was arrested on a charge of receiving stolen property. Upon presentment before the Honorable _____, on March 7, 2000, the court set a $3,000 surety bond as a condition of release. The Pre-trial Services Agency did not recommend release because it was unable at that time to verify Mr. Smith's present home address.

Mr. Smith has been incarcerated since his arrest. Despite their extensive efforts, Mr. Smith's family and friends have been unable to obtain the funds necessary to meet the premium charged by a professional surety agency for the posting of a $3,000 bond. If present conditions of release are not modified, Mr. Smith will remain in jail pending resolution of this case, because he has no prospect of acquiring the money necessary to secure his release upon conditions as presently set.

Counsel has now verified that Mr. Smith lives at 9999 J Street, S.E., the address that he gave the Pre-trial Services Agency in its interview with him. This address was verified by Mr. Smith's wife, Mary Smith, who was hospitalized at the time of her husband's arrest and therefore could not be contacted by the Pre-trial Services Agency or counsel.

Mr. Smith has only one prior conviction, for burglary in the second degree in 1987, for which he successfully completed his parole. Mr. Smith has never missed a scheduled court appearance, is a long-time resident of this city, and has strong family ties in Washington.

The Bureau of Rehabilitation has agreed to act as third-party custodian for Mr. Smith, and Mr. Smith has agreed to cooperate completely with the Bureau and participate fully in each aspect of the Bureau's program. This organization works closely with Pre-trial Services and keeps it fully abreast of a participant's cooperation. It regularly records such information and makes it available to Pre-trial Services and, through it, to the court. As part of the Bureau's program, Mr. Smith will report to the Bureau when and as required and will avail himself of the vocational training, job placement, and other programs and services provided by the Bureau.

Bonabond, Inc., has also agreed to act as third-party custodian, should the court determine that such placement would be more appropriate. Bonabond requires that each participant maintain regular contact, through personal visits and by telephone, and keep it fully informed of daily activities. It also provides counseling and information regarding job training and placement. Mr. Smith is also willing to fully participate in and cooperate with this program if the court so orders.

Mr. Smith further submits that less onerous conditions of release are mandated by D.C. Code § 23-1321(c)(3) and by equal protection standards. Section 23-1321(c)(3) states that financial conditions cannot be imposed if they result in the pre-trial detention of a person. Moreover, Mr. Smith is being denied his liberty solely because of his poverty even before he has been accorded a trial on the charges against him. Such invidious financial discrimination offends the equal protection guarantee of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. See Tate v. Short, 401 U.S. 395 (1971) (equal protection prohibits imprisonment of an indigent person because of inability to pay a fine); Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235 (1970) (same); Smith v. Bennett, 365 U.S. 708 (1961) (equal protection prohibits a state from limiting post-conviction relief proceedings to those unable to pay filing fees); Burns v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 252 (1959) (equal protection prohibits denial of appeal to an indigent person because of his inability to pay filing fees); Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956) (equal protection prohibits a state from denying a pre-trial transcript to an indigent defendant so he may prosecute an appeal). Mr. Smith's financial inability to obtain the service of a bondsman not only costs him his liberty, but also affects other fundamental rights, and has a substantial adverse effect on his ability to prepare for trial and sentencing. See Campbell v. McGruder, 580 F.2d 521, 531-32 (D.C. Cir. 1978). As in Williams and Tate, Mr. Smith is imprisoned solely because of his indigence. As in Griffin and its progeny, his ability to post collateral with the bondsman bears no rational relationship to the government's interest in assuring his return for trial, and other "less drastic" alternatives are available to the state. Here, the "less drastic" alternatives are the non-financial conditions of pre-trial release that are preferred by D.C. Code § 23-1321 to a surety bond. Thus, the alternative conditions of release proposed herein should be imposed instead of a surety bond.

For the reasons stated above, Mr. Smith requests that this court modify the conditions of release as presently set and order as follows:

a. That Mr. Smith be released into the third-party custody of the Bureau of Rehabilitation;

b. That, in the alternative, Mr. Smith be released into the third-party custody of Bonabond, Inc.;

c. That Mr. Smith reports to the Bureau of Rehabilitation or Bonabond as required;

d. That Mr. Smith be ordered to obtain employment within a reasonable time; and

e. That Mr. Smith resides at 9999 Jay Street, S.E., with his wife.

In the alternative, Mr. Smith respectfully requests that this court reduce his bond to $1,000 with the provision that ten percent of that amount may be deposited with the Clerk of the Court.

In the event that the court denies the defendant's request for modification, it is respectfully requested that this court set forth in writing its reasons for the conditions imposed, pursuant to D.C. Code § 23-1321(c)(4).

APPENDIX B

CHECKLIST OF HELPFUL INFORMATION WHEN INTERVIEWING CLIENT IN PREPARATION FOR BOND HEARING[26]

In addition to gathering preliminary information from the client, it may also be necessary for counsel to memorialize the client's appearance at the time that counsel first meets him in the cellblock, or as soon as possible thereafter. Therefore, at the initial presentment, counsel should do two things: request an order from the judge permitting counsel to take photographs of the client in the cellblock or at the jail the next day and/or ask a fellow colleague to write down or memorialize a description of client's appearance, including any injuries he may have received.

1. Name, address, phone number(s)

2. Aliases or nicknames

3. PDID number

4. DCDC number

5. Social security number

6. Date and place of birth

7. Immigration information if client is not a U.S. citizen – INS number, place and date of entry, and immigration status

8. Length of residence in the District of Columbia

9. Length of residence elsewhere in the metropolitan area

10. Does the client have any identification or mail in his possession? (Usually not, but sometimes yes)

11. Marital status (include common law), name and address of spouse, and whether client supports spouse

12. Number, duration and location of prior marriages

13. Children – number, ages, addresses, and whether client is supporting them

14. Current address and phone number

[26] Although a client may not know all this information during an initial cellblock interview, and counsel may not have time to go through all these questions, the checklist is designed to be as exhaustive as possible and is helpful if counsel needs to prepare a motion for reconsideration of bond.

15. Names, relationships to client, and employers (address and phone number) of people currently living with client

16. Prior addresses for last five years – dates, duration, and persons living with

17. Education – how far in school, last school attended, ability to read and write

18. Military background – branch, dates, stations, discharge type

19. Employer – name, address, telephone number, length of employment, title and nature of work performed, name of supervisor, and possibility of returning to work if released

20. Can fact of arrest be discussed with anyone on the job?

21. Prospective employer – name, address, phone number, and date employment is to begin

22. Prior employment for last five years (include information in 19 and reasons for leaving each job)

23. Student – name of school, type of study, hours attending each day, address, phone number, length of time attended

24. Relatives in D.C. area with whom client maintains any contact – name, address, home and work phone numbers, nature of employment of each

25. Same as #24 for all non-relatives in D.C. area with whom client maintains any contact

26. Who among people in 24 and 25 might be willing to take third-party custody?

27. Prior arrests – charge, court and date[27]

28. Pending charges – date of arrest, offense, case number, status, next court date, judge, conditions of release, name and phone number of attorney

29. Prior releases – conditions of release, any forfeiture of money bond or revocation of non-financial conditions, the reasons, court, date, offense and criminal number

30. Convictions – offense, case number, court, date, sentence (including juvenile record)

31. Prior probation – offense, case number, judge, date, probation officer, conditions, reasons for any revocation

[27] Information provided by the client can be supplemented by checking the client's record and prior case files (fourth floor of the courthouse), and through current and previous parole and probation officers.

32. Prior parole – offense, case number, parole officer, conditions, date paroled, date time expires, reasons for any revocation

33. Current probation or parole – offense, case number, date paroled or placed on probation, judge if on probation, conditions, probation or parole officer, degree of compliance, expiration date

34. Failures to appear in court, abscondences, escapes

35. Present health problems – mental, physical, substance related

36. Prior hospitalization for a mental condition – date of entry, location, doctors' names, diagnoses, treatment received, date of discharge

37. Present or past substance abuse – type of substance, period of use, and treatment received, including facility, address, phone number, counselor's name, duration, tests conducted

38. Use of prescribed medications – type, dosage, reason, doctor (may be needed while incarcerated and may affect drug test results)

39. Available financial resources – money on hand, in bank, or available from friends or relatives, and their addresses and phone numbers

INVESTIGATION

Thorough and creative investigation is critical to a successful defense, and is counsel's legal and ethical obligation. The investigation must include frequent, meaningful consultations with the client, interviews with all potential witnesses (whether government or defense), and complete and continuing discovery.

The Supreme Court has recognized a legal entitlement to investigative assistance since Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), reversed the convictions of the Scottsboro defendants. Powell held that an accused is entitled to the effective assistance of counsel "during perhaps the most critical period of the proceedings . . . from the time of . . . arraignment until the beginning of . . . trial, when consultation, thorough on going investigation and preparation [are] vitally important." Id. at 57. The American Bar Association has specifically identified the duty of thorough investigation as an essential ethical obligation. See ABA Standards for Criminal Justice 4-4.1 (1980). Because it is counsel's duty to achieve the best result for the client, "[t]he duty to investigate exists regardless of the accused's admissions or statements to the lawyer of facts constituting guilt or the accused's stated desire to plead guilty." Id. The system, after all, is designed to free those whom the government cannot prove guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

Counsel has a constitutional duty to make reasonable investigations or to make reasonable decisions that make particular investigation unnecessary. Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 691 (1984). The Sixth Amendment requires investigation and preparation, not only to exonerate, but also to secure and protect the rights of the accused. Such constitutional rights are granted to the innocent and guilty alike, and failure to investigate and file appropriate motions is ineffectiveness. See, e.g., Kimmelman v. Morrison, 477 U.S. 365 (1986) (failure to investigate and present Fourth Amendment claim was constitutionally ineffective). The court of appeals has reversed convictions due to ineffective pretrial consultation, investigation and preparation. See e.g., Byrd v. United States, 614 A.2d 25 (D.C. 1992); Sykes v. United States, 585 A.2d 1335 (D.C. 1991); Harris v. United States, 441 A.2d 268 (D.C. 1982); Asbell v. United States, 436 A.2d 804 (D.C. 1981).

The importance of thorough investigation cannot be over emphasized. Even the most skillful lawyer's effectiveness is undermined by inadequate knowledge of the facts. A lawyer handling an inadequately investigated case is often ineffective not only at trial but also when seeking a disposition without trial. It is not unusual for a prosecutor to dismiss a case or offer a favorable disposition when presented with exculpatory evidence discovered through investigation.

It is counsel's obligation to find out as much as possible about every case, as soon as possible. Speed is essential. Physical evidence disappears, memories fade, and witnesses move away or are forgotten. Thoroughness is just as crucial. Counsel can never gather too many details concerning the facts and circumstances. The obscure or easily overlooked fact may become vital to defense strategy in the midst of trial.

I. FACETS OF INVESTIGATION

A. The Client Interview

Counsel's first step is the interview with the client. Every lawyer has a personal approach to clients, but there are a number of basic rules that are generally followed:

- The client should be carefully advised that all communications between attorney and client are absolutely confidential.

- An in-depth interview should not be attempted during the initial meeting, which is typically in the cellblock on the day of presentment or arraignment.

- The first private interview should be thorough. Counsel must probe for specifics; nothing should be taken for granted, and ambiguities should be clarified. Names, dates, addresses and phone numbers should be obtained. Counsel should consider involving the client in the investigation as counsel's agent, to help in finding witnesses, making introductions, etc. The client should never be involved, however, in any contact or attempted contacts with the complainant or any witnesses the client has been ordered to stay away from. The client should be aware that the success of the defense efforts may depend on the completeness and accuracy of the information the client provides.

- Tell your client the name and phone number of your investigator and let client know that investigator is authorized to speak with client.

- It is critical that counsel and the client are able to find each other; counsel should know the addresses and phone numbers of the client's residence and family members as well as places frequented by the client. If the client does not have a phone or pager, counsel should obtain phone numbers of neighbors, friends or family members who would be willing to take and relay non-confidential messages between counsel and the client. The client should be instructed to notify counsel of any subsequent changes.

B. Discovery

The informal discovery conference is an extremely important investigative tool. Counsel should request all potentially discoverable material. Often more than one conference is necessary.

Physical Evidence: Counsel has a right to view, and should view, the physical evidence, including photographs and diagrams, at the time of discovery. This examination should take place well in advance of trial. Counsel should request a letter from the prosecutor authorizing counsel and an investigator to view and photograph the evidence at the property office (2235 Shannon Place, S.E.) or DEA lab (on New York Avenue, Thursday mornings, 9:00 a.m.-11:00 a.m.), or ask to have it brought to the prosecutor's office so counsel can thoroughly examine it. "Viewing Letters" are only valid for one month. Therefore, counsel should plan accordingly.

Photographs: The government will generally have photographs of the scene and a color photograph of the defendant, which may have been taken during the booking process or at the District. The color photograph and the "mug shot" can be obtained with a subpoena served at 300 Indiana Avenue, N.W., Room 4034, and directed to the Chief of Police or authorized representative, setting forth the time, date, and location of arrest, the CCR number, the client's date of birth and PDID number and the date the photo was taken. Allow 5 business days for production of photos. Counsel should also request a copy of all photographs, including the mug shot and color photo of the client through discovery.

C. Crime Scene Investigation

Personal inspection of the scene of the incident, preferably under conditions similar to those at the time of the alleged crime, is imperative. It is important to view the scene as soon as possible, because lighting, weather and structures may change quickly. Counsel should bring an investigator who can take photographs and testify about distances, lighting, etc. Included in Appendix B to this chapter are sources for certified records of street lighting, weather reports, times of sunrise and sunset, aerial photographs, and other information relevant to conditions at the scene.

D. Interviewing Defense Witnesses

Counsel should seek out and talk to every potential defense witness as soon as possible. These include not only alibi witnesses and other obviously important witnesses, but also those who can corroborate even a small part of the defense case. Care should be taken to not only learn what each witness has to say about the case but also facts about the witness—for example, criminal record or reasons for possible bias, which may subject the witness to embarrassing impeachment at trial. In addition, witnesses can often provide leads to other witnesses. Counsel may ask defense witnesses to come to counsel's office for an interview, but if they refuse, an investigator should be sent to interview them. Whether to take signed statements from defense witnesses or to serve a subpoena at the time of initial contact are matters of judgment that will depend on the circumstances. The reverse Jencks Act provisions, Super. Ct. Crim. R. 26.2, must be considered before any defense witness statements or memoranda are written. Investigators should be aware that any witness statements must be produced by the defense upon government request if the witness testifies for the defense at trial.[1] Since statements of defense witnesses may be used to impeach them, investigators should consult with counsel prior to all interviews to determine how the interview should be memorialized.

[1] Disclosure of statements may also be required under United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225 (1975). Nobles upheld an order precluding testimony by a defense investigator after counsel impeached government witnesses with the contents of the investigator's report, unless counsel provided the government with a copy of the report. Central to the holding was the defendant's waiver of the work-product privilege attached to the document, by seeking to make "a unilateral testimonial use of work-product materials." Id. at 240. "{W]here, as here, counsel attempts to make a testimonial use of [work-product] materials, the normal rules of evidence come into play with respect to cross-examination and production of documents." Id. at 239 n.14. Rule 26.2 is triggered simply by the defendant's calling a witness even if the defendant does not make testimonial use of work-product.

In Lopez v. United States, 801 A.2d 39 (D.C. 2002), the court reversed the trial court's denial without a hearing of defendant's 23-110 motion alleging ineffective assistance of counsel in the failure to interview exculpatory witnesses and present their testimony in a murder case. A hearing was required where the defendant presented the affidavits of two fact witnesses and of one expert witness that supported the defendant's claim of self-defense. The affidavits raised a reasonable probability that the testimony of the witnesses, if consistent with their affidavits, would have affected the outcome of the case. In Arrington v. United States, 804 A.2d 1068 (D.C. 2002), the court reversed the trial court's denial without a hearing of a motion for new trial based on ineffective assistance of counsel and a motion for new trial based on newly discovered evidence. The ineffectiveness claim alleged that trial counsel failed to attempt to locate or interview exculpatory witnesses after being provided with several names by the defendant, and the trial court erroneously denied the motion without an evidentiary hearing to determine credibility of defendant's assertions. The newly discovered evidence claim rested on an affidavit from a participant in the crime who stated that defendant was not involved, and again the court held that the trial court should have held an evidentiary hearing.

Interviewing Defense Witnesses:

- ✓ Witness statements must be produced upon government request if the defense witness testifies
- ✓ Consider reverse Jencks Act provisions before witness statements or memoranda are written
- ✓ These statements by defense witnesses may be used for impeachment
- ✓ Investigators should consult with counsel prior to all interviews to determine how the interview should be memorialized

E. Defendant's Criminal Record

The most complete information regarding the defendant's criminal record can be obtained through discovery requests. Counsel can also obtain a record of local arrests by submitting a Criminal History Request Form to the Metropolitan Police Department, Central Records Division, Room 2076, 300 Indiana Avenue, N.W., and checking the computer in the Criminal Information Office Room 4001 at the courthouse.

Have your investigator check all local court records for client in Maryland and Virginia as well.

F. Prosecution Witnesses

The defense must attempt to interview all government witnesses as early as possible. Witness interviews should be conducted either by an investigator or by counsel in the presence of an investigator. Counsel should never interview a hostile witness without an investigator being present because in the event the witness's trial testimony varies from the interview statement, counsel would be placed in the untenable position of being an impeaching witness. See United States v. Vereen, 429 F.2d 713 (D.C. Cir. 1970); United States v. Porter, 429 F.2d 203 (D.C. Cir.

1970); ABA Standards for Criminal Justice 4-4.3(e) (1991). The interviewing of government witnesses is discussed in more detail infra Section II.B and Appendix C.

PD 251: The PD 251 includes the complainant's name and address, and can be viewed at the police station in the District of the arrest for a few days after the incident. After about 3 months it will then be sent to police headquarters and, about three months after the incident, can be obtained in Room 3061, 300 Indiana Avenue, N.W. To get a PD 251, counsel needs the CCR or CCN number, which is on the court jacket, on the complaint or information in the arrest book at the District in which the arrest was made; and the client name, date of birth and date of offence. The PD 251 may also have the name of any hospital to which the complainant was taken and the number of the ambulance. Hospital records and ambulance runs often contain statements made by the complainant and other useful information.

Criminal Records: Local criminal conviction records are available in the Criminal Information Office, Room 4003 of the Superior Court. Counsel should check the records for both government and defense witnesses, and obtain a certified copy of all judgments of conviction for government witnesses, to use at trial for impeachment. D.C. Code § 14-305. Because of its importance, counsel should usually conduct this search personally rather than rely upon an investigator, even though it is a time-consuming process.

Counsel should not rely solely upon the computer system. Names fed into the computer are sometimes misspelled, and counsel may not have all the information (often including a middle initial) that may be required to retrieve accurate information. Counsel must also review the actual court files to determine whether a conviction resulted. Closed case jackets are available in the Criminal Information Office or in storage in Suitland, Maryland. Because it may take several weeks to obtain a file from storage, the record search must be conducted as early as possible. If the case is still "open," the file should be in the felony or misdemeanor clerk's office. Although counsel is entitled to conviction records for government witnesses who testify at trial, accuracy should be checked in the court records.

In 2005, the confidentiality of juvenile case records changed to allow defense attorneys, among others, "when necessary for the discharge of their official duties" to inspect juvenile case records. See D.C. Code § 16-2331(b)(6). Note that defense attorneys are only allowed access to case records, not to social records. The case records should be a helpful source of information for such things as the witness's contacts with the juvenile system (pending cases or adjudications), about the witness's current location (e.g. at Oak Hill or in a residential program) for purposes of finding the witness to interview him or her. Counsel should check with the juvenile clerk's office about the process and procedural requirements to access the records. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 55.

In addition, counsel should check criminal records in United States District Court. Prior to the 1970 Court Reform Act, most crimes were prosecuted there. Those records are located in the Clerk's office, United States Courthouse, 3rd & Constitution Avenue, N.W. For anyone who may have been convicted outside the District of Columbia, criminal clerk's offices in those localities should be contacted.

The government must provide records of its witnesses' impeachable convictions, on request, at trial. Lewis v. United States, 393 A.2d 109, 115 (D.C. 1978), aff'd on reh'g, 408 A.2d 303 (1979); United States v. Engram, 337 A.2d 488, 492 (D.C. 1975). Counsel should request disclosure of this information through pretrial discovery. See Young v. United States, 478 A.2d 287 (D.C. 1984) (no pretrial Lewis request shown, therefore government was only required to supply information available to it at time request was made). Counsel should thoroughly examine the court jackets of all prosecution witnesses. The pretrial services report will provide information about current and prior addresses, employment, school, probation or parole status, and drug or alcohol usage. If a government witness has a juvenile record, counsel must apply to the court for permission to inspect juvenile jackets.

To explore biases, motives to lie, etc., and to obtain potential impeachment material, counsel should find out as much as possible about the government witnesses. Often it is useful to talk to the witnesses' relatives and friends, with whom they may have discussed the incident. Doctors and nurses who treated the witness and ambulance attendants, who are often the first ones on a scene, can also provide useful information.

Government Witnesses:

- ✓ Check records for government witnesses
- ✓ Obtain a certified copy of all judgments of conviction for government witnesses to use for impeachment
- ✓ Interview all government witnesses as early as possible
- ✓ Counsel should never interview a hostile witness without an investigator present – if the hostile witness's trial testimony varies from the interview statement, counsel would be placed in the untenable position of being an impeaching witness

G. Medical Records

The law on access to medical records changed dramatically when Brown v. United States, 567 A.2d 426 (D.C. 1989), held that the doctor-patient privilege barred disclosure of medical records unless the patient consents or unless those records are "evidence in criminal cases where the accused is charged with causing the death of, or inflicting injuries upon, a human being, and the disclosure is required in the interests of public justice." D.C. Code § 14-307(b)(1). The "interest of public justice" exception requires that the trial court determine whether to issue a subpoena. Brown, 567 A.2d at 427. However, it is not clear whether the determination is made ex parte or through a full adversarial hearing.

Another issue left unanswered in Brown is whether a party has standing to object to issuance of the subpoena. For example, if the government moves to quash a defense subpoena for records of a government witness. The Brown court suggests that the government would not have standing because the privilege belongs to the patient.

Obtaining Medical Records: The easiest way to avoid the problems created by Brown is to get the witness's consent in a written release of medical records. If consent cannot be obtained, counsel must seek leave of the court to issue the subpoena. Counsel should file an ex parte motion, but must be prepared to explain why disclosure to the government should not be permitted. Superior Court subpoenas now include a section in which the court may record its approval under Brown.

Finally, Brown applies to the government as well, including grand jury subpoenas. Thus, counsel should carefully check how the government gets its information, especially information about the client.

H. Transcripts in Related Proceedings

If evidence relating to the case under investigation has been adduced in some other judicial proceeding, the transcript should be obtained.[2] If the transcript has not been prepared, appointed counsel may move for its preparation at government expense. See 18 U.S.C. § 3006A; D.C. Code § 11-2605(b); Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956). As a result of the change to the confidentiality of juvenile case records laws, defense counsel may now order transcripts of juvenile proceedings. See D.C. Code § 16-2331(a)(4), (b)(6).

I. Tangible Evidence

Tangible evidence must be found and preserved immediately. Potential tangible evidence depends upon the type of crime: crimes of violence and weapon offenses usually involve a physical object such as a gun or knife; burglaries and housebreaking usually involve some sign of entry or use of implements; forgeries and frauds may involve credit card receipts or other business records bearing signatures. In addition, fingerprints, footprints, tire marks, clothing, and hair and blood samples may be found. The proceeds of a crime are also important. Many of these items may be in the custody of the government, and counsel may become aware of them at an early stage or in discovery proceedings; nevertheless, counsel should go to the crime scene immediately and attempt to preserve any tangible evidence by photograph or otherwise. Counsel and the investigator must avoid disrupting the integrity of the evidence or otherwise making it unavailable. Request a viewing letter from the prosecutor that authorizes you and your investigator to inspect, copy, and photograph evidence.

Tangible evidence tending to corroborate the defendant's testimony may be found at the defendant's home or through defense witnesses. An alibi, for example, may be corroborated with time cards, purchase receipts or ticket stubs. Much of this evidence may be destroyed or misplaced if not promptly obtained. If evidence cannot be preserved for trial, photographs should be taken.

[2] Counsel must obtain a court order for transcripts of juvenile proceedings.

Tangible Evidence:

- ✓ Tangible evidence must be found and preserved immediately
- ✓ Request a viewing letter from the prosecutor that authorizes you and your investigator to inspect, copy, and photograph evidence

J. Forensic Experts

During discovery, counsel should request copies of all reports of scientific examinations and tests that have been done or pending in connection with the government's investigation, and talk to the experts who prepared the reports.

Autopsy Reports: In murder cases, the autopsy reports may be obtained from the medical examiner's office, located next to the D.C. Jail (19th St. & Massachusetts Avenue, S.E.). The medical examiner will meet with counsel to review the report and accompanying photographs.

Ballistics Reports: Ballistics examinations are done by Metropolitan Police Department ("MPD"), 300 Indiana Avenue, N.W., Room 1064. The officer who conducted the tests will explain the tests and the results to counsel. Ballistics tests may be done on clothing as well as bullets and guns.

Serology, Metallurgy and Other Reports: Serology, metallurgy, and other reports may be created by the FBI. The FBI special agents will also discuss the results of their tests and explain their reports to counsel before trial. The FBI building is on Pennsylvania Avenue between 9th and 10th Streets, N.W. Counsel should ask the agents about any notes they prepared, which they often keep even after they finalize their reports.

Doctors, although more difficult to reach, generally will meet with defense counsel. Other tests commonly conducted are fingerprint comparisons and handwriting analyses. These are administered by both MPD and the FBI.

K. Police Reports

Police reports available to the public include: offense reports (PD 251), which can be easily located with a Criminal Complaint Report (CCR) number; and traffic accident reports (PD 10). The PD 251 and PD 10 may be obtained for $2 in Room 3061, at the Municipal Center, 300 Indiana Avenue, N.W. Other police reports may be disclosed in discovery or become available during trial as Jencks material, such as the PD 81 (lists property recovered/seized); PD 252 (lists witnesses' names and addresses); PD 163 (witnesses' names, narrative of events, background information provided by client); PD 379 (juvenile counterpart to the PD 163); PD 124 (results of doctor's examination in sex cases); PD 120 (death report); PD 255 (arrest report); PD 668 (crime scene examination report); PD 313 (arrestee injury report), PD 42 (officer injury report), and PD 99 (citizen complaint form).

A computer print-out (PD 258) of initial communications concerning a reported crime may be obtained by a subpoena duces tecum to the Chief of Police or an authorized delegate served upon Ms. Cheyenne Curtis in room 3055 at 300 Indiana Avenue. The print-out often contains the description of the suspect relayed in the 911 call, and may contain witnesses' names and addresses. A computer print-out of the ambulance communications may be obtained by a subpoena duces tecum to the D.C. Fire Chief.

L. The Case File

Valuable information about the case is often found in the court files of witnesses and co-defendants. Counsel should locate and inspect the files, and photocopy important documents such as the indictment, information, and arrest warrant with supporting affidavit. All papers in the file should be examined closely for useful information such as the names of government witnesses, prior or current addresses and contacts.

M. Search Warrants

In superior court, executed search and arrest warrants are recorded in a log in Room 4002 chronologically by when the warrant was issued and the person or premises in question, with a cross-referenced alphabetical file under the defendant's name. Copies of the supporting affidavit may be obtained from the clerk. In district court, warrants are catalogued by Magistrate's Docket Number, which can be obtained in Room 1426; the supporting affidavit may be located there or in the file in Room 1622.

II. INVESTIGATORS

While some fact investigation can and should be done by the attorney, the bulk of the investigation, especially the interviewing of government witnesses, should be performed by an investigator, alone or with counsel.[3]

To find a certified CJA investigator, got to www.cjadc.org and have certified investigators apply to work on your case. If you need log-in assistance, please e-mail Brendan Wells at bwells@pdsdc.org.

A. Contacting Witnesses

The investigator must proceed carefully in contacting witnesses. For various reasons, witnesses may prefer not to become involved in a criminal case or to furnish information to the defense. Some witnesses, such as the client's family members or close friends, are more likely to be helpful and willing to testify. Witnesses should not be interviewed on the telephone; indeed, contacting a potentially hostile witness over the telephone frequently results in refusal of an interview. The initial contact should be in person, and the investigator should be fully prepared and aware that this interview may be the only interview the witness will allow.

[3] The Criminal Justice Act, D.C. Code § 11-2605, provides for compensation for investigative services rendered to court-appointed counsel. Counsel may incur expenses up to $100.00 without prior court authorization, as provided in the statute, although ratification of the expenditure is set forth in the Plan for Furnishing Representation to Indigents (1974). Counsel should obtain a voucher for investigative services from the DSO Office immediately after appointment.

Sources that may aid in locating witnesses are listed in Appendix B. These lists are not exclusive; imagination is often the key to finding witnesses. The investigator should also go to the place of the crime, preferably at the time of day the event occurred, and inquire of people in the vicinity. There may have been talk in the neighborhood about the offense, and the police will probably have conducted a similar canvass. When looking for defense witnesses, it may be useful to have the defendant accompany the investigator. The place of the interview is likely to affect whether the witness will speak freely. The investigator should attempt to contact the witness at home, preferably in the evening. The witness will have more time, may feel more relaxed and secure, and may therefore be more generous about giving information. The investigator should attempt to interview the witness when the witness is alone, because the presence of other people often inhibits the flow of information.

B. Informing Witness of Investigator's Identity

Countless problems can be avoided if the investigator is properly identified as a defense investigator. The witness should never be led to believe that the investigator is a government official or is acting in any capacity other than as a defense representative. Proper identification is essential to the credibility of the investigator and the work-product. Any suggestion or appearance of deception may compromise the integrity of the defense position. Upon contacting a witness, the investigator should identify him/herself, and state the name of the attorney for whom the investigator is working and the purpose of the contact. The investigator should give the witness a business card with both the investigator's and the attorney's name and title on it. If a written statement is taken, it should include a paragraph, at the beginning, indicating that the witness knows that it is being given to a defense investigator. Another safeguard is the use of an "Identification of Investigator" form on which the witness acknowledges having spoken to or having given a statement to the investigator. A standard form may read:

> _____, an investigator, has spoken to me / interviewed me / taken a signed statement from me, and stated that this was at the request of _____, Esq., court-appointed attorney for the defendant / respondent in United States v. _____ / In re [initials only], No. _____.
> Name _____

C. Child or Mentally-Impaired Witnesses

Before interviewing a child or a witness with a mental impairment, the investigator should determine whether the witness has the intellectual capacity to understand the questions that will be asked. It is also imperative to determine whether or not the witness comprehends who the investigator is and whom the investigator represents. If the investigator is unsure how much the witness is really able to understand, it may be safer and wiser to interview the witness in the presence of a family member or a neutral person. The opening paragraph of any written statement should reflect the presence of the third party. The closing paragraph should indicate that the statement was read to the third party, who should also be asked to sign both the statement and the identification of investigator form.

Provide detailed instructions/guidance to your investigator before they interview a child witness.

D. Reluctant Witnesses

Government witnesses are often reluctant to speak with defense representatives. The investigator should probe such reluctance and seek to persuade the witness to consent to the interview, stressing that the defense is only trying to learn the truth about what happened. The investigator's demeanor is critical. The witness can be advised that he or she may be subpoenaed for trial by the prosecution or defense whether or not an interview is obtained. If the witness feels that he or she is a prosecution witness and hence should not talk to the opposing party, the investigator should inquire whether this attitude has been fostered by the police or prosecutor. See Gregory v. United States, 369 F.2d 185 (D.C. Cir. 1966). The investigator should tell the witness that it is improper and unlawful for a government representative to advise a witness not to speak to the defense or to speak to the defense only in the prosecutor's presence, and that the witness has an absolute right to speak to both sides. In re J.W., 763 A.2d 1129 (D.C. 2000), the court of appeals reversed the trial court's order precluding the DEA chemist from testifying as a sanction for the chemist's refusal to talk to defense counsel without a prosecutor present. A witness may, on his or her own initiative, refuse to talk to defense counsel, but a prosecutor may not take steps to block private interviews. Here there was no showing of government interference and no showing that the chemist acted on order of his superiors, therefore no sanction should have been imposed. If the witness still refuses to speak, the investigator should prepare a memorandum of the attempts and the circumstances of the refusal, including the details of any instructions or "hints" the witness may have received from police or government representatives. A statement from the witness describing any instructions or "hints" might prove useful in an attempt to establish a Gregory violation and subsequently obtain sanctions as a result.

E. Taking a Statement

As a rule, the investigator should obtain written statements from potential government witnesses whenever possible. See supra Section I.D regarding statements by potential defense witnesses. Written statements may be used at trial to refresh recollection, to impeach credibility, and possibly as substantive evidence under the doctrine of past recollection recorded or statement against interest.

The witness initially should be asked to describe, in a narrative fashion, what the witness knows or saw. During the narrative, the investigator should assess the witness's perceptions, memory, ability to articulate, and probable impact on a trier of fact. The investigator should then probe every detail of the account and anything else the witness may know. Has the witness had any prior contact with the accused or the accused's family or friends? If so, bias may be revealed. Jencks Act foundation questions should be asked. Every contact between the witness and the police, prosecutors or any other government representatives should be elicited. Where was the contact made? What did they ask? Did they take notes? Was a signed statement given? Did the witness testify before the grand jury? Has witness been subpoenaed?

Other standard questions include, "What have you heard?" "Who else was on the scene before, during and after the offense?" "Who else would know?" "If you were me, how would you find _____?" "What would you do?" "Where would you go?" "Who did you tell about what happened?"

After obtaining all the details from the government witness, the investigator should write out a statement.[4] This may be time consuming, but many witnesses will refuse to sign statements presented to them at a later time. The statement should be in the first person and in the witness's words. It should begin with an identification passage, such as:

> "I am Jean Doe, and I live at 9876 J Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. My social security number is 111-11-1111 and my date of birth is 11/11/11. I am giving this statement to Joe Doe Investigator (and the names of others who are present – Relevant when dealing with child witnesses or when possible competency issues may later arise) who works for [attorney] who is assigned to represent [defendant's name] at [date and time of interview] at [location of interview, e.g., living room of my home].

While the statement is being written, the investigator should ask follow-up questions to clarify ambiguities and add detail. The statement should be as complete as possible, containing every fact and detail the witness has perceived or heard, whether favorable or not. Equally important, the statement should memorialize the fact that certain important details or facts were not perceived or are otherwise beyond the witness's knowledge. For example, if the witness says an assailant had a mustache, the investigator should ask, "Did you notice anything else about the face? Once the witness acknowledges that certain information constitutes the extent of his or her knowledge, it is essential to record all that the witness does not remember, for impeachment in the event that the witness later embellishes the account. The statement should be written in the witness's own words (including slang used by the witness). The final statement should read as if the witness has written it himself or herself. For instance, "Then I noticed that the guy robbing me had a gun" as opposed to "Then the witness said she noticed the robber had a gun."

When the statement is complete, the witness must be permitted to adopt it. The investigator should review the statement with the witness, ask the witness to read along while the investigator reads the statement aloud, ask the witness to make corrections, deletions and additions, initial all changes, and sign or initial at the bottom of each page. The statement should conclude with a sentence such as, "I have read or have had read to me this X-page statement. I have had the opportunity to make and initial any changes, additions, deletions and corrections I desired. This statement is true, accurate and complete to the best of my knowledge." By reading the statement aloud while the witness reads along, the investigator may put the witness at ease and avoid later problems arising from ambiguous sentence construction and poor handwriting. If the witness does not wish to read the completed statement, the investigator should read it aloud, ask if it is correct, and get the witness to sign or initial the bottom of each page. The witness should also initial any words that are crossed out or changed. If the witness refuses to adopt the statement after it is read aloud, the investigator should ask why and at least obtain an oral adoption and a statement that there are no inaccuracies. These attempts should be made even if the witness asks that the investigator have a statement typed for signature later; in reality a second interview is likely to be refused.

F. Written Reports From Investigators

After the investigator interviews a witness, the investigator should prepare a memorandum detailing the "environment" in which the interview took place. These details should include what the witness was wearing, what the inside of the house looked like, who was home and what they looked like, any pets, any phone calls, any food/beverages offered or accepted and what each investigator was wearing. In the event that the witness subsequently denies the visit from the investigator or knowledge of the statement or claims it was forced, these details can be used on cross-examination to confirm and/or corroborate that the circumstances surrounding the statement were voluntary.

The investigator should prepare a separate memorandum to aid in locating the witness for trial. This includes home and work addresses, telephone numbers of the witness, close friends and relatives, places where the witness and friends congregate, and a physical description of the witness. The witness should be given counsel's business card and asked to contact counsel if he or she moves or plans to move.

A written record should be kept of all investigative activity on a case, including unsuccessful attempts to locate witnesses. This may be especially important should a dispute arise over the appropriateness of a missing witness instruction and counsel's diligence in attempting to locate the person.

The desirability of other written reports from investigators should be evaluated carefully in light of the reverse Jencks rule.

G. Interviewing Police Officers

Police officers are a special class of witnesses. Except for the newest of rookies, most officers have testified before and are aware of the consequences of speaking with a defense investigator. For this and other reasons, some attorneys prefer to interview police officers themselves in the presence of an investigator. If the investigator is assigned to interview police officers, the investigator should be instructed to interview the principal officers: the detective in charge of the investigation; any officers who spoke to witnesses, at the scene or later; the arresting officer and that officer's partner (regarding defendant's statements and condition, and witnesses' comments and condition); and officers who collected or analyzed evidence. If any officer refuses to discuss the case, the investigator should explore the reasons, e.g., desire to speak first to the prosecutor or a supervisor, or an "office policy." The investigator should offer to return after such consultation or offer the prosecutor's telephone number. Any reluctance to discuss a case and the reasons should be noted.

If the officer will talk, the investigator should elicit the exact location and time of arrest, the manner of effectuating the arrest, and the facts that caused the officer to make the arrest. The investigator should determine whether the client was interrogated and gave any statements or confessions, what the police told the client about the incident, and the complete circumstances of any identification. The investigator should ask whether the officer has interviewed any witnesses and preserved the notes of those interviews, whether the officer has shown photographs to any witness, the results of any identification procedures, and whether any tangible evidence was recovered. The investigator should also ask for the names of other officers involved in the case. Needless to say, the investigator should be reminded not to give out any information to police officers about the client.

H. Self-Incrimination Problems

The investigator may encounter a witness whose statement incriminates the witness in the crime being investigated or some other crime. "It is not necessary for defense counsel or defense counsel's investigator, in interviewing a prospective witness, to caution the witness concerning possible self-incrimination and the need for counsel." See ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, 4-4.3 (The Defense Function, commentary) (1980). If the problem can be anticipated, the decision whether the investigator should discuss the self-incrimination problem with the witness is made by the attorney, bearing in mind that it is proper but not mandatory for the lawyer or the investigator to caution the witness concerning possible self-incrimination and the need for counsel. Id. Ordinarily, an investigator should be instructed that if self-incrimination problems surface for the first time during an interview, the interview should proceed without warnings. If, however, the witness asks a question—such as "could this statement be used against me?"—the investigator may not mislead or deceive. In this as any other context, counsel is responsible for any ethical violations by the investigator. Thus, it is essential to instruct the investigator fully on the ethical obligations of the defense and the importance of the investigator's deference to these obligations.

Three factors must be considered when a party seeks to introduce a statement against penal interest as an exception to the hearsay rule: (1) whether the declarant, in fact, made a statement against penal interest; (2) whether the declarant is unavailable; and (3) what corroborating circumstances exist as an indication of the statement's trustworthiness. Laumer v. United States, 409 A.2d 190 (D.C. 1979). One factor in determining whether the statement is trustworthy is the timing of the statement; if it was made close in time to the offense, there would be less opportunity for reflection and fabrication. Also relevant is the relationship between the witness and the declarant, and whether or not the declarant was immediately aware of the consequences of the statement.

If the witness may not be available at trial, it may be best to inform the witness of possible exposure to criminal prosecution as a result of the content of the statement. It is extremely important to include the witness's awareness of that possibility in the statement, with a sentence such as, "I know just admitting that _____ could get me in trouble, but I still want to give this statement." That sentence could be critical in getting the statement admitted at trial should the witness later assert a privilege against self-incrimination.

I. Instructing the Investigator

In most cases, the investigator should know as much about the case as the attorney before the investigation is even started. This is best achieved through a written memorandum containing all the relevant information and specific instructions, together with copies of any reports or documents that have been obtained.

The investigator should be carefully briefed on the defense theory and all relevant facts to be uncovered. If eyewitness identifications may be in issue at trial, the investigator must be aware of the Wade-Stovall-Brathwaite doctrine, and be fully prepared to elicit facts revealing suggestive procedures and other circumstances bearing on reliability and independent source. In addition, the investigator should ask each eyewitness every question, which might be useful on cross-examination at trial. If the defense may be self-defense, the investigator should be briefed on the kinds of evidence that may be used to show that the defendant feared the alleged victim or that the latter was the actual aggressor. If there is a suppression issue, the investigator must know what the issues at the hearing may be—time of arrest, consent, scope of the search, etc.—and what facts are relevant.

In many cases, the investigator should be given a checklist or a list of questions for key witnesses. Counsel should never assume that an investigator will uncover the needed information without guidance. After the investigator has read all the written material, counsel should discuss any questions the investigator has about the case. The investigator should be cautioned not to give government witnesses any indication of the defense theory or anticipated tactics, or to reveal any client secrets. Especially with a new investigator, the attorney should review in detail the intended interviews with the witnesses, including what questions should be asked and which witnesses should be subpoenaed.

INVESTIGATION CHECKLIST

1. Investigative memo

2. PD 251 (at district, or Room 3075, 300 Indiana Avenue, N.W.). Information, affidavit in support of warrant, complaint, Gerstein (court jacket). Criminal history of defendant (300 Indiana Avenue, N.W., Room 2076).

3. Subpoenas to MPD Room 3061
   a. PD 258 (computer printout)
   b. PD 106 (lookout)
   c. Client's photos (color arrest photo and black and white mug shot)
   d. Ambulance runs (Fire Department, not MPD) – within 30 days to obtain tape-recording on all calls – NOTE, you must provide blank cassette)
   e. Radio run

4. Scene
   a. Visit – photos, diagram, location of street lights
   b. Obtain weather information (raining, snowing, sunrise, sunset)

5. Interview witnesses
   a. Government (take complete, detailed, accurate statements and obtain release of records)
   b. Defense (subpoena, get information to locate again, phone numbers, addresses, work hours, dates of birth, etc.)

6. Discovery
   a. Viewing letter for evidence
   b. Autopsy reports
   c. Hospital records
   d. Reports of examinations/tests (FBI and MPD) – ballistics, fingerprints, serology, metallurgy, handwriting, etc.
   e. Photographs
   f. Diagrams
   g. Radio run
   h. Police reports (PD 163, PD 379 (for juvenile cases), PD 81, PD 47, PD 251)

7. Review and carefully examine all physical evidence

8. Gather as much information as possible about government witnesses
   a. Check criminal records (superior court, district court, and surrounding jurisdictions)
   b. Copy all case jackets
   c. School records
   d. Work records
   e. Probation/parole records

f. Hospital records
g. Military records
h. Rental records

9. Obtain defense materials
   a. Transcripts
   b. Retain independent experts (ballistics, fingerprint, handwriting, etc.)

10. Subpoena Office of General Counsel of MPD for any pending civilian complaints against all police officers. Sandra Freeburn or any designee (Room 3061) is authorized to receive the subpoena.

Arrange to pick up client's clothing at D.C. Jail within 15 days, if needed as evidence.

APPENDIX B

I. CRIMINAL INFORMATION

A. Superior Court Criminal Records

For adult cases, you may retrieve a complete criminal record check for individuals charged under the D.C. Criminal Code from the Superior Court Adult Criminal Records Division. This Division is located at:

Superior Court of the District of Columbia
500 Indiana Avenue, NW
Rooms 4000, 4001, 4019, and 4110
Monday – Friday: 9:00 a.m. – 4:00 p.m.
General Information: (202) 879-1010

Closed Felony, Misdemeanor, and D.C. Traffic Cases can be found in Room 4001 of Superior Court. This office is open Monday – Friday, 9:00 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., and can be reached at (202) 879-1373.

Open Felony, Misdemeanor, and D.C. Traffic cases can be found in Room 4000 of Superior Court. This office is open Monday – Friday, 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m., and can be reached at (202) 879-1353.

The Division has an accessible court computer, located in Room 4001, which reflects all criminal cases since 1974. You can get PDID numbers, docket numbers, as well as the disposition of a case by running the case or docket number in the computer. To obtain the information about an individual's prior and pending cases you need at least an accurate name, a PDID number, or a date of birth.

Using the client name, PDID number or docket number you may obtain either a criminal history printout or a case summary printout. A criminal history printout provides a list of a person's past and pending criminal cases, and it includes docket numbers, counts and information on the disposition of the case. Case summary printouts include date, the next pending court date if the case is still active and the judge assigned to the case. To check an individual's criminal record you normally want to request the PDID and case summary printouts on all pending cases and prior convictions.

1. Criminal Case Jackets

Jackets contain pre-trial service reports with names, addresses, employer, friends, and prior record information, all of which can boost your investigative efforts. Jackets also contain all the motions and papers filed during a case.

Closed adult case jackets are available in Room 4001, Criminal Information, of D.C. Superior Court. You need to fill out a green card, (available on the counter), with the date, the defendant's name, your name and telephone number, and where the file is going and why. Give this card to the attendant and they will pull the file for you. You may only order three at a time, especially if the office is busy. You are not allowed to take the case jackets out of the room, except to copy them. Please remember to place all documents back in their proper order after copies are made.

If a case is more than five years old, it may be stored in the record center in Suitland, Maryland. You may order it in Criminal Information with the order form provided at the desk, or arrange to go out to Suitland to view the file. It takes at least five business days for the records to arrive from Suitland.

Open adult felony, misdemeanor or D.C. traffic case jackets are found in the Case Management Branch (Room 4000), and you can request the case by filling out a green card including the following information: the jacket number, what stage the case is in (e.g., pending sentencing, set for trial), when the next court date is and the name of the judge that the case is before. All of this information is contained in the case summary printout available in Room 4001, as described above.

2. Superior Court Juvenile Criminal Records

While only some clients may have juvenile records, you often need to know whether a juvenile record exists. This information will not be contained within the Pretrial Services Report, nor will it come up on Courtview. Juvenile records will, however, be reported on the pre-sentence report and will be considered by the sentencing judge. Due to the privacy rights of juvenile and various protections within that system, you must obtain a judge's permission to inspect/search for that information. There is special family division form for this captioned: APPLICATION FOR INSPECTION/COPYING OF RECORDS. Fill out that form and have a judge sign off on it (your attorney should handle this). Then, take the form to the juvenile clerk's office and give it to a clerk who will search for the file and give it to you to review in that office. Your attorney will most likely do this, but it could help you to be familiar with the process.

The Juvenile Clerks will usually only release information directly to attorneys. However, this is the process: take the completed and approved form to the juvenile clerk's office (Room 4310 – located in the east wing of the 4th floor, down the corridor to your left), and give the form to a juvenile clerk. Be sure to bring your client's social file number and/or his or her date of birth with you.

Juvenile files come in two parts. There is a case relating to the respondent (a.k.a. defendant). The case file will have a docket number (e.g., 2007 DEL 000094) and will contain pleadings and disposition forms relating to that case. The second file, called the social file, will have a six-digit number and will contain all social reports and disposition reports relating to all of the respondent's cases. Both files should be kept in the same place.

Take notes and/or make copies of the files. If there's a social report in the file that says great things about your client and/or explains his or her involvement with the criminal system, copy it and note the social worker's name and number.

3. Criminal Finance Office

a. Travel arrangements for out-of-town witnesses and experts

Please follow these steps:

1. The judge must sign a subpoena (or issue an order) for the witness.

2. If Superior Court is paying for the expert witness's expert services fee, then the judge must write a separate order authorizing this payment, with the exact amounts and services written in the order.

3. Call Brenda Ford in the Criminal Finance Office of Superior Court at (202) 879-2813. Bring her the judge-signed subpoena and any tentative flight information and/or itineraries. It is beneficial to work out these details ahead of time with the witness. Ms. Ford is located at 600 H Street, NW, Suite 600. The office itself is in Gallery Place. Enter the building and go to the 2nd floor. Go through the double glass doors, sign in, and take the elevator to the 6th floor. From there, the receptionist will call Ms. Ford, and Ms. Ford will let you come in. Make sure to call Ms. Ford first to let her know you are coming. Ms. Ford will make plane reservations for your witness, and Superior Court will pay for these plane tickets. Ms. Ford will take the pink copy of the subpoena even though it has not been served yet.

4. Superior Court will also pay for a hotel room, but not in advance. The witness will be reimbursed. So call a hotel and make a reservation under your witness's name. The Red Roof Inn at 500 H Street, NW, is nearest the courthouse, which is good because Superior Court will not pay for transportation to and from the courthouse. Call (800) RED-ROOF or (202) 289-5959. Ask for the government rate if available, and see if it is the least expensive. Ms. Ford also suggests the Hampton Inn. Your witness must call by 6:00 p.m. the night of check-in and provide a credit card number, or the reservation will be cancelled. (You can hold it on your card, but then the reservation is on you.) Ask the hotel to give you a reservation confirmation number.

5. Fax the witness the airline itinerary and hotel itinerary. Explain to the witness that they will have to pay for the hotel and hold the reservation with a credit card. The witness should also know to bring the itinerary and photo ID to pick up plane tickets at the airport. The witness should keep all receipts of transportation expenses to and from the airport, and from the hotel.

6. When the witness arrives, subpoena the witness using the subpoena that was signed by the judge. Keep the yellow copy, and tell the witness to keep the top copy at all times – the witness will need the subpoena to get reimbursed for hotel and ground transportation expenses.

7. The attorney must fill out a witness voucher, and write in capital letters at the top: FOR TRAVEL EXPENSES ONLY. Witnesses are advised to keep track of all mileage and to submit an invoice for any parking fees from the airport as well. This will also be handled at the Finance Office on the 4th Floor. Any fact witnesses brought in are entitled to the $40.00/day.

8. The witness will go to the Finance Office on the fourth floor of Superior Court to claim this reimbursement. The witness should bring all receipts (including hotel), the witness voucher, and the subpoena. The witness will need one voucher for each day he or she was here.

9. In the case of payment for an expert, a separate voucher from the Finance Office of Superior Court is required (along with a court order). Note: all vouchers for expert services must be preauthorized by the Court, and will require a court order from the judge assigned the case.

District Court
Civil Files and Copies
Room 1225
3rd and Constitution Avenues, NW
(202) 354-3120

District court records include both federal and D.C. convictions, and you need at least a full name to retrieve the records. It is best if you have a middle initial or date of birth to confirm you have the correct person. To perform a complete record check on a person you need to be sure you check for any possible cases in district court. They have both civil and criminal dockets, dating before 1972.

Any federal offense is tried in district court. To look up the records, go to the criminal information desk, located on the west side of the building on the first floor, and use the computer located there. There is an instructional sheet next to the computer explaining the procedure. Take that information to Room 1225 and request to see the case jackets. Be aware many of the cases are on microfilm and microfiche.

C. Maryland Criminal Records

The following website includes cases in all circuit courts in Maryland and all Maryland district courts: http://casesearch.courts.state.md.us/inquiry/processDisclaimer.jsp.

(301) 952-3240 (civil)
*Have open and closed criminal cases dating back to 1977

Important to note: If you are trying to retrieve records that are too old to be filed in circuit court criminal records in Maryland (PG County) you may need to try Central Files. PG County Courthouse has a criminal records computer that contains information on anyone who has had a Maryland district court case. It will provide you with the statewide records including criminal, civil and traffic case information. In the traffic case information, address, DOB and SSN information is included. However, to gain any of this information you will need a district court case number.

II. LAW ENFORCEMENT/POLICE RESOURCES

A. Metropolitan Police Department

Headquarters: 300 Indiana Avenue, NW

To get the most up to date telephone numbers for all divisions of the Metropolitan Police Department, visit their website at http://www.mpdc.dc.gov.

1. Police Reports (PD 251's)

Public Documents Section – Room 3075
Monday – Friday: 7:00 a.m. – 3:30 p.m.
(202) 727-4357

You may pick up copies of police reports (PD 251's) and traffic accident reports (PD 10's) at the counter in Room 3075, MPD Headquarters, by filling out the form entitled "Request for Copy of a Police Report." The PD 251 will have the name and address of the complainant. Initially, it can be viewed at the police station in the district of the arrest for up to 90 days after the incident. If you go to a district seeking a PD 251, make sure that you ask to view it. At some point (usually after 90 days) it will be sent downtown, and can be obtained in Room 3075, 300 Indiana Avenue, NW. To get a PD 251, you need the CCR number (sometimes called the CCN) which can be obtained from the court jacket, Courtview, investigative memo, lock-up list, or in the arrest log at the District in which the arrest was made. The date, location and type of offense will also be used to locate a 251.

If you cannot wait until the report is transferred to police headquarters, then go look at the PD 251 at the actual District Station where the arrest was processed. Ask at the front desk of the station to view the report and give them the CCR number. This is public information so they must allow you access to it, although explaining it to them may have negative results. Make sure you have a copy of the letter from MPD general counsel stating that the report is to be made available to the public (letter can be found in the Internship Coordinator's Office). You will need to bring a legal pad with you to transfer/copy the information by hand since they will not photocopy it for you.

If the MPD employee working the desk at the District denies you access to the PD 251, ask for the detective who worked on the case. The detective should have a copy. If the detective is unavailable or denies you access, ask for the Supervisor. Make sure to take names and badge numbers of everyone you have dealt with and provide them, along with exactly what was said, to the attorney.

Homicide PD 251's can also be obtained from:

Det. Sgt. Jeffery P. Christy
Violent Crimes Branch
Homicide Division
3244 Pennsylvania Avenue, SE
(202) 645-9600
(202) 645-5368 (direct)

If you are unable to get a PD 251 through the normal route, you can try:

Delores Hunter
(202) 727-5516

2. Statistics of Criminal Activity by Location

Call Steve Reuben at (202) 727-5453. He is an MPD statistician and can provide a breakdown of crimes by type and location, e.g., the number of drug offense in a particular block.

You can also try Brenda Eich in MPD Research and Analysis Division for Drug Statistics at (202) 727-4174. To preserve this resource, please find non-drug crime statistics at www.mpdc.dc.gov, Crime Statistics. If you need MPD drug offense statistics, please use one of the contacts above.

Any other evidence or information in the possession of MPD

All other information or evidence can be obtained by a subpoena addressed to Chief of Police, Cathy Lanier or Authorized Designate, MPD, 300 Indiana Avenue, NW, Washington, D.C. 20001. It will be accepted on her behalf in Room 3075, Monday – Friday, 7:00 a.m. – 3:30 p.m. You will also need to pick up your information from the same room, allowing at least five business days to comply.

*You MUST be certain the subpoena that you deliver is dated to allow five business days to comply or they WILL NOT take it unless the subpoena is signed by a judge.

*Anyone in Room 3075 can accept subpoena service. If they refuse, take the subpoena to the MPD General Counsel's Office, Room 4125, and serve them.

3. Full Color Arrest Photographs

Subpoena is to be served at 300 Indiana Avenue, NW, Room 3075, and should indicate the date and time the photograph was taken, PDID and DOB of individual. Allow five business days from the date of the request before picking up the photo at the same location.

4. Mug Shots

The subpoenas should be served at 300 Indiana Avenue, NW, Room 3075. Write on the subpoena that you are requesting any and all photographs that were taken on [date], along with the individual's PDID and DOB. MPD will not release a photo of a juvenile.

If you receive a subpoena back from MPD with a note of either "Photos not on File," "No Photo available," or "No Photo available, please resubmit," this means that the photos may not have been received by the gallery as of yet, and are still at the lab or the negative is in poor condition. Therefore, you should submit another subpoena to MPD with the words "2nd subpoena – resubmitted upon request of the photo gallery" written at the top of the subpoena. Only in situations where the words "No Photo taken," should you believe that there are no photos available.

5. 911 Calls & Radio Runs

1. Subpoena should be made out to: Custodian of Records, Office of Unified Communication (OUC), 2720 Martin Luther King, Jr., Avenue, SE, Washington, D.C.

2. You will need the date, location and time of incident as well as the CCN and the offense.

3. Wording: any and all PD 258 (event chronology), 911 calls and radio runs relating to offense: _____CCN: _____ near _____ between the time _____ on _____.

4. All subpoenas must be hand delivered.

6. Arrest/CCN Log

Each District station keeps a log of all of the arrests made in that District each day. It includes such information as the CCN, and the date and location of the arrest. This is helpful in locating a PD 251 in an emergency. You will need the date and type of incident. These logs, regardless if it's electronic or paper, are public. Bring with you the letter from MPD General Counsel indicating that the logs should be made available (letters can be obtained from the Internship Coordinator).

7. Cameras – CCTV (Closed Circuit TV)

To obtain footage, call or email Michael Eldrige at (202) 724-4483 or michael.eldrige@dc.gov. Let him know what footage you would like to have saved and he is supposed to save it so that you can then request it through FOIA. They only keep records for 10 days, unless you tell them to preserve it. If footage has been saved as evidence, he should let you know and then it becomes discoverable and you have to ask for it. Email date/time/camera number/CCN. Issue a subpoena to MPD just so your attorney has it as backup.

8. ShotSpotter

ShotSpotter systems are new to the District and are used to track and monitor gunfire. Sensors, about the size of coffee cans, detect the sound of gunfire within two miles. The system pinpoints the location of gunfire. It also determines if the shooter is moving and calculates the direction and speed of travel. Audio is immediately and permanently archived for forensic analysis or court proceedings. Software distinguishes gunfire from such noises as car backfires so police don't respond to false alarms.

Subpoenas for information regarding Shotspotters should be directed to MPD (Custodian of Records, etc...). Requests should include:

- Where ShotSpotter devices are located in the vicinity of the alleged shooting we are defending.

- Any documents, reports, general orders, special orders, or memorandum related to our shooting at the time of the incident.

- Any research pertaining to the accuracy, reliability, failure rate, etc., of these devices.

- Manuals, handbooks, general orders or special orders pertaining to these devices.

- Information pertaining to the training of the FBI/MPD related to use of this technology.

ShotSpotter, Inc., may also have information regarding these devices (www.shotspotter.com). Contact Gregg Rowland, Senior Vice President, at:

3515 Ryder Street
Santa Clara, CA 95051
Office: (408) 329-9219
Fax: (408) 608-0340
gregg@shotspotter.com

9. Patrol System Book (PSS Book)

There is a log in each station listing each patrol car on duty during each shift and who was assigned to which car. This is helpful if you need to find out which officers were on the scene and you only have the patrol car numbers from the radio run. You should go to the District and look at the book or you can subpoena this information at 300 Indiana Avenue, NW, Room 3055 or 3075.

10. Police Property Office ((202) 645-0133)

All evidence recovered by the police is sent to 2235 Shannon Place, SE. If you wish to examine any piece of evidence, your attorney will obtain a letter from the prosecutor, authorizing you to do so. Please retain a copy of that letter for your file. You must know the name of the defendant and the date that the evidence was recovered or seized, and the property control number, which the attorney gets from the prosecutor.

Approximately one week before trial, evidence is moved to the C-Level of the Courthouse, or Room 4105, 4th Floor.

The MPD Property Office requires that a viewing letter provided by the government to the defense attorney must have been issued within 30 days. If the viewing letter is more than 30 days old, the attorney will not be given access to the evidence. If the viewing letter has expired, contact assigned attorney. If not available, call Lt. Deborah Howard at (202) 645-0130. She may be able to help.

11. PD 120, Death Report, a.k.a. "Blue Sheet"

This is a report filed in all homicide cases by the homicide detectives. It has quite a bit of important information, as well as a fairly detailed description of the initial police investigation.

Some of the information on the report includes the decedent's full name, DOB, address, gender, race and age. The report also notes the location, the time and the date of the death. The name, address and telephone number of the decedent's next of kin can also be found here. The police detail whether the decedent is a known drug addict or alcoholic, and if it is known whether drugs or alcohol intoxicated the decedent at the time of death.

Investigators usually cannot obtain copies of the PD 120. Attorneys should ask for a copy in discovery, or should subpoena MPD for a copy. As a last resort, a copy of the PD 120 may be obtained from the Medical Examiner's Office, as the ME is given a PD 120 in each case. You can try to subpoena this information, but again there are no guarantees.

12. Spot Check Cards: Citizen Contact Card (PD 106)

Each police District Station keeps the cards on file for officers that stop anyone engaged in suspicious activity. The cards contain information regarding the address of the stop, time of the stop, date of the stop, who was stopped, his or her address and DOB, why he or she was stopped, his or her description and a description of the vehicle, if any. The cards are kept by date. In addition, each District station keeps a juvenile contact forms, PD 379, which is analogous to the PD 106. However, the juvenile forms are kept in alphabetical order.

13. Parole Records

Take subpoenas to 300 Indiana Avenue, NW, Room 2100. The secretary will know exactly who accepts the subpoena. The subpoena should include the DCDC number and the person's name. You should request all parole information. However, you can be more specific if you know exactly what documents you want.

NOTE: To leave a message for a police officer, you will need to know the officer's name; it is not necessary to have the mailbox number.

16. Police Officer Assignments

Call the Police Locator Number at (202) 727-4410 to find out what district and shift a police officer works. This is the police personnel office. If you need to talk to or subpoena an officer, call the district where he or she works and ask when the officer is on duty.

To catch an officer at the station, you must show up either at the beginning or end of their shift. We have found the officers more willing to talk at the beginning of their shift then at the end. Shifts usually change around 7:00 a.m., 3:00 p.m., and 11:00 p.m., but these times vary from station to station. Call the day before you wish to meet with an officer to confirm his or her working schedule, including their days off.

The officers are usually in the station for thirty minutes, checking in before they hit the streets or checking out before they head for home. There is a period of about 5 or 10 minutes, just before they leave the station after roll call, during which you can talk to them. If you are told that an officer will be working from 3:00 p.m. to 11:00 p.m., find out if he or she will be in the station from 2:30 to 3:00 p.m., or from 3:00 p.m. to 3:30 p.m., and verify that the officer is in fact on duty and has not called in sick or been given a special assignment elsewhere. The officer assigned to the front counter will usually call the officer you need once you arrive.

Follow standard identification procedures with police officers as with other witnesses.

General Information: (202) 324-3000 or (202) 324-3447

The FBI may conduct fingerprint, hair and fiber tests for the Metropolitan Police Department. The names of the agents who complete the testing will be listed on the report given to the prosecutor, which is in turn given to the defense attorney. FBI agents are fairly cooperative and willing to discuss their findings with the defense over the telephone or in person. Attorneys should interview the agents. Undoubtedly the agents will describe their conversation with the defense to the prosecution.

C. United States Park Police

1100 Ohio Drive, SW
(202) 619-7310 (24 hours)
Records Section: (202) 619-7120
Monday – Friday: 8:00 a.m. – 4:00 p.m.

To obtain Park Police reports, you need the name of the defendant, the time and date of the incident and any other information you can get. You can subpoena copies of Park Police reports and interview Park Police officers here. Subpoenas should be made out to Chief, United States Park Police or Official designate. The Park Police have a 413 form for arrest reports. They also have 10343 forms, which are incident reporting forms for incidents such as auto theft, robbery etc. If the defendant is a juvenile, you must have a release form signed by the juvenile. There is a substation in Anacostia Park, but they will not turn over any records.

To submit FOIA requests for Park Police, contact Janine Tyson at (202) 619-7385. Her fax number is (202) 260-2869.

If you need to interview park police officers, they can be found at the substations.

District 5: Anacostia Suitland Parkway (202) 433-1000

*If you need to view evidence with Park Police, you will need to submit a viewing letter. Call Officer Hill at (202) 690-5074 and get further information.

E. U.S. Marshal Service

Subpoenas and FOIA requests can go to Greg Petchel, Assistant Chief of the USMS. His office is located on the C Level of Superior Court by the Marshals' Cell Block.

For questions, you can also contact Ronnie Bolls at (202) 626-2388.

F. Capitol Police

When requesting information from the records department of the Capitol Police you should first try submitting a letter of request on PDS letterhead. The letter should include the following: case name, attorney name, CCN, Capitol File Number, and any other information that will help them to locate the records. These letters can be taken by hand or faxed (see fax and telephone # below).

In the event that you are told you need to subpoena the information, the subpoena should be addressed to:

Custodian of Records
Capitol Police Headquarters
119 D Street, NE
Washington, D.C. 20510-7218

Contact: Sergeant Flanders (Records Department)
Fax: (202) 228-2188
Telephone: (202) 314-7200
6:30 a.m. – 3:30 p.m.

G. Metro Transit Police

Administrative Headquarters
600 5th Street, NW

Administration:
(202) 435-7575

Reports can be obtained at the Headquarters office. If you need to locate an officer, call the Foreign Missions Branch (202) 435-6000. (The Foreign Missions Branch is the branch in which most of the officers involved in arrests will belong to – they are the officers patrolling the city, mostly northwest.)

J. Special Police Officers and Security Guards

Reeves Building
14th and U Streets, NW
3rd Floor
Open: 8:00 – 2:00 p.m.

Their desire to help you varies greatly from agency to agency. Some will give you signed statements; some will not discuss the case at all. It is usually advisable not to call ahead. Just arrive at his or her place of employment and ask a fellow employee where to find the person you are looking for. Information concerning SPO's can be obtained at the following address:

Government Supply Accounting Office
4th and G/H Streets
Washington, D.C.

You can find out which SPO's are authorized to carry a handgun by presenting a subpoena to the Government Supply Accounting Office.

(202) 547-7822 (Command Center – will direct your call)
Medical Records: (202) 673-8458
Fax: (202) 673-8010

If you wish to visit an inmate during the day, either facility, park in the lot in front of the jail and walk in the front door. Do not stand in line, go to the guard at the desk and inform him or her you are on a legal visit. Show your CJA ID (two forms of ID – CJA ID and driver's license – will be required at CTF). The guard will search you and your bag and then send you through the metal detector. When you walk through the door, indicate to the person behind the glass how many people you wish to see. Sign in on the attorney register, and then fill out the forms given to you, one for each person you requested to see. Give the completed forms back to the guard, who will then confirm the person(s) you requested to see are still incarcerated. You may only see one person at a time. The forms will be returned to you. The entire system is now computerized and the person behind the glass will enter your name as a visitor on the computer, giving you a computer printout to take with you.

Once upstairs, give the forms to the guard inside the glass cubicle. This guard will note the names and return the forms to you. This guard controls the flow of visitors you request, therefore be aware of the length of time between visitors and alert him or her if it has been unreasonably lengthy. Remember that the inmates must sign their form upon conclusion of your meeting. You will give these forms to the guard downstairs on your way out.

At the D.C. Jail, if you wish to visit an inmate at night, after 8:00 p.m., or on the weekends, park near the guard tower in the back of the jail and tell them you wish to conduct a legal visit. They will let you walk in the back door. At this point, follow the same procedures outlined above.

The D.C. Jail has head counts of the inmates at 8:00 am, 3:00 p.m., 8:00 p.m., and every hour on the hour throughout the night everyday. (CTF has their counts at 10:00 a.m., 3:00 p.m., and 8:00 p.m. everyday). It is important to plan your visits around these counts because they last for upwards of one to two hours each. If you are inside the institution, you will have to wait until the count is over before you can see the person you wish to visit. The jail freezes so the inmates can all be accounted for. So make sure you are aware of these counts before you go and plan accordingly.

You must know the person's proper name and their District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DCDC) number to retrieve his or her records. The dates of their incarceration are helpful, but not mandatory.

If the person is or was housed at the jail, on parole, or in a halfway house, direct subpoenas to D.C. Department of Corrections General Counsel at 1923 Vermont Avenue, NW. Please call (202) 671-2042 first to ensure that someone will be there to collect your subpoena.

For Medical Records of a D.C. Jail resident, make the subpoena out to the Chief Medical Officer or authorized representative of the D.C. Jail Infirmary.

The record storage is a little confusing; records are usually at the location of the facility where the inmate was last incarcerated. The records contain excellent information on government witnesses, including the length of incarceration, any medical or behavior problems the person experienced, separation orders, photographs and fingerprints.

Additionally, the jail will destroy inmates clothing after 15 days. Therefore, any clothing that the inmate wore upon arrival will be destroyed if not picked up within the first 15 days of arrival. If the clothing is in any way relevant to your case get it before the 15 days have lapsed.

1. Virginia Corrections Information:
   Records: (804) 674-3204
   Research Department: (804) 674-3270

You should be able to receive information regarding whether an individual is incarcerated and if so, at what institution. You will need a full name and a date of birth or social security number. With this information you will be told when the person was incarcerated, their charge, and release date. If you have a notarized release from the individual you can obtain information from their medical file. PLEASE NOTE THAT YOU SHOULD BE VERY SPECIFIC ABOUT WHAT INFORMATION YOU WOULD LIKE TO HAVE IN THE LETTER. Unfortunately, they can only give limited information. If the person is currently incarcerated you should contact the facility at which he or she is housed and speak with their records department for further information.

The office is located in Richmond, Virginia. But they are willing to send copies of their information. The charge is $0.20 per copy, in addition to $1.00 handling fee and then postage. The handling fee for a certified copy is $2.00.

Aerial Maps

Contact: Mr. Dennis Wardenberg
Office of Planning
801 North Capital Street, NW
Suite 4000
Phone: (202) 442-8981
Fax: (202) 442-7638

Aerial maps are pictures of any location in the city taken by a satellite. The Office of Planning produces these maps for free to government agencies.

Alcohol-Drug Abuse Service Administration (ADASA)

500 Indiana Avenue, NW, Room C-300, (202) 879-1115
Main Headquarters: 1300 1st Street, NE, (202) 727-5161
33 N Street, NE, 2nd Floor, (202) 727-0202

To subpoena information regarding a person's participation in any of their programs, subpoena Dr. Linda Boyd, Acting Chief of the Criminal Justice Division, at 33 N Street, NE, 2nd floor, Washington, D.C. 20002 (727-0202). You can also hand deliver the subpoena to Ms. Deborah Walls at 33 N Street, NE. Without a release of records, ADASA will not release any records before trial. Mr. Ron Hollis, (500 Indiana Avenue, NW, Room C-300, (202) 879-1115), will also handle alcohol program subpoenas. The above names may change, so call first for accuracy.

Ambulance Runs

D.C. Fire and EMS
1923 Vermont Avenue, NW
Washington, D.C.
Phone: (202) 673-3360

The computer printout of the ambulance run, the FD 151 form, and the tape recording of the ambulance run call, can be requested on one subpoena. You must provide a blank cassette for the tape recording of the ambulance run. The FD 151 will contain the number of the ambulance and the drivers' names who responded, as well as a report of the condition of the patient when they arrived.

When issuing subpoenas for tape recordings of ambulance runs, make sure the subpoena includes the date, time that the ambulance was called, the address to which it was called, and any type of illness or injury that was reported. Subpoenas need not include the injured person's name, PDID or other identifying information (however, if you have the name it can be beneficial). You can also retrieve an ambulance run with a FD Form-79, but you need to have the patient sign the form in order to get the run. With a subpoena, you must allow 3-5 working days for them to get the information. Try to subpoena runs before the preliminary hearing.

Ambulance Drivers

1923 Vermont Avenue NW
(202) 673-3360

Either on the Ambulance Run subpoena or on a separate subpoena, ask permission to speak with the attendants of the ambulance in question. The Fire Department will make an appointment for you with the drivers at their stations. Drivers usually will not talk without knowing that you have permission for the interview.

American Medical Association

(800) 621-8335

If you are interested in getting information on individual doctors, you can call the American Medical Association, which is headquartered in Chicago. If you have the doctor's name they will either give you the home or work information on the doctor (depending on what the doctor reported to the AMA).

Armed Forces Locator

To serve a subpoena for a person's military record (OPF), contact:

National Personnel Record Center
111 Winnebago Street
St. Louis, MO 63118-4126
Phone: (314) 801-9250
Fax: (314) 801-9270
They accept subpoena by fax.

To receive information for a soldier's or sailor's certificate indicating where an individual is stationed, send a subpoena, along with a letter on attorney letterhead, including as much information as you can regarding the person's full name, rank, last duty assignment/last known military address, DOB, and SSI number, to the appropriate military branch. The phone numbers for certain branches are available directly following as well as under the appropriate branch.

Army: (202) 685-3745

St. Louis, Missouri 63132-5200

To locate an Army separatee:

National Personnel Records Center
St. Louis, Missouri 63132-5200

The National Personnel Records Center, Military Personnel Records (NPRC-MPR) is the repository of millions of military personnel, health, and medical records of discharged and deceased veterans of all services during the 20th century. NPRC (MPR) also stores medical treatment records of retirees from all services, as well as records for dependent and other persons treated at naval medical facilities. Information from the records is made available upon written request (with signature and date).

Current addresses are not maintained for separatees who are not serving under reserve obligation. In such cases you might want to try a military organization such as the American Legion or VFW (Veterans of Foreign Wars).

Assessment Office

Washington, D.C., Assessment Office
441 4th Street, NW, Suite 480 (Judiciary 1)
Monday – Friday: 8:15 a.m. – 4:45 p.m.

The Assessment Office regulates and maintains records on the property taxes imposed on property owners in D.C. The information you can obtain is normally more current than that which you can obtain through the Lusk's Directory. The Assessment Office has on-line computers, with information that should be no more than two months old. Whether calling on the telephone or going in person, remember to be very cordial! Also, try to provide the square and lot number of the property you are inquiring after.

If the person lives outside of the D.C. Metropolitan area, you can contact the assessment office in the city of residence. You can request the current mailing address for the property owner.

Beeper Information

The following list of pager companies represents only a small percentage of the pager distributors that operate in the Washington Metropolitan area:

AmeriPage	(301) 421-1323 or (301) 421-0900
USA Mobility	(800) 344-1004
Direct Page	(800) 908-2337
Metrotel	(866) 860-4108
CommTech Wireless USA	(904) 281-0073

You can call these companies to locate records of telephone numbers received by a beeper. Each company has its own requirements and some only keep records for up to three months. You need to call the appropriate pager company and request the information needed. They will advise you from that point.

Building Management

To obtain apartment numbers, verification of residence, length of stay, a forwarding address or a history of the tenants' behavior, you need to talk to the building supervisor, the rental office, or the person who owns the building. Usually these people will let you see the records without a subpoena, but sometimes they will not.

Bus Drivers

Office of Counsel for the Metro Transit Authority 600 Fifth Street, NW
Washington, D.C. 20001
Contact: Mark F. Sullivan at (202) 962-2814

There are two procedures for obtaining the names of and information about Metrobus drivers.

1. Go to Mark F. Sullivan with subpoenas in hand. You need not subpoena him – he will direct you to the correct contacts. You will probably be referred to Mr. Steve Petrucelli, (202) 962-5662, for the driver's schedules, known as "actuals." Next, you will probably go to Tangy Colbe-Mobley, (202) 962-5663, who can give you the names and addresses of the drivers. One subpoena should go to the "actuals" person that Mark F. Sullivan gives you, and the other should go to the person who can give you the bus driver's name and address.

OR

2. Call Mr. Robert Orr (962-2066) and give him the address of the incident and the time – he will give you the route and bus number. Then call the Operating Department manager (get number from switchboard) and he or she will give you the bus driver's name and address when you give them the information you obtained from Mr. Orr.

Cellular Phone Calls

To trace a call from a cell/car telephone you will need to serve subpoenas on one or all of the following major agencies that serve the D.C. area. Doing this will get you subscriber information. When filling out the subpoena you should request the subscriber information for the call and include the date, time, (if possible) the geographic location from which the call was made, and the telephone number, which was called from the telephone. Depending on the company policies, you can either hand deliver or fax the subpoenas, the company can then fax back the information to you.

To find out what service provider to subpoena, go to: www.fonefinder.net.

They accept faxed subpoenas, but must make them out to:

Custodian of Records for Verizon Wireless DBA Cellco partnership
180 Washington Valley Road
Bedminster, NJ 07921

The language on the subpoena should read "any and all call detail and/or incoming and outgoing calls for [number]…" Doing this will get you details of all calls, including restricted calls, etc… instead of just the details of the normal phone bill which won't always include incoming numbers. With questions contact: Bruno Debellis, Subpoena Coordinator, at (908) 306-7596.

Verizon occasionally resells service plans to ACN Communication Services but it may still be listed as Verizon on internet searches. Use the following information to subpoena ACN:

They can also provide information on how long the person resided there, who lives with him or her (children, other relatives, etc.) and where he or she might have lived previously (if it was public housing).

D.C. Superior Court

Also refer to Criminal Information at the front of the resource section.

Superior Court for the District of Columbia
Carl Moultrie Building
500 Indiana Avenue, NW
Washington, D.C. 20001

Central Cellblock – C Street Level

Known as "The Bullpen," this cellblock holds defendants awaiting court hearings. Only attorneys holding bar cards can gain access to central cellblock.

(202) 879-1095

Police Liaison Office – Room 2120

Criminal Assignment Office – Room 1230

This office assigns misdemeanor cases, which have been certified as ready for trial to specific judges, and keeps track of the felony cases being heard by each judge. If you need to know where a particular case is being heard, check with this office.

Juvenile Calendar Control Court – JM Level, JM-2

Certifies juvenile cases as ready for trial.

Juvenile Assignment Office – JM Level, Room 125

Performs the same function for juvenile court as its adult counterpart.

Criminal Finance Office – 4th floor

Civil Files
JM Level, Room 200
(202) 879-1133
Monday – Friday: 9:00 a.m. – 4:00 p.m.
Saturday: 9:00 a.m. – 12:00 p.m.

You can find out if someone has a civil case against him or her and is being sued, or is suing someone else, and if so, the names and addresses of those parties involved and their attorney's name and address, as well as information regarding the conflict that precipitated the suit.

You need to ask at the file clerk's window for the microfilm listings for whatever year you are interested in and look up either the name of the plaintiff or the defendant, (indicated by the P or D after the name) to find out the case number.

You then fill out a case file locator card, available at the desk, give it to the file clerk, (they prefer them in numerical order by year), and he or she will give you the file. You need some kind of ID to leave as security for the file, e.g., your CJA ID, your license, or a bar card.

Landlord/Tenant
409 E Street, NW

(202) 879-4789
Monday – Friday: 8:30 a.m. – 5:00 p.m.
Wednesday evenings: 6:30 p.m. - 8:00 p.m. (emergency use only)
Saturday: 9:00 a.m. – 12:00 p.m. (emergency use only)

To find landlord/tenant files, you need either the name of the landlord or the name of the tenant. These are files of landlords making complaints against tenants. There are books kept by year in which you can look up either the name of the landlord or the name of the tenant, since they keep the lists by both names. You get a case number from these books, and then can get the file of the proceedings with the tenant's address.

For tenants complaining against landlords, you need to go to:

Rental Accommodations Office
941 North Capitol Street, NE
Washington, D.C. 20001
Monday – Friday: 9:00 a.m. – 3:00 p.m.
(202) 442-4477 (calls accepted until 4:45 p.m.)

Small Claims
JM Level, Room 120
(202) 879-1120 – Robert Cann
Monday – Friday: 8:30 a.m. – 4:00 p.m.
Wednesday evenings: 6:30 p.m. – 8:00 p.m.
Saturday: 9:00 a.m. – 12:00 p.m.

You can find the names and addresses of people involved in financial disputes, and the nature of the dispute. Small Claims is the same idea as Civil Court, but involves smaller amounts of money, $2,000 or under.

To find the cases, go behind the counter in front of the file stacks, and look up in the books there, either the plaintiff's or the defendant's name. One side on each page is the defendants' names listed alphabetically, and the other is the plaintiffs' names listed alphabetically. The books date back to 1972.

When you find the number, go back into the file stacks and pull the file yourself. You do not need any kind of ID. The files are organized by year. When you are finished, do not re-file the folders; simply lay them on the table to the right.

Department of Consumer & Regulatory Affairs

941 North Capitol Street, NE
Washington, D.C.
(202) 442-8947, Room 9500 (Director's Office)
(202) 442-4480, Room 2100 (Records Office)

Will provide a certificate of occupancy and information about who owns a building of any sort (apartment complex, parking garage, etc.).

Department of Human Services

801 East Building
St. Elizabeth's Campus
Information: (202) 724-5466
Administration: (202) 727-3211

Note: Addresses of former or current public assistance recipients can be obtained by subpoena from the Office of General Counsel, T. Britt Reynolds, Department of Human Services at 801 East Building, St. Elizabeth's Campus. Allow at least four days for them to locate the information. If the witness is a woman, it is helpful to know if she has ever been married and to whom, because the files are kept by the name of the male member of the family, even if the couple is divorced. Contact the Chief of Legislative Affairs, (202) 724-2127, about any subpoena problems.

Department of Transportation (D.C.) – SEE "TRAFFIC"

Divorce Records

500 Indiana Avenue, NW, Room 4230
(202) 879-1410
Monday – Friday: 9:00 a.m. – 4:00 p.m.

If you know either the husband's or the wife's name, (though you should know both to assure accuracy), you can obtain a copy of the divorce. You need a case number, which you can look up in the same room. It costs $0.25 to copy each page and certified copies cost $1.00. The records date from September 1956 to the present.

FSA provides social services, assessment, case management, and crisis intervention services to vulnerable populations; provides oversight for the homeless programs, domestic violence programs, and refugee resettlement programs.

- Adult Protective Services (APS)

  Investigates reports of abuse, neglect, and expatiation of frail, elderly and disabled adults in the District of Columbia. APS also provides case management, counseling, and support services to vulnerable adults who have been abused, neglected, or exploited.

- Teen Parent Assessment Project

  Assesses the homes of teen parents who have applied for TANF benefits, to ensure that the under-18-year-old parents reside with responsible adults in suitable living arrangements and are attending school. Also provides case management and support services, connects teen parents to community-based services, and focuses on the teen pregnancy prevention efforts in the District

- The Office of Refugee Resettlement

  Fosters the expeditious transition of refugees who resettle in the District of Columbia from dependency on public assistance to economic self-sufficiency and self-reliance. This office provides social services, cash, and medical assistance to eligible refugees and their families through sub-grants to community-based social service agencies that work with refugee populations. Programs concentrate on preparing clients for employment, job placement, English language training and support services.

This is a report the Fire Inspector fills out at the scene of the fire, and is a description of his/her findings. It is written in a code that they are happy to explain to you, and indicates if the inspector thought it was arson or not, what started the fire, it anyone was hurt, etc.

The FD 23 is filled out for every fire incident. Information included on this report includes the cause of fire and/or the origin etc. The FD 23A is only filled out for arson cases. Information included on this report includes the names of witnesses and suspects. The FD 193 includes a diagram of the scene in question. These three forms can be subpoenaed from 441 4th Street, NW.

To obtain the report you need to go to their office and fill out a Freedom of Information Act form. You need the date and the location of the fire. If they have the information, they will give it to you right away, but it takes approximately two weeks after the fire for the report to be transferred to their office. Be aware it may cost $1.50 per copy of each report.

To speak with the Fire Inspector, note on the FOIA form this request and an appointment will be made for you.

To speak with fire fighters, retrieve the fire incident report, and then write a letter on attorney letterhead to the Battalion Chief Alvin Carter, 1923 Vermont Avenue, NW, Washington, D.C. 20001. The telephone number is (202) 673-3331. Include the date, location and report number of the fire in your letter. They will call you and set up a time and place for you to talk with the fire fighter(s).

Fire Fighter Locator: (202) 673-3292

Funeral Records

Many funeral homes have a guest log, which is a book for people to sign either at the service or at the reception. This is a good way to find out about people who knew the decedent. These books are given to a family member, most often the one who arranged the funeral. Some funeral homes may keep copies.

Tracing of Guns

If a gun needs to be traced, the following agencies may be of assistance:

ATF
Kevin Shipp
(202) 648-8059
If you need to trace a gun recovered in D.C., you can call Mr. Shipp and he will fax you the information.

National Criminal Information Center Operations Unit, Room 7235
J. Edgar Hoover Building
9th and Pennsylvania Avenues, NW
Washington, D.C. 20535
(202) 324-2611, ext. 2311

Federal Bureau of Investigation
(202) 324-3000 or (202) 324-7432

The Metropolitan Police Department
Room 2058
(202) 727-4275

In Maryland: State Police Headquarters
Licensing Division
7751 Washington Boulevard
Jessup, MD 20795
(410) 799-0191

Subpoenas should be made out to Major Richard Stuff, Commander of Licensing Division. Include the full name, date of birth, Social Security Number and race. You should expect this to take approximately one to three days. You can fax a copy, to get the search started. However, YOU MUST MAIL THEM THE ORIGINAL SUBPOENA. Make sure you call them and let them know that you are faxing and mailing the subpoenas.

Procedures
One procedure for gun tracing is as follows:

1. Obtain the Manufacturer and serial number from the police reports.

2. Call the gun manufacturer. (If you do not have the manufacturer's number, call a gun store, the Virginia yellow pages are a good place to look, and ask them if they have the phone number for that manufacturer.) They should need only the gun's serial number to give you the following information:
*the caliber of gun

*the model number and nomenclature of the gun *physical characteristics of the gun (color, length, revolver/semiautomatic) *to whom the gun was sold *the date the gun was sold *the address and phone number of the owner of the gun *possibly a purchase order number or shipping number. This is helpful when calling the next gun owner party.

3. Call the owner of the gun

a. If it is a distributor or store, get the following information:
*when it purchased the gun
*when it sold the gun *to whom it sold the gun
*the address and phone number of that person or company *any shipping or purchase order number

b. If it is a private citizen, get the following information:
*when he or she bought the gun *was the gun stolen or sold (how it left his or her possession)
*if it was stolen, did he or she file a police report
-when, where, what happened
-get the police report
*how often did he or she fire the gun *distinguishing features of the gun, modifications, new sights etc.
*talk to your lawyer about getting a statement *find out as much as possible about this person

Haines Criss-Cross Directories

For addresses, proper names, and telephone numbers.
Martin Luther King Public Library also has the Criss-crosses from the last five years for the District of Columbia ONLY.

Addressokey Section: Contains a list of all addresses in D.C., Suburban Maryland and Virginia where phones with published telephone numbers are located. It is indexed alphabetically by street name, then numerically by address. The name of the occupant and the telephone number at that address are listed.

Telokey Section: Indexed by telephone number. Lists the name and address of the person in whose name the telephone is listed

The Library of Congress has Criss-cross directories for most of the major cities in the USA. They are located in the Public Reading Room in the Thomas Jefferson Building.

Homeless Information

The Criminal Practice Institute Manual has a lot of information regarding homeless resources: the names of shelters, soup kitchens, drop-in centers, clothing distributors, etc., are contained in Chapter 10, and it is available from your attorney. Also see Homeless Information Resource Guide – available from the Internship Coordinator.

There is a list of homeless shelters for the D.C. Metro area at the websites below:

There are several steps you can take to obtain immigration information on a client or a witness.

Go to the Homeland Security website – http://www.dhs.gov/dhspublic/. At the top of the page, there is a link which says 'Contact Us.' Click on that and it will take you to a page with some general contact info. At the bottom of that page there will be a pull-down menu which says 'Pick a Category.' Pull that down and click on 'Immigration.' This will send you to a page where you can put in your name, email, and type a message to the DHS. Write a simple message, something along the lines of 'looking for immigration information for a witness in a criminal case.' Put in your contact info as well.

Within a day or two of putting in that message, someone from the Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) will call you. With only the witness's first, last name and his DOB, they should be was able to pull his or her whole immigration file. You can find his or her legal status, where and when he or she entered the country, his or her Alien Resident Number, his or her Social Security Number, how many times he or she has re-applied for temporary protected status, and if there are any deportation proceedings currently pending against him or her. Their procedures have changed many times recently. If you have questions about this process, contact:

License Tags – Tracing Stolen Tags

Every time a vehicle is stolen, a 251 will be filed, which is available in the Public Documents Section of MPD. This is the Deputy's Office, Room 3075. You will need to know the license plate number and they can tell you the address and date it was found as well as the owner of the car.

The Auto Theft Division (3rd Floor, 300 Indiana) keeps a list of car owners they deal with each year. They also keep a list of tags that have been stolen, whether the car has been recovered or not.

Lock-up Lists

Available from the CJA office. Good for a proper name, warrant numbers and PDID numbers. The lock-up list is a list of people who were locked up on a given day, the charge and the lawyer assigned. They are useful if you know that someone was locked up on a charge on or around a certain day, and you need to find out the real name, or if you suspect a conflict of interest because of a co-defendant.

Lusk's Real Estate Assessment Directory

Martin Luther King Library
Washingtonian Room
901 9th Street, NW
Washington, D.C.
(202) 727-1126

This book lists every street address in the city, organized by quadrant. It lists the name of the owner of the property, his or her phone number, the square feet, lot number, what the property is being used for, how the area is zoned, what kind of neighborhood it is, and the assessed value of the property.

Marriage Bureau

500 Indiana Avenue, NW, Room 4485
(202) 879-4840
Monday – Friday: 8:00 a.m. – 5:00 p.m.

You can obtain certified certificates of marriage containing information on ages, place of residence, former marriages and relatives of the bride and groom. The Bureau's records, dating back to 1811, are organized by the year and the approximate month of the marriage. Each yearbook contains an alphabetical listing of every groom and is printed next to the name of both the bride and the groom. There is a $5.00 fee for a certified copy of the "Proof of Marriage" certificate unless you bring a written request on attorney letterhead. (The fee for a copy of the entire marriage application $12.00.)

(202) 877-7000

Medstar is the emergency helicopter based as the Washington Hospital Center. Medstar keeps tapes of helicopter runs for 30 days. Issue subpoena at the Legal Department. Include the date and approximate time of the helicopter response. Also, see Washington Hospital Center in Hospital listing.

Myspace.com (procedure changes quite often)

To subpoena someone's Myspace page, you must first view his or her profile. At the bottom of the web browser you'll see something like http://:www.myspace.com/viewprofile/friendid then eight or nine digits; these are the ID numbers for that person's page that you need to put on the subpoena. You can also list more than one ID number if you're not sure you have the right person. If the person no longer has a Myspace page, you can try to use his or her email address. The person's mailing address won't help because they don't ask for that information. You can fax the subpoena using the information below:

Attn: FOIA Officer

Records from old CCRB (Civilian Complaint Review Board) were transferred to MPD. CCRB previously recorded and investigated complaints made by citizens against police officers, and subsequently made recommendations to MPD for action. Only those records made before the closing date are available. The files were kept in two ways: by the officer's name and by the complainant's name. For pending cases, only the complaint form with a narrative of what happened and the complainant's name, address and telephone number is available. For some closed cases, the entire file is open to view; for others, only the complaint form is available. Complaints made after that date are investigated by the Internal Affairs Division and are not available at all.

Please submit a FOIA request to OPC to get civilian complaints on MPD officers.

Post Office

To find out which offices serve which areas, call the National Control Center at (888) 876-5322. The addresses of Post Offices can be obtained from www.usps.gov.

Forwarding addresses can be obtained by going to the Post Office that served the individual's old address. You must bring the appropriate form on CJA letterhead to request the forwarding address. The form, which should include the full name of the person (if possible) and his or her last known address, is available on the USPS website.

Additionally, you can go to http://www.usps.com/ncsc/locators/find-is.html to find the closest postal inspection station to the address for which you are seeking forwarding info. Just fax a request on attorney letterhead to the closest post office to that address.

Zip Codes

To find out the zip codes of anywhere in the USA, call the Main Post Office at 635-5300. Alternatively, you can reference the "United States Zip Code & Post Office Director" found in the Internship Office.

Pre-Trial Services Agency (formerly Bail Agency)

633 Indiana Avenue, NW
Monday – Friday: 7:00 a.m. – 5:00 p.m.
(202) 727-2911

This agency maintains files on every person formerly or currently on bail. Their files contain such information as addresses, relatives, employment history, etc. You should know the date the person was arrested and what he or she was charged with.

Contact Michael Gunn at (202) 727-2943 if the subject is on release or Trudy Van Voorhis at (202) 727-4830 if the subject is pending release. The agency also has a branch in the Courthouse at (202) 727-2937. The main office is open 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Pre-Trial Services Report

Available in open and closed court jackets for every D.C. case. You need the docket number for the case in order to get the jacket.

A wonderful source of information for addresses, relative's names, friend's names, jobs, school, etc. Pre-Trial Services interviews the defendant upon arrest, and determines if the defendant has ties to the community, if the defendant is working, where he or she is living and with whom, etc. Pre-Trial Services attempts to verify this information.

Prisoner Transport Records

A list kept by the U.S. Marshals of every prisoner they escort each day from either the D.C. Jail or CTF. Can be obtained from the PDS Trial Chief or from the U.S. Marshal's office in the Courthouse.

Public Works

Office of Public Space Permits and Records
613 H Street, NW, Suite 616

In order to establish that a police officer observation point was from a certain distance away from the subject of observation, you should call the Department of Public Works. You will be provided with D.C. street surveys with widths of all D.C. streets. You can get a copy of map section and have it certified for use in trial.

(202) 393-7110

These agencies will do a search for a particular clip that aired on the news within the past 28 days. They will make a copy of all the clips that aired on every station within that period which pertain to the case you desire. If you wish to obtain information that was on television dating before the 28 days, you must go to each actual television station and request a copy.

Freelance Video Production
4000 Albemarle Street, NW, Room 406
Washington, D.C. 20008
(202) 362-6535
Contact: AJ Piloce

This agency keeps record of news programs for Channels 5 (FOX), 7 (WJLA/ABC) and 9 (WUSA/CBS). When provided with an approximate date and time of the broadcast, the channel, and a description of the event they can search out and compile news broadcasts and copy them to videotape. The service costs $45.00 plus tax per segment (and $5.00 shipping and handling) and your attorney must pay the agency directly.

11600 Nevel Street
Rockville, MD
(800) 4-VIDEOS

This is a full service video production agency. You can get copies of videos when you give them information about the broadcast.

Real Property Database

The D.C. government maintains a database of tax assessments and sales records for real property (land and houses) online. The link is: http://otr.cfo.dc.gov/otr/cwp/view,a,1330,q,594345.asp.

It's useful if you're trying to find out who owns a building. The two databases aren't duplicates; some properties will show up in one but not another.

Recorder of Deeds

515 D Street, NW
Lot and Square Department - Room 304
Monday – Thursday: 8:15 a.m. – 4:00 p.m., Friday: 8:15 a.m. – 1:00 p.m.
(202) 727-5204

You can locate the current or last owner of any piece of property in the District. Helpful in trying to find witnesses who lived in what are now abandoned buildings.

Rental Car Information

Enterprise
Enterprise Leasing Company, Maryland Regional Office
Lost Vehicles Phone: (301) 208-6860

By calling the number above and providing the license plate number or the VIN, you can obtain the claim number (for a rental car that has been stolen/carjacked). You can then send a subpoena with the claim number asking for all documentation regarding the lost or stolen vehicle. This information may include rental logs and a computer log of all contacts about the investigation of the lost/stolen vehicle. Subpoenas can be faxed to (866) 389-6423.

Roads

613 G Street, NW, Room 616
West Potomac Building

You can find out the width of any road in D.C., and exactly where the D.C./Maryland line is in relation to curbs and sidewalks. They have copies of all the surveyor's maps on file, cards that list how wide the right of way is for any road at any given point, how wide the sidewalk area may be, and how much further back the right of way goes behind the sidewalk to the property line.

School Information

D.C. Public Schools
825 North Capitol Street, NE
9th Floor c/o Leticia Cannady
Administrative Office/Legal Services
Monday – Friday: 8:00 a.m. – 4:30 p.m.
(202) 442-5000
www.k12.dc.us/dcps/schools/schoolsmain.html

To obtain a student's school file, deliver a subpoena to the legal office of DCPS at the above address. The subpoena should be addressed to the DCPS Legal Office. Include the name, address, and DOB of the child. This is for the traditional school file and will not include any disciplinary actions.

The following is unverified information: Disciplinary actions and resolutions are now kept within the individual school administrations. At the end of the school year, all disciplinary actions are expunged, and the students are allowed to start with a clean record the following year. If you are seeking disciplinary records for the current year, you must go to the administrative office of the school that the student is currently enrolled.

If you need a floor plan or schematics for any of D.C.'s public schools, you can get it from D.C. Public Schools Facilities Management. You need to send a written request to Lucian Coleman at lucian.coleman@k12.dc.us and include your phone number and fax number and exactly what school you need a floor plan for. If you need to talk to Mr. Coleman, call (202) 576-7718 and ask for him by name. He'll be able to tell you what floor plans are available and answer any questions.

For records from Prince George's County Schools, take subpoenas to:
Legal Office Administration Building
14201 School Lane
Upper Marlboro, MD 20072
(301) 952-6242

Social Security Administration

2100 M Street, NW
(800) 234-5772

To get Social Security records, you should have a full name, DOB, and if possible, a Social Security Number. They can find a person's record by just the name and the DOB under some circumstances, but usually they need the number. You must issue a subpoena.

Social Security records contain a person's name, DOB, place of birth, parents' names, last place of employment, children spouse, and benefits received, among other things.

Before it will release a record, the Social Security Administration requires that you receive permission from the person whose record you requested. It will make an exception if you request your client's record, but in all other cases it will refuse to honor the subpoena.

The records of people who have been receiving benefits for a year or more will take 30 to 60 days to obtain, as they are stored all over the country.

If you can't find information on a number through the internet, you can mail a subpoena to Verizon. The subpoena should be made out to Verizon – (state), Inc. The subpoena should have either a name or a telephone number, and an address helps. Verizon will give you the address or name that corresponds to the information you have. If you have more than one name or number to look up, you need a separate subpoena for each. You can also retain full telephone bills, with itemized calls, etc. Request for call logs can cost up to $150.00 per day.

Long distance toll records can also be subpoenaed. This will give you the number of anyone calling long distance collect, and anyone the person in question is calling long distance. Without a letter of consent, Verizon will notify the person, whose record you are requesting, that the records are being released to someone, unless you have a nondisclosure statement.

Note: Verizon is a local telephone service. A different company may serve outlying areas. With a subpoena, most telephone companies will provide the same information.

Traffic Information

Bureau of Traffic Services
Department of Public Works
Ms. Karen Benefield, Acting Chief
2000 14th Street, NW
(202) 939-8092

The Bureau of Traffic Services can provide written verification of traffic signal locations, including stop signs and traffic lights. Send a request in writing on attorney letterhead to the attention of Ms. Benefield at the above listed address. If you need a certified statement to verify that a sign or signal exists, or operates at a particular intersection, that information needs to be specified in the letter.

Traffic Signal Timing and Sequencing Information

D.C. Department of Transportation
Traffic Signal Systems Division
William McGuirk, Chief
2000 14th Street, NW
7th Floor
Washington, D.C. 20009

Include in your written request the particular location or intersection of interest, the case number and name, and a waiver due to indigence. No subpoena is necessary.

Tree Division

D.C. Department of Public Works
4701 Shepherd Parkway, SW
Washington, D.C.
Monday – Friday: 7:30 a.m. – 4:00 p.m.
(202) 767-8532/8967

If you ever have a case in which there is an issue about whether the trees in an area in the District of Columbia had leaves or not, or were a certain height or distance apart. etc., there is a division in the D.C. Department of Public Works that deals with these and other pressing questions.

U.S. Naval Observatory

Monday – Friday: 7:30 a.m. – 3:30 p.m.
www.USNO.navy.mil
(202) 762-1438

This webpage explains the entire process and the stipulations:

- http://aa.usno.navy.mil/faq/docs/lawyers.html

You can obtain certified copies of sunrise and sunset times for the District of Columbia, on any given date. Everything must be done through the mail. You must send a letter on attorney letterhead that explains your request (specific date and location) along with the names of the parties involved, the basic caption and nature of the case, and whether the U.S. government is or may become involved. The information is processed one to two days after the request is received. They will mail the report directly to the office for a small fee. If there is an emergency, you may call and pick up the report yourself the next morning. Also if a certified copy is not necessary, then log onto the website and scroll down to "Astronomical Applications" and fill in the requested information.

Vendor License Information

614 H Street, NW
First Floor
Monday – Friday: 9:00 a.m. – 3:00 p.m.
(202) 727-7070

Any vendor who sells on D.C. streets has to receive a license from this office. It may be very helpful to know where (which streets) the vendors normally work on. Because the vendors more around so much, you may try talking to other vendors in the area and ask if they know where a particular individual is or went. The license information that you receive will give you the home address and telephone number, but this information may be seriously outdated. In addition, it may take some time to get this information from the office; they tend to wait until just a few days before trial. You should, therefore, also look into the D.C. Finance and Revenue Department and/or the IRS for the most current information on the vendor's address.

Veterans Administration

1120 Vermont Avenue, NW (Headquarters)
Monday – Friday: 8:00 a.m. – 3:00 p.m.
(202) 273-5400

Bureau of Vital Records

Washington, D.C. 20002
Monday – Friday: 8:30 a.m. – 3:30 p.m.
(202) 442-9303
Contact: Ms. Julia Randall (202) 442-9299

You can get certified copies of birth/death certificates for the District of Columbia. Keep in mind that you can get very good physical descriptions on death certificates.

You should make your request on attorney letterhead in addition to a subpoena; they can supply you with the birth/death certificate on the spot. You can address your request to:

Vital Records Division/Legal Office
Center for Health Statistics
825 North Capitol Street, NE
Washington, D.C. 20002

Bring the request and subpoena to the legal office.

For birth certificates, you need the name of the child, the names of the mother and father, the mother's maiden name, the sex and date of birth of the child, and the hospital where the child was born, if possible.

For death certificates, you need the full name of the decedent, and the date and place of death. The certificate contains a physical description of the decedent, his or her residence and occupation, names of relatives and the cause of death.

For Maryland, go to this website to find the information you need:
www.dhmh.state.md.us/html/vitalrec.htm

For other jurisdictions, you must contact the State Department of Health, Bureau of Vital Statistics.

Voter Registration Rolls

Martin Luther King Library
Washingtonian Room
(202) 727-1126

These are bound computer printouts of all the registered voters in D.C. who have voted in the last four years. Includes names, addresses, voter registration numbers, how many times the person voted in the past four years, his or her party, ward and the date he or she registered. There is also an inactive voters roll, which is a list of voters scheduled for removal from the rolls because they have not voted in four years.

Warrant Office

500 Indiana Avenue, NW, Room 4002
Monday – Friday: 8:00 a.m. – 5:00 p.m.
Saturday: 8:00 a.m. – until the Court is down, between 1:00 p.m. and 3:00 p.m.
(202) 879-1380

Montgomery County Warrants Office
(240) 773-5360

If you have the full name and DOB this office will confirm open warrants and tell you the charge. They can only provide information on Criminal and Traffic warrants. If you need information on search warrants you need to call the records office at (240) 773-5340, and they will tell you which unit responded to the call.

Copies of arrest warrants and affidavits in support of arrest warrants are available here, as well as copies of bench and search warrants. The arrest warrant has the name, address, DOB, CCR number and PDID number of the defendant. The affidavit contains that information as well as the complainant's name, address and a brief description of what the police believe happened.

The arrest warrant must be executed (i.e., the defendant already arrested on that warrant), in order for you to see it or the affidavit. You need to know the date the person was arrested on the warrant and the date of the arraignment. If the person has not been picked up, the arrest warrant and the affidavit are not public information. The only other way that you can see an arrest warrant is if the warrant was nollied, canceled and withdrawn by the USAO because it decided it did not want that warrant executed. The USAO does not have to disclose its reasons.

Bench warrants are public information, and you can see them whether they are outstanding or not, but you cannot make copies.

If a person has an outstanding warrant, his or her case jacket will be housed in the Warrant Office. To obtain the jacket, you need the docket number, which you can retrieve through criminal information.

Investigation via the Internet

The Internet is an exceptional tool for use in locating individuals, property, and other useful information. However, as it is an ever-changing medium, the information provided herein should be checked periodically, as more capabilities and/or changes may arise. The rule of thumb when searching on the Internet is: Less is more. In many searches you will conduct, you will get more useful information if you search using just the last name and first initial, as opposed to full names and dates of birth.

APPENDIX C

SAMPLE QUESTIONS

The following questions are very basic and include only some aspects of certain offenses. The questions are not designed to replace the specific, detailed questioning of witnesses necessary to elicit the unique facts in a particular case.

I. IDENTIFICATION

A. Questions About the Event Itself

1. Get a detailed narrative of what happened, including where the witness was coming from, what the witness was doing prior to the incident, and where the witness was going.

2. Who was the witness with?

3. What was the witness paying attention to just before the witness noticed the perpetrator for the first time?

4. From which direction did the perpetrator approach (front, rear, side, don't know)?

5. What was the exact location of the confrontation? (Get this in words and try to have the witness draw a diagram of the scene.)

6. Exactly what happened? Was there more than one person involved? (Get the exact and relative roles of the persons involved.)

7. If there was more than one perpetrator, find out which one is supposed to be the defendant. (Where was the defendant at all times, in absolute terms and in relation to the other perpetrators and witnesses?)

8. Which perpetrator made contact with the witness?

9. When did the witness first notice the perpetrator(s)? How far away were they? What drew the witness's attention to the perpetrator(s)?

10. Was anything taken from the witness? What was done with it after it was taken?

11. In which direction or to where did the perpetrator(s) flee? For how long after the incident did the witness keep the perpetrator(s) in sight?

B. Opportunity to Observe

Witness's state of mind

1. What had the witness been doing prior to the incident?
2. Had the witness been drinking or using any drugs?
3. Where was the witness going at the time of the incident?
4. How much sleep had the witness had the night before?
5. Was the witness tired? Preoccupied?
6. Was the witness frightened?
7. Was the witness focusing on a weapon during the incident, or on another individual?

Physical conditions of observation

1. What was the distance between the witness and the perpetrator when the witness first noticed the perpetrator?
2. What was the distance between the two of them during the majority of the incident?
3. What was the duration of the incident? (If it was a long time, split it up into parts. The witness may not have had a good opportunity to view during some of the segments or may have been focusing on one particular item or person.)
4. What was the angle of observation between the witness and the perpetrator?
5. What is the witness's hearing like? Vision?
6. How long did the incident take? (NOTE: Time is very important. Most witnesses will say that an event took minutes when it actually took seconds. Demonstrate how long a minute is – the time may be cut considerably.)
7. What were the weather conditions like? (Sunny, rainy, overcast, stars out, etc.)
8. What were the lighting conditions? Were there streetlights, house lights, car lights, etc.? Was any of the lighting filtered or obstructed? Get exact locations of all lights. Were the streetlights high or low intensity? Were there any lights available that were not turned on?
9. Were there any physical barriers or obstructions between the witness and the perpetrator, e.g., cars, trees, or other witnesses?

C. Reporting the Incident

Police

1. How was the incident reported to the police? (Call made? Flagging down a car?)
2. Who reported the incident?
3. How soon after the event was it reported?
4. With whom was the incident discussed?
5. Exactly what did the witness say in giving the report?
6. Did the person to whom the report was made make any statements or say anything?
7. Were there other witnesses who talked to the police?
8. Were there other witnesses who did not talk to the police?
9. Did the police read back to the witness what had been written down? Did the witness change anything or adopt it?
10. Did the witness forget to tell the police anything that the witness is now telling you?
11. What was the initial description the witness gave to the police?
12. Did the witness make a written statement?
13. Was the witness under the influence of any drugs or alcohol when speaking with the police?
14. Has the witness spoken with anyone else about the incident?

Prosecutor

1. Has the witness been to the grand jury? Did the witness testify or only meet with a prosecutor? What questions were asked by the prosecutor and the grand jurors?
2. What was the witness's testimony?
3. Did the prosecutor take notes of the meeting?
4. Who else has met with the prosecutor?

5. Is there anything the witness told the grand jury or the prosecutor that the witness has not told you?

6. Is there anything the witness told you that the witness did not tell the grand jury or the prosecutor?

D. Description of the Perpetrator

1. Age

2. Height (relative to witness or another object)

3. Weight

4. Skin color and complexion

5. Nose (shape)

6. Mouth (shape, especially lips)

7. Teeth – color, missing, crooked, straight, crowded, gaps, unusual shape, noticeable crowns

8. Eyes (color, shape, and positioning)

    c. Pants
    d. Shirt
    e. Shoes
    f. Any other articles?

14. Any distinguishing or unusual features?

15. Was the perpetrator carrying any object? (Get full descriptions of any weapons: style, type, color, size, where the item came from.)

16. Was there anything distinctive about the perpetrator's voice, the way the perpetrator walked, or any unusual mannerisms?

17. Does the description that the witness gave to you differ in any way from that which the witness gave to the police? Did the witness add anything or leave anything out?

E. Evaluation of the Witness – Background

1. Has the witness ever been a victim of a crime before?

2. Has the witness ever been a witness to a crime before?

3. How articulate is the witness?

4. How certain or sure does the witness appear to be?

5. How anxious is the witness to pursue this case?

F. Making an Identification

1. How was the identification made – show-up, photo array, line-up, caught on the scene, second sighting?

2. What did the police say to the witness before the identification? Did the witness overhear anything being said?

3. What did the police say during the identification?

4. What did the witness say in making the identification? (Exact words.)

5. What did the police say after the identification?

6. Did the police write down what the witness said?

7. Were there any other witnesses around during the identification? How close were they to this witness?

8. Were there other identifications made?

9. What did any other witness say about an identification?

10. Was the witness asked to identify anyone but was unable to do so? (Get full details.)

11. On what did the witness base the identification – clothes, face, relative size, body build?

12. How soon after the incident was the identification made?

13. Did the person the witness identified appear to be different in any way from the perpetrator? (Was there different facial hair? Different clothes?)

14. If there was more than one perpetrator, how was each one identified? (Brought out together in a show-up? Pictures together in one photo array? Together in a line-up?)

15. How certain is the witness of this identification? Did police ask this? What was witness's response?

16. Is the witness more certain now than at the time of the original identification? Have there been multiple identifications that now make the person more certain?

17. If there is more than one person, is the witness more certain of one than the other?

G. Show-up Identification

1. Was the witness taken to the suspect, or was the suspect transported to the witness?

2. Was this show-up at the scene of the crime or at another location?

3. Where was the witness at the time of the identification? (Actual position on a diagram or in detailed words, and relative to the perpetrator.) Could the suspect see the witness? Could the suspect hear the witness?

4. What was said by the police before, during, and after the identification?

5. What did the witness tell the police at all stages (before, during, and after the identification)?

6. What description had the witness given to the police? What description did the police have from other witnesses?

7. Were there police around the suspect when the suspect was brought back? Was the suspect handcuffed? In a police car?

8. Who else was present during the identification? Could other witnesses hear what this witness said? Could this witness hear what other witnesses said?

9. Did the suspect have to do anything during the show-up (e.g., say anything, put on or take off an article of clothing)?

10. What were the viewing conditions at the time of the show-up in terms of lighting, distance from the subject, and general opportunity to observe the person being shown?

11. NOTE: Ask all the questions in "Making an Identification" above.

H. Second Sighting

1. Did the witness ever see the suspect again on the street? (When? Where? Under what circumstances?)

2. What did the witness do after seeing the suspect again?

3. Was anyone else present?

4. What was the witness paying attention to just before seeing the person again?

5. What was the lighting?

6. Was anything said to or by the suspect?

7. NOTE: Ask all the questions in "Making an Identification" above.

I. Photo Identification

1. Was this the first identification?

2. Were there any identifications or failures to identify at the scene?

3. Where were the photos shown?

4. Were the pictures loose or in a book? What kind of photos were they?

5. Did the police say anything to the witness about the pictures (e.g., that the pictures were all of known rapists, that they suspected someone in the pictures or book, etc.)?

6. How did the police handle the pictures? Did they let the witness look through the pictures on his or her own? Did they sit there with the witness? Did they show the witness the pictures one at a time? How did they lay the pictures out – in a row, in a stack, in two rows? In what order?

7. How many pictures were there?

8. Were all the pictures the same? Same size, same color?

9. What did the police say before showing the pictures?

10. Did the police say anything while showing the pictures?

11. Did the police say anything after the viewing? After the identification?

12. What exactly did the witness do? Did the witness look through all of them and then pick out one? Did the witness stop at one picture and make an identification? After identifying one picture, did the witness go through the pictures again or finish going through them? Did the witness ever turn the pictures over and see the back? Was anything on the back?

13. Was the witness aware of any dates on the pictures?

14. Did the witness write anything on any picture?

15. What exactly did the witness say in picking a picture?

16. Was more than one picture picked?

17. How sure is the witness that the identification is correct?

18. Did the picture differ in any way from the witness's memory of the perpetrator?

19. Did the police write anything down at any time?

20. Where in the stack or book was the person whom the witness identified?

21. What drew the witness to the identified picture?

22. How long did the showing take? Who else was present? If there were other witnesses present, did they view the photos together or separately?

23. What other identifications were made?

24. NOTE: Ask all the questions in "Making an Identification" above.

J. Line-up Identification

1. Did the witness go to the line-up? Did the witness identify anyone there?

2. What was the witness told before going to the line-up? Was the witness shown photos before the line-up?

3. How did the witness get to the line-up? (Picked up by the police? With other witnesses?)

4. What was the witness told by the police outside the line-up room?

5. Did the witness ask the police any questions?

6. Did the witness talk to other witnesses while waiting outside the line-up room?

7. How many people were in the line-up room?

8. In what position in the line-up was the suspect standing?

9. Did the witness identify the suspect in the presence of other witnesses?

10. What exactly did the witness say in making the identification?

11. What did the police say to the witness outside the line-up room?

12. What did the witness say to other witnesses, or what did the witnesses say to him or her?

13. What did the witness tell the police? (Especially find out the witness's degree of certainty about the identification.)

14. How sure is the witness of the identification?

15. On what basis was the identification made? (Face, clothes, relative body build?)

16. Was there anyone else in the line-up who resembled the person whom the witness identified?

17. Was there anything different between the person the witness identified and the perpetrator?

18. Did the witness look down the line and then identify someone or did the witness just center on one person?

19. Had the witness ever made another identification in this case? When and how? (Get full details.)

20. Had the witness been shown any pictures recently? (When, how many, by whom, what other witnesses, what was said?)

21. Did the witness ask anyone in the line to do anything, say something, turn a particular way?

22. NOTE: Ask all the questions in "Making an Identification" above.

II. ALIBI WITNESS

1. Was the defendant with you on [date]?

2. How do you recall that specific day?

3. How do you recall the specific time?

4. When did the defendant arrive?

5. When did you first see the defendant?

6. Where did you first see the defendant (address, exact place, etc.)?

7. Was the defendant alone or with someone else?

8. Who was the defendant with?

9. Where does that person live?

10. Did anyone else see you and the defendant together?

11. Who?

12. Where does that person live?

13. How long was defendant with you?

14. How do you know it was this long?

15. What exactly did defendant do or say? (As specific and detailed as possible.)

16. Did defendant ever leave your presence during this period of time?
    a. When?
    b. How many times?
    c. How long was defendant gone each time?
    d. When did defendant return?

17. When did defendant finally leave?

18. How do you know?

19. Who, if anyone, left with defendant?

20. Where did defendant go?

21. How do you know?

22. How did the defendant act during the period of time the defendant was with you? (As specific as possible.)
    a. Intoxicated? Drugged?
    b. Nervous?
    c. Excited? Calm?
    d. Normal?

e. Angry? Happy? Sad?

23. What is your relationship with the defendant?
    a. Close friend? Casual friend? Know to speak of?
    b. Relative by blood? Relative by marriage?
    c. Employer?

24. How long have you known the defendant?

25. When was the last time you saw the defendant before [date in question]?

26. Where? What was the defendant doing, etc.?

27. Have you seen the defendant since [date in question]?

28. Where? What was the defendant doing?

29. Are you aware that the defendant is charged with [offense]?

30. How did you learn this?

31. What exactly do you know about the offense?

32. Have you ever talked about the offense with the defendant? (If yes, details.)

33. Have you ever talked with police about the offense? (If yes, details as to when, where, what said, etc.)

34. Have you ever talked with the Assistant United States Attorney about this case? (If yes, details as to when, what said, etc.)

35. Have you testified before the grand jury about this case? (If yes, details as to when, what said, etc.)

36. Have you spoken to anyone else about the offense? (If yes, details as to when, what said, by whom, etc.)

37. Did you ever tell the police, the grand jury, or the prosecutor that the defendant was with you on [date of offense]?

38. Have you previously testified as an alibi witness for the defendant?

39. Have you ever been convicted of an offense? (When, where, disposition.)

40. Where do you now live? Phone number? Length of time?

41. Where did you live before that? Length of time?

42. Where do you work? (If unemployed, how long?)

43. What is your position?

44. How long have you been employed there?

45. Where did you work before that? How long? Position?

III. SELF-DEFENSE

All the following questions should be asked of all witnesses (the complainant, eyewitnesses, complainant's friends and relatives, defendant's friends and relatives, police officers). They must be asked in cases where the defense may be self-defense – i.e., all homicides, ADWs, assaults, etc. These questions are not exhaustive, but merely guidelines. Additional questions should be asked and tailored to the particular fact situation involved. The investigator must try to elicit specific instances rather than general impressions, e.g., "he's a bad guy," "always fighting."

A. Evidence of Complainant's Aggressive or Bad Character to Show Propensity for Violence

1. Was the complainant a violent, aggressive person? Always getting into fights, arguments, altercations with people? Threatening people? (Specify details as to when, where, with whom, persons present, outcome, etc.)

2. Did the complainant associate with people with a reputation for assaultive behavior toward others? If so, who were these other people and where do they live?

3. Have you ever known the complainant to carry any type of weapon?

4. What kind of weapon?

5. Did the complainant always carry it? Frequently? Occasionally? (Specify.) Who would know the complainant carried a weapon?

6. Has the complainant ever used a weapon on anyone other than the defendant? (If yes, specify details as to when, where, on whom, injuries, persons present, outcome, etc.)

7. Do you know of the above from personal observation or from what others have told you? (If others, specify details as to who, when, where, etc.)

8. Was the complainant violent, aggressive when sober, or violent only when intoxicated or drinking?

9. Was the complainant known to drink to excess? Use narcotics?

10. Was the complainant ever charged, arrested, or tried for any assaultive behavior against anyone? (If so, details as to date, jurisdiction, result.) (Also find out the details of any non-violent charges.)

B. Defendant's Knowledge of Complainant's Violent, Aggressive, or Bad Character

1. Determine whether the defendant was aware of any of the above factors pertaining to the complainant. If the defendant was aware, obtain the specific details as to how the defendant knew, who told the defendant, when the defendant became aware, etc.

2. Had the complainant ever made threats against the defendant in the past?
   a. To the defendant personally? (When, where, who was present, etc.)
   b. To other people concerning the defendant? (When, where, who was present, etc.)
   c. Did the defendant know of these threats? (How? When? Where? What was defendant's reaction?)
   d. Was the defendant ever present when the complainant made threats to others?

3. Did the defendant know of the complainant's reputation for carrying a weapon?
   a. Does the defendant know this from personal observation?
   b. Does the defendant know this from other people?

C. Prior Relationship Between Defendant and Complainant

1. Have the defendant and the complainant had any difficulty with each other in the past?
   a. When – day, date, time?
   b. Where? (Precise place.)
   c. Who else present? (Full names, addresses, telephone numbers.)
   d. Cause of dispute or altercation?
   e. Who spoke first and what exactly was said?
   f. Any challenges or threats made? What and by whom and response?
   g. Who committed first overt act? What was it? Response?
   h. Did defendant attempt to withdraw?
   i. Were any weapons involved? What type? Who had them? How used?
   j. Anyone injured? Nature and what extent?
   k. Why did the defendant do what he or she did?

2. Did the witness ever tell police and/or prosecutor any of the above? If so, what and when?

NOTE: These questions do not attempt to explore the details of the altercation giving rise to the instant offense, an area that of course must be covered in great detail. Specific questions concerning this area are suggested below.

IV. CRIMES AGAINST PERSONS

A. Where

1. Where did offense take place (address)?
2. Where at this address was the exact location of the offense?
3. Where exactly were the participants when the altercation began?
4. Where exactly were the participants immediately prior to the blow being struck?
5. Where exactly were the participants at the time of the (fatal) blow?
6. Where exactly was the witness during all of the above?
7. Where exactly were all other witnesses during all of above?
8. (Homicide case:) Where at this address was the exact place of death?

B. When

1. When did the altercation begin?
2. When did the defendant arrive on the scene?
3. When did the complainant arrive on the scene?
4. When did the witness being interviewed arrive on the scene?
5. When did the other witnesses arrive on the scene?
6. (Homicide case:) When was the fatal blow struck?
7. When was the offense reported?
8. (Homicide case:) When did the decedent die?

C. What

1. What was the cause of the altercation?
2. What exactly took place and what was said and done by the defendant and the complainant during the course of the altercation?
   a. Who spoke first and what was said? Done?
   b. Any challenge or threats made? What? By whom? Response?

c. Who committed the first physical act?
d. What was it?
e. What was the response?
f. Did defendant try to withdraw or "wade" in?
g. Did the complainant retreat?

3. Were any weapons involved?
   a. Who had them?
   b. Where were they?
   c. What type?
   d. Who used them?
   e. Was the weapon used by defendant visible to the complainant?
   f. Was the weapon used by complainant visible to the defendant?
   g. Were any weapons recovered by the police on or near the decedent? By anyone? Turned over to police?
   h. Did the police recover any weapon from the defendant?

4. What, in your opinion, cause defendant to do what he or she did?

5. (Homicide case:) What if anything did defendant say or do immediately after inflicting the fatal blow?

6. (Homicide case:) What if anything did decedent say or do immediately after receiving the fatal blow?

7. (Homicide case:) Did decedent say anything to police after the fatal blow was struck? What? Where? When?

8. (Homicide case:) Did the decedent say anything to anyone else after the fatal blow was struck? What? When? Where?

9. What, if anything, did the witness being interviewed tell the police? Prosecutor?
   a. When?
   b. Where?
   c. To whom?
   d. Sign statements?
   e. Testify at preliminary hearing? Grand jury?

10. What did other witnesses tell the police? Prosecutor?

11. What did the witness being interviewed do during the entire incident?

12. What did the other witnesses do during the entire incident?

D. How

1. How did defendant, complainant, witness, and other witnesses arrive and leave?

2. How long did entire incident last?

3. How were the weapons used?
   a. By defendant?
   b. By complainant?
   c. By anyone else?

4. How were the injuries inflicted on complainant/defendant?
   a. Where?
   b. How severe?
   c. How many?
   d. Where was person treated?
   e. How did person get there?

5. How many times, if any, did the defendant tell the complainant to leave him or her alone? What was said? Did complainant hear it?

6. How far from complainant was defendant when incident began?

7. How far from decedent was defendant immediately before the (fatal) blow was struck?

8. How many times did the complainant tell the defendant to leave him or her alone? What was said? Did the defendant hear it?

9. How far from the complainant and the defendant was the witness during all of the above?

10. How many people participated in the altercation? Who? What did they do?

V. CRIMES AGAINST PROPERTY

A. Where

1. Where did the offense take place (address)?

2. Where specifically did entry into the premises occur?

3. Where specifically did the taking occur?

4. Where specifically was the perpetrator during entire incident?

5. Where specifically were any witnesses during incident?

6. Where specifically were any occupants during incident?

7. What locations did police dust for fingerprints?

8. What items did police dust for fingerprints?

9. Where on the premises or items were prints lifted?

10. Where was the property stolen from or from where to where was it moved?

B. When

1. When did the offenses occur – date, time?

2. When did the perpetrator first arrive? Leave?

3. When was the offense discovered? By whom?

4. When was the offense reported? By whom?

5. When was the offense recovered – date, time?

6. When was property purchased? Where? Price paid? Is there a receipt? Estimate of value at time of taking? Basis of estimate?

C. What

1. What exactly occurred during entire incident?

2. What exactly was said by perpetrator during entire incident?

3. What exactly was said by each of the witnesses during entire incident?

4. What property was taken by perpetrator?
   a. Complete detailed description.
   b. Unusual characteristics?
   c. How was item identified?

5. What tools were used to gain entrance? How used? Marks left on premises? Any recovered?

6. What weapon, if any, did perpetrator use? (Describe weapon and use.)

7. What items, if any, did perpetrator leave at premises? Where are they now?

8. What information was reported to police?

9. What information was reported to insurance company? When? Where? What company? Result?

10. Was the complainant told by the insurance company that no recovery was possible unless a report was first made to the police?

D. How

1. How did the perpetrator arrive? Depart? (Mode of transportation.)

2. How did perpetrator gain entrance to premises where the property was? How did the perpetrator depart the house? (Detail each.)
   a. Breaking?
   b. Jimmying?
   c. Picking locks?
   d. Slipping locks?
   e. Unlocked entrance?
   f. Let in by occupant?

3. How was any property removed from the premises?

4. How was the property recovered?

E. Who

Answers to questions contained in General Identification section should be obtained, if applicable.

VI. UNAUTHORIZED USE OF MOTOR VEHICLE

A. Where

1. Where was car taken from? Address? Exact location at this address?

2. Where was the car's driver? Address?

3. Where was the car recovered? Address? Exact location at this address?

B. When

1. When was the car taken – date, time? Basis for estimate?

2. When was the car discovered missing – date, time? Basis for estimate?

3. When was the car reported missing – date, time?

4. When was the car driven after the theft – date, time? Duration?

5. When was the car recovered – date, time?

6. When was the defendant arrested – date, time? Statements? Others with defendant? Who was driving? Where in the car was defendant?

C. What

1. What kind of car – make, model, year, color, license plate number, manufacturer's number, mileage at time of taking and recovery, condition at time of taking and recovery.

2. What items, if any, were removed from the car by the user?

3. What items, if any, belonging to user were left in the car?

4. What portion of the car was dusted for prints?

5. From what portion of the car were prints lifted?

6. What prior relationship, if any, existed between the owner of vehicle and the defendant?

7. What police officers were involved in the case?

D. How

1. How was car taken?
   a. Keys in car?
   b. Car jumped?
   c. Another key used?
   d. Ignition locked/unlocked?
   e. Windows/door jimmied/broken?
   f. Slashed top?
   g. Tools used? Describe how.
   h. Permission to drive given to anyone?

2. How did participants arrive on scene? Depart?

E. Who

1. Who witnessed the removal? Recovery? (Details, names, addresses, and what seen.)

2. Who was in car at time of recovery? (Details, names, addresses, positions in car.)

3. Who reported vehicle stolen?

4. Who else participated in removal of vehicle? Use of vehicle?

VII. FALSE PRETENSES, FORGERY, AND UTTERING

A. Where

1. Where did the offense take place (address)?
2. Where specifically did the exchange occur at this address?
3. Where specifically was the defendant during the entire incident?
4. Where specifically were all witnesses located during the entire incident?

B. When

1. When did offense occur – date, time?
2. When did the forger/utterer first arrive?
3. When did the forger/utterer leave?
4. When was the offense reported?
5. When was the property recovered?

C. What

1. What exactly occurred during the entire incident?
2. What exactly was said by forger/utterer during the entire incident?
3. What exactly was said by all witnesses to the incident?
4. What type of identification did forger/utterer use?
5. What type of instrument was used by forger/utterer (check, credit card, etc.)?
6. What property and/or money did forger/utterer get?
   a. Complete detailed description?
   b. When purchased?
   c. Value (at time of purchase and at time of taking)?
   d. How is item identified?
   e. Any unusual characteristics?
   f. Condition at time of purchase and time of recovery?

7. What names were on the instrument?
   a. Payee?
   b. Maker?
   c. Endorser?

8. What exactly did forger/utterer write?
   a. When?
   b. Where?
   c. In whose presence?

D. Who

1. Who else was with forger/utterer? (Detail everything they said and did during entire incident.)

2. Who reported incident?

3. Who responded (MPD, FBI, Secret Service)? Detail everything that transpired thereafter.

E. Photograph

Was photograph of forger/utterer taken when the instrument was passed? If so, where was camera, where was forger/utterer at the time of picture, where is picture now?

F. Handwriting Analysis

This is generally applicable if interviewing the arresting or investigating officer. Probe all the details surrounding the taking of a handwriting sample from the defendant: when, where, who was present, what was written, what was said by all, waiver obtained, etc.

COMPETENCE TO STAND TRIAL

As scientific understanding of the human brain, mental illness and cognition has expanded, so has the responsibility of criminal defense lawyers to consider the many ways in which the mental state of an individual may relate to his or her defense in a criminal case. Navigating effectively in an area where mental health and criminal defense intersect is challenging and highly specialized work. Both the subject matter and the strategic issues are complex. In addition, establishing a constructive attorney-client relationship requires skill, sensitivity and, typically, a great deal of time. For assistance in effectively representing individuals with mental illness or mental retardation, counsel may consider calling upon the attorneys at the Mental Health Division (MHD) of the Public Defender Service, which is located on the grounds of Saint Elizabeth's Hospital. MHD can be reached at (202) 824-2860.

This chapter begins with an examination of the legal standards for trial competence, and moves on to explore the practical aspects of litigating that issue in Superior Court. Although this discussion focuses on competence to stand trial, counsel should be aware that mental impairments that implicate trial competence may also have relevance to other important aspects of the defense case, including reliability of confessions validity of waivers of rights (e.g. Miranda, consent to search), and others. A client who is or becomes competent for trial may nevertheless have lacked the ability to knowingly and voluntarily relinquish his or her rights, or may have been particularly vulnerable to the coercive pressures of interrogation. Counsel may also wish to explore the viability of an insanity defense in rare cases involving clients charged with serious offenses who exhibited symptoms of a substantial mental disorder at the time of the offense. See infra Chapter 34 for a discussion of the insanity defense.

Blakeney v. United States*, 77 A.3d 328 (D.C. 2013). Trial judge did not abuse his discretion in finding there was ample contemporaneous material to support valid retrospective competency evaluation by mental health experts where neither expert questioned feasibility of making valid retrospective assessment of competence, mental health history was well-documented, and defense attorneys were able to describe defendant's interactions with them and their perceptions of his competence leading up to and at trial.

Hooker v. United States*, 70 A.3d 1197 (D.C. 2013). Trial court did not abuse its discretion in declining to vacate conviction and order new trial, instead ordering retrospective competency examination of defendant, where case had proceeded to trial one week after and in front of judge unaware of preliminary incompetency conclusion by Department of Mental Health psychologist and recommendation of motions judge to wait 45 days to schedule next hearing where retrospective hearing took place less than one year after trial, trial court had expressed misgivings about DMH psychologist's preliminary findings, and trial court itself had observed at trial "nothing to suggest that [defendant] was not competent."

Hargraves v. United States*, 62 A.3d 107 (D.C. 2013) (amended). Trial judge did not err in determining, without holding hearing, that defendant was competent to stand trial based upon St. Elizabeths' finding of competence. See Bennett v. United States, 400 A.2d 322, 325 (D.C. 1979).

I. STANDARDS FOR DETERMINING COMPETENCE

A. The Controlling Legal Principles

1. The Dusky Standard and Due Process

Competence to stand trial requires that the accused have "sufficient present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding," and a "rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him." Dusky v. United States, 362 U.S. 402 (1960). Trial of one who is incompetent violates due process. Cooper v. Oklahoma, 517 U.S. 348 (1996); Medina v. California, 505 U.S. 437 (1992); Drope v. Missouri, 420 U.S. 162 (1975); Pate v. Robinson, 383 U.S. 375 (1966). It is not enough for the individual simply to be "oriented to time and place and [have] some recollection of events." Dusky, 362 U.S. at 402. A person who "lacks the capacity to understand the nature and object of the proceedings against him, to consult with counsel, and to assist in preparing his defense may not be subjected to a trial." Drope, 420 U.S. at 171.

> Unless a defendant is competent, the State cannot put him on trial. Competence to stand trial is rudimentary, for upon it depends the main part of those rights deemed essential to a fair trial, including the right to effective assistance of counsel, the rights to summon, to confront, and to cross examine witnesses, and the right to testify on one's own behalf or to remain silent without penalty for doing so.

In the case that held the Dusky standard for competence applicable to children in juvenile delinquency proceedings, the Court of Appeals explained the due process requirement this way:

> In an adult criminal prosecution, the purpose of an inquiry into an accused's competency is twofold: first, to assure that the accused understands the nature of the proceedings against him and is able to consult with his lawyer in order to prepare a defense, recognizing that a proper defense is essential to the accuracy of the guilt determination process, and, second, 'to prevent the infliction of punishment upon a person so lacking in mental capacity as to be unable to understand the nature and purpose of the punishment.

[1] See also Medina, 505 U.S. at 457-458 (Blackmun, J., dissenting), "In the words of […] one of the world's leading criminologists, incompetent persons 'are not really present at trial; they may not be able properly to play the role of an accused person, to recall relevant events, to produce evidence and witnesses, to testify effectively on their own behalf, to help confront hostile witnesses, and to project to the trier of facts a sense of their innocence.' Norval Morris, Madness and the Criminal Law 37 (1982)."

In re W.A.F., 573 A.2d 1264, 1267 (D.C. 1990) (citations omitted).

2. Competence may be Raised at any Time

The question of a defendant's competence to proceed may be raised at anytime before trial, during trial, or after trial. D.C. Code § 24-531.02(a) provides that "[a] defendant shall not be tried, sentenced, enter a guilty plea, or be subject to revocation of probation or a transfer proceeding if the court determines that the defendant is incompetent." Thus, it is never untimely to raise a question concerning a client's competence. "[T]he right not to stand trial while incompetent is sufficiently important to merit protection even if the defendant has failed to make a timely request for a competency evaluation." Cooper, 517 U.S. at 354. In Drope, the trial judge denied defense counsel's continuance motion requesting a psychiatric evaluation, and then failed to suspend trial for a competence hearing in spite of accumulating evidence of the petitioner's disturbed mental state. The Supreme Court reversed for the violation of due process: "Even when a defendant is competent at the commencement of his trial, a trial court must always be alert to circumstances suggesting a change that would render the accused unable to meet the standards of competence to stand trial." 420 U.S. at 181.

Courts are, however, understandably reluctant to entertain motions that unexpectedly prevent a trial from proceeding on the scheduled date. In Thorne v. United States, 471 A.2d 247, 249 (D.C. 1983), the court applied an abuse of discretion standard and affirmed the trial court's denial of a day-of-trial request for a competence determination, where the defense had failed to present prima facie evidence in support of its request. See also Lopez v. United States, 373 A.2d 882, 884 (D.C. 1977) (affirming trial court's decision not to hold an additional hearing on competence where previous determinations were based on the certificate of Saint Elizabeth's Hospital, three letters from a forensic psychiatrist, several long, detailed conversations between the judge and the defendant that illustrated his understanding of the case and the criminal justice process, and the defendant's unequivocal desire to proceed to trial and strenuous objection to a competence hearing).

3. Relationship Between Competence to Stand Trial and Competence to Waive Rights

Resolving a split among the federal circuits, Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389 (1993) held that a defendant who pleads guilty or waives the assistance of counsel need not demonstrate a higher degree of competence than that required to stand trial. A defendant who is competent to stand trial is necessarily competent to waive the rights associated with it. However, the Court cautioned that a finding of competence does not satisfy and is distinct from the requirement of a "knowing and voluntary" waiver of the right. While the focus of a competence inquiry is the defendant's mental capacity and whether he presently has the ability to understand, "[t]he purpose of the 'knowing and voluntary' inquiry, by contrast, is to determine whether the defendant actually does understand the significance and consequences of a particular decision and whether the decision is uncoerced." Id. at 401 n.12 (citations omitted). "In this sense there is a 'heightened' standard for pleading guilty and for waiving the right to counsel, but it is not a heightened standard of competence." Id. at 400-401.

Extra care must be taken when a defendant whose competence has been in question seeks to plead guilty. Likewise, a motion to withdraw a guilty plea submitted on behalf of such a defendant warrants careful review. "If issues of competency have been raised on the record, the trial court must conduct 'a specialized hearing to determine the competence of a defendant who seeks to plead guilty.'" Pierce v. United States, 705 A.2d 1086, 1089 (D.C. 1997) (citations omitted); see also Hunter v. United States, 548 A.2d 806 (D.C. 1988) (reversing where trial court denied, without a "specialized inquiry," appellant's motion to withdraw guilty plea, relying on the court's "personal observations" of appellant).

Since a knowing and voluntary waiver of a constitutional right requires competence as a threshold matter, a defendant whose competence is disputed should not be permitted to proceed pro se. "[W]here a defendant's competence to stand trial is reasonably in question, a court may not allow that defendant to waive her right to counsel and proceed pro se until the issue of competency has been resolved." United States v. Klat, 156 F.3d at 1258 (D.C. Cir. 1998). Indeed, where a competent defendant seeks to waive counsel and proceed to trial, the court may not accept the defendant's waiver unless it also determines that the defendant is competent to conduct his or her own defense. Indiana v. Edwards, 128 S. Ct. 2379, 2387-88 (2009).

B. What Is Competence in Real Terms

The Dusky standard involves legal conclusions; they are the end of the inquiry, not the inquiry itself. Usually, the inquiry begins with determining whether the defendant is laboring under a mental impairment and, if so, the precise nature of the impairment. The standard diagnostic reference used in the United States, the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (4th ed. text rev. 2000) ("DSM") (available from American Psychiatric Association Press, Inc., 1400 K Street, N.W., Suite 1101, Washington, D.C. 20005) contains a taxonomy of a vast array of psychological disorders. However, whether a defendant's condition satisfies the diagnostic criteria for any given disorder listed in the manual is not, by itself, determinative of the question of competence to stand trial. A person can have a diagnosable mental disorder and be able to consult rationally with counsel and assist in his defense. Conversely, a person may have a condition that is not listed in the DSM as a discrete mental disorder, and yet be incompetent to proceed. See Wilson v. United States, 391 F.2d 460, 463-64 (D.C. Cir. 1968) (analyzing impact on defendant's competence of retrograde amnesia he sustained in crash that occurred during police pursuit).

A discriminating functional analysis of the impact of a defendant's condition is necessary. The "Competence to Stand Trial Instrument" (CSTI), designed by the Laboratory of Community Psychiatry, formerly part of the Harvard Medical School, contains a useful analytical framework.[2] The CSTI requires evaluation of thirteen functions "related to what is required of a defendant in criminal proceedings in order that he may adequately cope with and protect himself in such proceedings." Id. It was designed to standardize, objectify, and qualify criteria for competence in terms relevant to, and understood by, both the legal and medical professions. It provides an excellent focus of inquiry in functional terms on the specific areas in which the client's capacity is in doubt, including, inter alia, » appraisal of available legal defenses;

[2] Competency to Stand Trial and Mental Illness, a monograph sponsored by the Center for Studies of Crime and Delinquency, National Institute of Mental Health, DHEW Pub. No. (HSM) 73-9105 (1973).

» unmanageable behavior;
» quality of relating to counsel and planning of legal strategy;
» understanding of court procedure;
» appreciation of charges and nature of possible penalties; and » capacity to disclose to counsel pertinent facts.

A degree of impairment in a particular function does not automatically render the accused incompetent. Ultimately, the court must consider the impairment in the context of the particular case or proceeding. As the designers of the CSTI state:

> [O]ne or another of the items will not be equal nor is it intended to be. Neither will the weight assigned to a given item by the court in reaching a finding on competence for a particular defendant necessarily apply to the next defendant. Considerations of the weight to be assigned a given item in the case of a particular defendant goes [sic] beyond the scope of what should be expected of the examining clinician. The task for the clinician is the providing of objective data, the import of which is the responsibility of the Court.

Id. at 99-100 (emphasis added).[3]

The decision in United States v. Duhon, 104 F. Supp.2d 663 (W.D. La. 2000) serves as an illustrative example of the painstaking analysis the court must undertake in order to meaningfully assess a defendant's competence. Duhon involved a mentally retarded defendant with significant cognitive impairment due to mental retardation. Doctors at the Federal Correctional Institution in Butner certified Duhon as competent for trial after several months of competence restoration classes (similar to those provided at Saint Elizabeth's Hospital),[4] in which incompetent defendants are taught and drilled on basic criminal justice concepts, such as the roles of counsel, court and jury. Not satisfied that Mr. Duhon's ability to retain and recite words was a valid indicator of his competence, the court conducted a hearing to more fully explore Duhon's capacity to participate in his defense and concluded that he was incompetent. Id. at 663-76. In so ruling, the court underscored the importance of tailoring the competence inquiry to the specific disability in issue, emphasizing that the focus of a competence inquiry for an individual with mental retardation will be quite different from the focus for a client with mental illness. Id. at 671.

Duhon is indicative of a small number of reported decisions that acknowledge the importance of the defendant possessing "decisional" competence. Decisional competence can be conceptualized as the capacity to make "critical defendant-driven decisions in a minimally rational and self-protective manner."[5] In other words, beyond understanding the judicial process, the roles of the various players, the nature of the charges, the potential penalties if convicted, a defendant must be able to make rational, self-interested choices concerning the litigation, especially those choices that are indisputably reserved to the defendant personally: whether to plead guilty or not, whether to try the case to a jury or a judge, and whether to testify or not. This decision-making component of adjudicative competence is implicit in that part of the Dusky formulation that requires a defendant to have "sufficient present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding." 362 U.S. at 402. See Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389, 398 (1993) (applying Dusky standard to guilty pleas and cataloging the variety of decisions defendants are called upon to make).

Nonetheless, forensic examiners typically devote little attention if any to the quality of a defendant's decision-making. Defense counsel's role uniquely positions him or her to appraise the defendant's decision-making. If counsel perceives that a client's mental impairment is causing him or her to make irrational, self-destructive decisions about the litigation, counsel should carefully consider whether to make an issue of the client's competence to proceed, guided by the considerations discussed in section II.B.

II. PRACTICAL ASPECTS OF COMPETENCE ISSUES

Competence issues usually surface on first contact with the client and require immediate decisions with important consequences. The Pretrial Services Agency report may refer to recent psychiatric hospitalization, or indicate that the client refused to cooperate with the interviewer or was incoherent. The deputy marshals in the cellblock may inform counsel that the client has been acting strangely. The client's friends or relatives may relate a history of mental instability, and, of course, counsel may notice a problem during the cellblock interview. During the brief period between first contact with a client and arraignment or presentment, counsel must decide whether to pursue the question of competence on the record. As discussed below, raising the issue may well have serious consequences, including commitment for a mental evaluation; it may also jeopardize the client's interests with respect to the bail determination. Counsel must be familiar with the procedures followed when questions about the client's mental condition are raised, and take into account certain basic tactical and practical considerations.

A. The Procedural Framework

In 2004, the District of Columbia enacted the Incompetent Defendants Criminal Commitment Act, (D.C. Law 15-358, codified at D.C. Code § 24-531.01 et. seq.) (hereinafter the "2004 Act"), establishing a comprehensive procedural framework for addressing issues raised concerning a defendant's competence to proceed. (See Appendix A for Summary of Mental Examination and Treatment Procedures). Before the 2004 Act took effect, procedures for handling competence issues were governed by D.C. Code § 24-501(a), Super. Ct. Crim. R. 120, and a set of procedural guidelines adopted by the Superior Court, entitled "Court Procedures for Mental Examination of Criminal Defendants."[6] The 2004 Act repealed Section 24-501(a) and replaced it with a [6] The status of these guidelines prior to the 2004 Act was described in the Comment to Rule 120: "[i]n making any determination pursuant to this rule or considering any other course of action with respect to pre-trial mental examinations of a criminal defendant, the Court shall be guided by . . . 'Court Procedures for Mental Examination of comprehensive statutory scheme. It is important to note that, though Rule 120 and the court's procedural guidelines are still useful references, they are inconsistent with the new statute in several respects and to that extent are superseded. The following sections summarize the key provisions of the 2004 Act, organized into five distinct phases of the pretrial competence process. This summary appears in a more condensed version in Appendix A to this chapter. However, inasmuch as the Act is rather intricate, neither the following narrative nor the appendix is intended to substitute for a close and careful reading of the Act when the need arises.

1. Screening Phase – D.C. Code §§ 24-531.03(a) through (c)

At any point in an adult criminal prosecution, a probation revocation, or a juvenile transfer proceeding, the court may order an examination of the defendant's competence at the request of either party or on its own initiative. However, the court must have a screening examination done before considering whether to order a full competence examination. The screening examination will be performed either in the cellblock or on an outpatient basis, depending on whether the defendant is released or not. The court may be inclined to postpone the release decision pending receipt of the examination results. However, the statute is clear that the screening examination "shall not delay" the court's determination of either probable cause or bond. D.C. Code § 24-531.02(b)(1). Similarly, the fact that the defendant's competence has been questioned cannot be weighed against his eligibility for release at this stage. See D.C. Code § 24.531.02(b)(2). The court must set a return date on the screening exam no more than five days later if the defendant is to be released; no more than three days if the defendant is not released.

Screening examinations are conducted by psychiatrists and psychologists employed by the District of Columbia Department of Mental Health, Pre-Trial and Assessment Services Division. Outpatient exams are performed at the Division's Field Office located in Room C-255 at the courthouse. The field office may be reached at (202) 879-1758. If the defendant is not released, the screening examination is conducted in the cellblock, usually the same day. The division typically returns a report of a cellblock examination the same day or the next business day.

In determining whether to order a full examination and where such an exam will take place, the court must consider the screening report, the arguments of counsel, and any other information available to it. Typically, the court will rely heavily on the screening report in deciding what action to take. Therefore, counsel should not hesitate to contact the examiner before the report is completed in order to furnish the examiner with information about the client's past mental health, counsel's observations of the client during the initial interview, and counsel's own views of the client's competence and the appropriate setting for any further evaluation. The examiner may also be willing to allow counsel to be present during the interview of the defendant.

The report will consist of a brief summary of the interview and a conclusion either that the defendant is competent, or incompetent, or that further evaluation is needed. Though the court is likely to rely on the report, it is not bound by the report, and counsel should freely offer his own observations and arguments to the court regarding the defendant's competence. For instance, the report may overstate incompetence if the examiner fails to take into account the exhaustion and stress that many defendants, especially those with mental illness, experience due to arrest, booking, overnight detention, and presentment.

The report may also contain recommendations not required by the statute, such as whether the defendant needs mental health treatment, and whether such treatment can be provided in the community or whether the defendant should be hospitalized. These recommendations may be helpful to a court in determining whether to condition a defendant's release on obtaining mental health treatment, see D.C. Code § 23-1321(c)(1)(B)(x), but they are not directly relevant to the statutory criteria, discussed in the next section below, for determining whether to order full examination on an outpatient or inpatient basis.

2. Full Examination Phase – D.C. Code §§ 24-531.03(d) through (g)

If the court decides to order a full competence examination,[7] it must determine whether the examination will be done on an outpatient or inpatient basis. The court may not order an inpatient examination unless it makes a case-specific finding that either an inpatient setting is necessary to conduct an adequate exam, or the defendant is unlikely to comply with outpatient examination. If the defendant is released, the evaluation will be done at the Pre-Trial and Assessment Services Field Office. If the client is detained, the Pre-Trial and Assessment Services doctors will go to the jail to conduct the "outpatient" exam.

If the court decides that an inpatient setting is warranted, it may commit the defendant directly to Saint Elizabeth's Hospital[8] or leave it to the Department of Mental Health ("DMH") to place the defendant in a suitable inpatient facility. Inpatient facilities include Saint Elizabeth's Hospital, other physically secure hospitals for the examination or treatment of persons with mental illness, and physically secure or staff-secure facilities for the examination, treatment, or habilitation of persons with mental retardation. D.C. Code § 24-531.01(6).[9] In any case, the examination must be conducted by doctors affiliated with DMH. The court must schedule a hearing for no more [7] Whenever a full competence exam is ordered, the court may, by design or inadvertence, order a concurrent examination of the defendant's state of mind at the time of the alleged offense. Inherent in this "productivity" or "criminal responsibility" examination is detailed questioning about the circumstances of the offense. Since such questioning implicates the Fifth Amendment, the examination cannot be ordered unless: (1) the defendant affirmatively raises the insanity defense; (2) the defendant has been found to lack the capacity to waive the defense; or (3) the court reasonably concludes that such questioning is necessary to determine the defendant's capacity to waive the defense. See Briggs v. United States, 525 A.2d 583 (D.C. 1987); Anderson v. Sorrell, 481 A.2d 766 (D.C. 1984); Frendak v. United States, 408 A.2d 364 (D.C. 1979). Counsel should view the form court order to ensure that it has been filled out correctly.

[8] If the court orders an inpatient examination at Saint Elizabeth's, but a hospital bed is not available, the court may not lawfully postpone a release determination under the Bail Reform Act in order to keep a defendant at the jail until a hospital bed comes available. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 120(2). If the screening report recommends emergency hospitalization and the court agrees it is warranted, the court may order emergency hospitalization, provided a statutory basis for hospitalization otherwise exists. Id.; D.C. Code § 24-531.03(e). In such cases, Saint Elizabeth's typically admits the person even if the hospital is already at capacity.

[9] Prior to the 2004 Act, the court could only commit to Saint Elizabeth's Hospital for inpatient examination. As of this writing, DMH has not made any arrangements for placing defendants in inpatient facilities other than Saint Elizabeth's.

than 30 days later for inpatient exams and 45 days for outpatient exams. For good cause shown, the court can postpone the hearing for up to 15 days.[10]

3. Judicial Determination of Competence – D.C. Code §§ 24-531.03(d), (f), (g) and 24-531.04(c)

Regardless of the scheduled return date, DMH must submit a report to the court as soon as it reaches a conclusion that: (1) the defendant is competent; (2) the defendant is incompetent; (3) an inpatient setting is no longer warranted; or (4) an outpatient setting is no longer warranted. If the report indicates the defendant is incompetent, it must also indicate the likelihood of the defendant attaining competence in the foreseeable future, or state that no opinion has been formed yet on the likelihood. If the court receives a report concerning an inpatient more than one court day prior to the scheduled return date, the court must hold a hearing the next day and have the defendant brought to court. If the court receives a report that an outpatient requires an inpatient setting, it shall schedule a hearing as soon as practicable.

At the hearing, any doctors who participated in the examination must make themselves available to testify. The defendant is presumed to be competent and the party asserting incompetence has the burden of proving incompetence by a preponderance of the evidence. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court must: (1) find that the defendant is competent; or (2) find that the defendant is incompetent; and (i) is likely to attain competence in the foreseeable future; (ii) additional time is necessary to assess whether the defendant is likely to attain competence in the foreseeable future; or (iii) is unlikely to attain competence in the foreseeable future.[11]

If the court finds that the client is competent to stand trial, then the criminal case resumes and counsel must take all necessary steps to protect the client's traditional rights. In particular, counsel should ensure that a bond determination is made or the previous determination is reviewed. See Super Ct. Crim. R. 120(3). Counsel should review with the client in detail the results of the investigation and the legal steps taken during the pendency of the competence determination.[12]

[10] Court orders regarding competence examinations are appealable as collateral orders, United States v. Weissberger, 951 F.2d 392, 395-97 (D.C. Cir. 1991); Farrell v. United States, 646 A.2d 963, 964 (1994), but the standard of appellate review is onerous. For instance, refusal to order a psychiatric examination is reversible only if it is clearly arbitrary and erroneous. Holt v. United States, 486 A.2d 705, 707-08 (D.C. 1985) (trial court found record ''wholly bereft'' of any indication of need for such a report). Johnson v. United States, 633 A.2d 828 (D.C. 1993), upheld a refusal to grant a competence evaluation requested several months after sentencing because the defendant could not satisfy the manifest injustice standard for withdrawal of a guilty plea.

[11] If the only issue raised by the report is the appropriateness of the setting, the court must make new findings on the issue. If the court orders a change from inpatient to outpatient setting, it must determine the defendant's eligibility for pre-trial release if it did not do so previously. § 24-531.03(e), (f)(2)(C), and (g)(2).

[12] Where there appears to be a viable insanity defense, counsel must thoroughly and carefully discuss with the client whether to raise the defense. It is vital that the client understand that an insanity acquittal will likely entail a lengthy period of confinement, followed by an indeterminate period of court-supervised release. This is especially important in misdemeanor or low-level felony cases, when a successful insanity defense may well result in more time in custody than a conviction would. If the defense and the government ultimately agree to a stipulated not-guilty-by-reason-of-insanity proceeding, counsel should insist that the court conduct a thorough inquiry to confirm that the client's reliance on the insanity defense is knowing and voluntary. See Walls v. United States, 601 A.2d 54, 57

If the defendant is incompetent and the court makes either finding under (i) or (ii) above, then the court must order treatment for the restoration of competence. If the court finds the defendant to be incompetent and unlikely to attain competence in the foreseeable future, the court must dispense with ordering restoration treatment and proceed to the extended treatment phase discussed below. This latter alternative should enable persons with untreatable conditions such as moderate to severe mental retardation to avoid lengthy and pointless hospitalization, a disposition that was statutorily mandated prior to the 2004 Act. See Farrell v. United States, 646 A.2d 963, 964-65 (D.C. 1994) (statutorily-mandated inpatient commitment following judicial finding of incompetence for trial did not violate due process).

4. Competence Restoration Treatment – D.C. Code §§ 24-531.05 and 24-531.06

If the court orders competence restoration treatment, it must order treatment in the least restrictive setting consistent with the goal of restoration of competence. The court must order outpatient treatment, unless it finds either that an inpatient setting is necessary to provide appropriate treatment, or the defendant is unlikely to comply with an order for outpatient treatment. If the court orders inpatient treatment it may commit the person directly to Saint Elizabeth's Hospital or it may direct DMH or the Department on Developmental Disabilities ("DDS"), or both, to designate an appropriate inpatient treatment facility. If the court orders outpatient treatment, it will direct DMH or DDS, or both, to designate an appropriate treatment provider. Outpatient treatment providers are defined to include DMH, DDS, or an entity or individual that is designated by DMH or DDS to provide competence evaluation, treatment, or habilitation and is licensed or certified under D.C. law to provide services to persons with mental illness or mental retardation, or has entered into an agreement with the District to provide such services. § 24-531.01(10). Currently, defendants are ordered into the Outpatient Competence Restoration Program operated by DMH at its clinic at 35 K Street, N.E.

The court must hold a hearing when a period of treatment it has ordered ends or earlier if it receives a report from the treatment provider indicating that: (1) the defendant has attained competence; (2) there is no longer a substantial probability that a defendant will attain competence during the allowable treatment period; (3) an inpatient treatment setting is no longer warranted; or (4) an outpatient treatment setting is no longer warranted. The court must make findings as to the defendant's competence, and, if the defendant is incompetent, the prospects for attaining competence in the foreseeable future.

Subject to specific statutory limitations discussed below, the court can order commitment for restoration treatment for one or more successive periods of up to 180 days at a time, provided the court finds there is a substantial probability the defendant will attain competence or make substantial progress toward that goal. This comports with the Supreme Court's decision in Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715, 729-30 (1972), wherein the Court held that the mere existence of criminal charges cannot justify depriving a criminal defendant indefinitely of the protections local civil commitment laws afford to people not charged with a crime. Accordingly, the Court concluded that commitment of those deemed incompetent for trial can last only for:

(D.C. 1991) and Chapter 34 for a more thorough discussion of the procedures and commitment that are associated with an insanity acquittal.

> [t]he reasonable period of time necessary to determine whether there is a substantial probability that [the accused] will attain [trial fitness] in the foreseeable future. If it is determined that this is not the case, then the State must either institute the customary civil commitment proceeding that would be required to commit indefinitely any other citizen, or release the defendant.

Id. at 738 (footnote omitted). Even if recovery appears substantially probable, continuing commitment must be predicated on a showing that the defendant is actually progressing toward competence. Id.

Beyond the protection afforded by Jackson, the statute establishes absolute outside limits on how long commitment for competence restoration treatment can last in the most extreme cases. If the defendant is charged with a crime of violence as defined under the Bail Reform Act, the aggregate period of any inpatient confinement cannot exceed the maximum possible sentence the defendant could receive if convicted of the pending charges. For all other crimes, inpatient commitment cannot exceed the lesser of 180 days or the maximum possible sentence the defendant could receive. In addition, the court's commitment authority is also limited by statutorily-mandated dismissal of the underlying charges – after 180 days of treatment without restoration of competence (and after exhaustion of civil commitment proceedings) in non-violent cases, or after five years in all violent cases, except murder, first degree sexual abuse, and first degree child sexual abuse. See D.C. Code § 24-531.08.[13]

5. Extended Treatment Pending Civil Commitment – D.C. Code § 24-531.07

If (1) the court finds, based on the report of a treatment provider and any hearing on the report, that the defendant remains incompetent and it is not substantially probable that he will attain competence or make substantial progress toward that goal in the foreseeable future; or (2) the maximum allowable inpatient treatment period expires while the defendant is incompetent, the court must either release the person in the criminal case or authorize continued treatment for up to thirty days to allow for the filing of a civil commitment petition. D.C. Code §§ 24-531.05(d)(2), 24-531.06(c)(4). If a petition for civil commitment has already been filed, the court may order extended treatment pending final disposition of the petition. Id. and D.C. Code § 24-531.07(a)(2).

If the court orders continued treatment to allow for filing of a civil commitment petition, it must hold a status hearing 30 days later to determine whether a petition has been filed. If a petition has not been filed, the court must either release the defendant, or, upon extraordinary cause, allow five more days for the filing of a commitment petition. If the court orders the person's [13] These statutory time limits are tolled to the extent of any period of time when: (1) the defendant was unable to participate in a screening exam, a full competence exam, or treatment to restore competence due to physical incapacity; (2) the defendant failed or refused to participate in a screening exam, a full exam, or restoration treatment; (3) the defendant failed to appear for a screen, a full exam, or restoration treatment; and (4) a screen, a full exam, or treatment was delayed by a motion, petition, or appeal. D.C. Code § 24-531.11. However, if convicted, the defendant is entitled to credit against his sentence for any period during which he was committed as an inpatient for competence evaluation or treatment. D.C. Code § 24-531.05(d)(3).

release, it may stay the release for 48 hours to give DMH, DDS, or both the opportunity to initiate emergency civil proceedings for the person's detention. If a petition is filed within the initial thirty-days of extended treatment, the court may order the defendant's release from the criminal case, or continue treatment pending completion of the civil commitment proceedings. If the court orders the person's release in the criminal case, it must remand him to the inpatient facility. Upon remand to the inpatient facility, the defendant can request a mental health probable cause hearing (described in Chapter 14 of this manual) within the next seven days, and the hearing must be held within 24 hours.

B. Deciding the Defense Position on Competence and Court-Ordered Mental Examinations

In deciding whether to initiate or resist a competence exam in the first instance, counsel should look first to the client's wishes, and consult with the client to the extent the client's mental condition permits. Counsel should advise the client on the procedures for mental examinations, the reasons competence is in question, the possibility of hospitalization, and the likely impact a commitment for examination would have on the case. Once this information is explained, counsel should ascertain the client's wishes. As a general rule, absent the client's explicit assent, counsel should favor a competence examination only in the most dire circumstances, i.e., when the client is so mentally impaired that to go forward would substantially compromise the client's rights and place the client in serious jeopardy.[14] (See also Appendix B for flagging possible competency issues with client).

Counsel should not be quick to substitute his or her own judgment for that of the client. The client's choice may be based on reasoning that is quite rational although different from counsel's. A client may wish to avoid raising the issue because of the prospect of compulsory treatment, or unpleasant prior experiences with psychiatric hospitals, and may even prefer detention at the jail rather than the hospital. The client may wish to avoid the lasting stigma of mental illness that attaches when a competence study is ordered. If the offense charged is not very serious, the client may prefer to proceed to disposition of the case as quickly as possible. On the other hand, a client may favor commitment for examination with the hope that hospitalization will offer stabilization or refuge from a hostile world.

Even if the client appears irrational or communication is impossible, counsel should not jump to the conclusion that the defense should request or acquiesce in a mental examination order, especially in the early stages of the case. The exhausting and frightening pre-presentment process can impair the client's communicative ability. Subsequent contacts may yield better communication as counsel develops more familiarity and rapport with the client. The client may also be under the influence of drugs or alcohol, and a later interview will prove more fruitful.

[14] The Rules of Professional Conduct permit counsel to take protective action on behalf of mentally impaired clients who are unable to protect themselves from imminent and substantial harm, but counsel must: (a) maintain a typical client-lawyer relationship as far as reasonably possible; (b) take only such action as is reasonably necessary; and (c) make only those disclosures concerning the client that are reasonably necessary to protect the client's interests. See Rule 1.14 – Client with Diminished Capacity and Comment 7 to the rule. Moreover, counsel's first duties are to abide by the client's decisions "as to a plea to be entered, whether to waive jury trial, and whether the client will testify" (see Professional Rule 1.2(a)), and to zealously pursue the client's lawful stated objectives (see Professional Rule 1.3(b)). The client's impairment may substantially compromise his or her ability to make these key decisions rationally or to hold to self-interested objectives. The Professional Rules recognize that "[t]he lawyer's position in such cases is an unavoidably difficult one." Rule 1.14, Comment 8. For a thoughtful treatment of the subject, see J.D. King, Candor, Zeal, and the Substitution of Judgment: Ethics and the Mentally Ill Criminal Defendant, 58 Am. U. L. Rev. 207 (2008).

Tactical Disadvantages for Commitment: Commitment for mental examination creates substantial tactical disadvantages. It inevitably causes substantial delays, which may diminish the government's incentive to dispose of the case by way of a plea to a reduced charge. It can also result in a vulnerable client being subjected to the round-the-clock observation of hospital or correctional staff, who may question him or her about the offense and make a record of his or her responses. Although the 2004 Act prohibits the government from using statements the client makes during court-ordered examination, or using the fruits of those statements, it may be difficult for the defense to prove that evidence introduced by the government at trial actually derived from such statements. D.C. Code § 24-531.10.

Alternatives Means to Obtain Psychiatric Treatment: To the extent counsel perceives a need for psychiatric treatment there are alternative means to obtain it. The client can seek treatment, independently on a voluntary basis, or voluntary treatment can be required as a condition of pre-trial release. See D.C. Code § 23-1321(c)(1)(B)(x). The Pretrial Services Agency recently established a Specialized Supervision Unit (SSU) designed to supervise defendants with identified mental health needs. SSU oversees "Options," a program operated in conjunction with DMH and one of its contract providers to furnish intensive mental health services to the neediest defendants. Persons facing misdemeanors or other low-level offenses may be certified to the Mental Health Diversion Court, where they can enter into a deferred prosecution agreement and obtain a dismissal after a period of sustained participation in mental health treatment.

Obtaining release without a competence evaluation will allow the defense to explore the client's background more carefully and ultimately to make an un-pressured and informed decision on how, if at all, the client's mental condition should be made a part of the case. If a court-ordered mental exam cannot be avoided, an outpatient exam should be advocated. Then, at least, the client can remain at liberty and counsel can assist the client in obtaining treatment. Given the potential consequences of court-ordered examinations and the availability of alternatives for dealing with mental difficulties, counsel should resolve all doubts against the examination, particularly if that examination will be conducted on an inpatient basis.

Blakeney v. United States*, 77 A.3d 328 (D.C. 2013). Defense counsel must raise issue of defendant's competency with court if, considering all circumstances, objectively reasonable counsel would have reason to doubt defendant's competency.

C. Additional Considerations During Examination Phase

While a full competence evaluation is pending, counsel may and should file appropriate motions in the underlying case. At a minimum, counsel should demand a preliminary hearing under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5. The 2004 Act mandates that the court hear and decide any issue raised by motion of the defense or prosecution "if the defendant's presence is not constitutionally required, or, as determined by the court, essential for a fair hearing." D.C. Code § 24-531.02(c).

Generally, a defendant is not required to make significant tactical decisions at a preliminary hearing; indeed, the defendant's presence can be waived altogether. See generally United States v. Dalli, 424 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1970); United States v. McPherson, 421 F.2d 1127 (D.C. Cir. 1969); Dunnivan v. Peyton, 292 F. Supp. 173 (W.D. Va. 1968). Thus, the court must grant a preliminary hearing notwithstanding that the defendant's competence is in question.

Unless the case is dismissed, the competence examination will go forward and counsel must begin to prepare for the return. In practice, the examination report will be submitted to the court by DMH's Pre-Trial and Assessment Services Division in outpatient and jail exam cases and by the Forensic Inpatient Services Division in hospital exam cases.[15] If neither side objects to the report, it may be considered a sufficient basis for the court to make a finding as to the defendant's competence. If either party objects, the court must hold a hearing. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 102(3). At a hearing, the defendant is presumed to be competent as a matter of law, and the party asserting his incompetence has the burden of proof. D.C. Code § 24-531.04(b).

Counsel should contact the examiner well in advance of the hearing date to determine whether a hearing is likely and to begin preparing for it. Preparation for the hearing should be as comprehensive as for any other important proceeding where the outcome of the case and the client's liberty are at stake. Well in advance of the hearing, counsel should obtain medical records and other data concerning the client. Usually this will require a release signed by the client.[16] Counsel should interview both experts and lay witnesses with knowledge about the client's competence and share such information obtained from third parties as may be appropriate to the case.

Often, counsel must go beyond the four corners of the examiner's report. Counsel should review and obtain copies of all the underlying notes and records. This review may indicate the need to interview as prospective witnesses any other clinicians who have participated in the examination. If counsel deems it appropriate to have the client examined by a defense-selected expert, funds may be requested from the court through the use of a Criminal Justice Act voucher.

Any doctor who participated in the examination is required by statute to be available to testify at the hearing. D.C. Code § 24-531.03(d)(3). The defense may cross-examine[17] and call witnesses, [15] The Quality Assurance Branch of the Superior Court's Criminal Division, (202) 879-1361, is responsible for all court liaison with DMH in pre-trial competence matters. It prepares all mental examination orders and forwards them to the appropriate agencies, and receives reports from the various institutions that may be involved in mental health proceedings.

[16] Except in narrowly circumscribed situations, mental health care providers in the District of Columbia are prohibited from releasing mental health information without the patient furnishing written consent on a form which meets the requirements of both the Mental Health Information Act, D.C. Code §§ 7-1201.01 et seq., and federal regulations implementing "HIPAA," the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996. See Standards for Privacy of Individually Identifiable Health Information, 45 C.F.R. §§ 160 and 164 (2004). A standard form approved for this purpose by the Department of Mental Health appears as Form 3 in Appendix D to the Department's written privacy policy, available in Appendix D, on the Department's website at http://dmh. dc.gov/ dmh/frames.asp?doc=/dmh/lib/dmh/HIPAAPolicy645.1.pdf.

including the defendant, other experts, and lay witnesses, such as nursing and other staff members of any institution where the client may have been treated. Counsel's own observations of the client may be freely advanced, and counsel can invite the judge to take note of the client's demeanor in court. As noted above, such first-hand observations may be as probative as a psychiatric opinion. Lopez v. United States, 373 A.2d 882 (D.C. 1977); Whalen v. United States, 379 A.2d 1152 (D.C. 1977), rev'd on other grounds, 445 U.S. 684 (1980); United States v. David, 511 F.2d 355 (D.C. Cir. 1975).

Counsel should also make sure that the inquiry does not stray beyond the appropriate boundaries. Some examining clinicians, as well as prosecutors and judges, confuse or conflate such concepts as incompetence to stand trial, legal incompetence (e.g., incapacity to make a valid will), mental illness, need for psychiatric treatment, and dangerousness due to mental illness. Under Dusky, the only relevant factors are whether the defendant has a rational and factual understanding of the proceedings and the capacity to consult with counsel with a reasonable degree of rational understanding. 362 U.S. at 402. Counsel should insist that the court weigh the evidence only in light of these factors and make specific factual findings. See generally Blunt v. United States, 389 F.2d 545 (D.C. Cir. 1967); Hansford v. United States, 365 F.2d 920 (D.C. Cir. 1966) (per curiam).

D. Additional Considerations During Treatment Phase

Once competence restoration treatment is ordered, subsequent proceedings may demand even more from counsel. Whatever the anticipated outcome – restoration of competence or permanent incompetence – counsel should seek as prompt a resolution as possible. Pending such resolution, the client will remain confined to a maximum security unit at Saint Elizabeth's Hospital, or, at risk of being so confined if he or she falters in his or her compliance with outpatient restoration treatment. Counsel can help expedite a resolution by insisting on return dates of reasonable duration, keeping informed about the client's progress, and preparing in advance of the return dates, particularly where a contested hearing is anticipated.

If treatment concludes without the client attaining competence and the court orders extended treatment pending disposition of civil commitment proceedings, counsel should request that the court incorporate in its order explicit, self-executing language releasing the client from the criminal case upon disposition in the civil case. Otherwise, if the client obtains a favorable disposition in the civil case, i.e. outpatient status, or outright release, the client's ability to enjoy that status will be delayed pending a further appearance in the criminal case. In its capacity as the petitioner and custodian in civil commitment cases, DMH is authorized to discharge a patient at any point in the civil commitment proceeding. In addition, the Family Court can order dismissal of the petition and release of a patient if it determines that the patient does not meet the criteria for civil commitment. Unless the order in the criminal case clearly releases the client from the criminal case, the hospital will not exercise its discretion to release a defendant that it deems fit for release. Similarly, the order in the criminal case may conflict with any Family Court order granting relief in the civil commitment case.

E. Involuntary Medication

Some defendants object strenuously to taking psychotropic medication and counsel may be called upon to advocate for protection of the client's qualified right to refuse medication. The 2004 Act contains a provision, D.C. Code § 24-531.09(b), intended to codify the Supreme Court's decision in Sell v. United States, 539 U.S. 166 (2003). In Sell, the Court held that due process forbids the involuntary administration of antipsychotic drugs for the purpose of rendering a criminal defendant competent to stand trial, unless a court first makes several key factual determinations. First, the court must find that important governmental interests are at stake, considering the specific circumstances of the case. While the government's interest in bringing to trial an individual accused of a serious crime[18] is important, special circumstances may lessen its importance. For instance, a defendant's refusal to take drugs may mean lengthy confinement in the hospital, which would diminish the risk of freeing someone who has committed a serious crime. In addition, the government has a concomitant interest in assuring that the defendant has a fair trial. Second, the court must be satisfied that medicating the defendant will significantly further the state's interest in timely prosecution while also assuring a fair trial. It must find that it is substantially likely the defendant will attain competence and substantially unlikely that side effects will undermine his or her ability to assist counsel in conducting a defense. Third, the court must conclude that involuntary medication is necessary to further those interests, in that alternative, less intrusive treatments are unlikely to achieve substantially the same results. Finally, the court must find that administering the drugs is medically appropriate. 539 U.S. at 180-81.[19]

The Court pointed out, however, that its analysis was limited to scenarios where the sole rationale for proposing forced medication is to render the defendant competent for trial. It recognized that other justifications, such as dangerousness, may be invoked for involuntary medication and the inquiry in such situations would look much different and could vitiate the need to consider whether forced medication can be justified on competence-restoration grounds. Id. 182-83. The 2004 Act acknowledges this by providing that a criminal defendant may be administered medication involuntarily, on grounds other than competence restoration, if the procedures and standards of general application outside the criminal context are satisfied. D.C. Code § 24-109(a). See Mental Health Consumer's Rights Protection Act of 2001, D.C. Law 14-56 (codified at D.C. Code § 7-1231.08) and implementing regulations at 22A DCMR §§ 100 et. seq. (2004) ("Consent to Treatment"). In fact, Saint Elizabeth's Hospital routinely initiates treatment from the moment defendants are admitted, even if the court has only ordered examination and not competence restoration treatment. Consequently, involuntary medication issues could arise at the very outset of the evaluation process. Assisting criminal defendants confronted with involuntary medication under these generally applicable standards is a highly [18] The Act defines serious crime as a dangerous crime or crime of violence within the meaning of the Bail Reform Act, D.C. Code §§ 23-1331(3) and (4).

[19] In so ruling, the Supreme Court effectively overruled an earlier decision issued by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals in Khiem v. United States II, 612 A.2d 160 (D.C. 1992). In Khiem, the court had ruled that incompetent criminal defendants enjoy "due process protection only from an unreasonable or arbitrary determination that involuntary medication is appropriate." 612 A.2d at 166. The court upheld an internal hospital protocol for arriving at the involuntary medication decision, and affirmed the trial court's deferential review of that decision. Id. at 171-73.

SUMMARY OF MENTAL EXAMINATION AND TREATMENT PROCEDURES
Under the Incompetent Defendants Criminal Commitment Act of 2004

This outline summarizes the provisions of the "Incompetent Defendants Criminal Commitment Act of 2004," D.C. Law 15-358, that govern the process for examination and treatment of criminal defendants whose competence to proceed has been called into question. It does not address other provisions of the Act such as general provisions and provisions dealing with involuntary medication. Citations are to the codification, which appears at D.C. Code § 24-531.01 et seq.

EXAMINATION PHASE

Screening examination:

- Court must order a screening examination before it can order a full competence examination. § 531.03(b).

- Ordering a screen does not eliminate requirement that probable cause be found or that a determination be made concerning release or detention. § 531.02(b)(1).

- If the defendant is detained, the exam will be done in the cellblock and the court must set as early a return as possible, in no event more than three days later. §§ 531.03(c)(1) & (2).

- If the defendant is released, the exam will be done on an outpatient basis and the court must set a return date no more than five business days later. Id.

- Examiner must submit written report to court in advance of return, indicating "whether the defendant is competent, incompetent, or whether further evaluation is needed" to reach a preliminary determination. § 531.03(c)(3).

- On return of report, court must consider the report, arguments of the parties, and any other information available, and either find the defendant competent, or order a full examination. § 531.03(c)(4).

Full examination:

- Court will order DMH to conduct the exam and submit a written report. §§ 531.03(d)(1) & (2).

- Court must order outpatient[20] examination unless it finds that:
  - placement in an inpatient treatment facility is necessary in order to conduct an adequate examination, or
  - the defendant is unlikely to comply with an order for an outpatient examination. § 531.03(e)[21]

- If court chooses an inpatient setting, it can commit directly to Saint Elizabeth's or it can commit to DMH and let DMH select an appropriate inpatient facility. § 531.03(e).

- Inpatient treatment facilities are defined to include:
  - Saint Elizabeth's Hospital,
  - other physically secure hospitals for the examination or treatment of persons with mental illness, and
  - physically secure or staff-secure facilities for the examination, treatment, or habilitation of persons with mental retardation. § 531.01(6). [22]

- In any case, the exam must be done by a psychiatrist or psychologist affiliated with DMH. § 531.03(d)(1).

- If the defendant is hospitalized or detained, a return date no more than 30 days away must be set; no more than 45 days for released defendants. § 531.04(a)(1); see also § 531.03(f)(1). For good cause shown, the court can postpone the hearing for up to 15 days. § 531.04(a)(2).

Reporting:

- DMH must submit a report to the court in advance of the return date, and
  - for inpatients as soon as it reaches a conclusion that:
    - the defendant is competent
    - the defendant is incompetent, or
    - an inpatient setting is no longer necessary to conduct an adequate examination and the defendant would not be unlikely to comply with outpatient examination (§ 531.03(f)(2)(A));
  - for outpatients, anytime it determines that an inpatient setting is necessary to conduct an adequate examination or the defendant is not complying with outpatient examination. § 531.03(g)(2).

- If the report indicates the defendant is incompetent, it must also [20] In this context "outpatient" really means non-hospital. In other words, detained defendants who are not ordered into an inpatient treatment facility will have "outpatient" exams at the jail.

[21] Dangerousness to self or others, standing alone, is not a permissible basis for inpatient commitment under this statute. Hospitalization on a voluntary or involuntary basis is available under the Ervin Act, D.C. Code § 21-541, et seq., and mental health services can be mandated as a condition of release under the Bail Reform Act.

[22] Currently, the only inpatient facility willing to accept adult defendants for competence evaluations is Saint Elizabeth's Hospital, regardless of whether the defendant has a mental illness or mental retardation.

  - indicate the likelihood of the defendant attaining competence in the foreseeable future, or
  - state that no opinion has been formed yet on the likelihood. § 531.03(f)(2)(B).

- If the court receives a report concerning an inpatient more than one court day prior to the scheduled return date, the court must hold a hearing the next day and have the defendant brought to court. § 531.03(f)(2)(D).

- If the court receives a report that an outpatient requires an inpatient setting, it shall schedule a hearing as soon as practicable. § 531.03(g)(2).

Hearing on the report:

- Any psychiatrist or psychologist who participated in the exam must make him/herself available to testify at the hearing. § 531.03(d)(3). The court may call its own witnesses and conduct its own inquiry. § 531.04(b).

- Defendants are presumed to be competent. The burden of proof rests with the party asserting incompetence and incompetence must be established by a preponderance of the evidence. § 531.04(b).

- After the hearing, the court must make findings regarding the defendant's competence, and, if incompetent, the likelihood of the defendant attaining competence in the foreseeable future. § 531.04(c)(1).

- If the court finds the person to be incompetent, it must order competence restoration treatment, unless it also finds that the person is unlikely to attain competence in the foreseeable future, in which case the court will proceed to the "Jackson phase" (see below). §§ 531.04(c)(3) & (4).

- If the report recommends a change of setting for the examination, the court must make new findings regarding the least restrictive setting and order the appropriate disposition. §§ 531.03(e), (f)(2)(C), and (g)(2).

TREATMENT PHASE

- The court must order treatment in the least restrictive setting consistent with the goal of attaining competence. § 531.05(a)(1). Accordingly, the court must order outpatient treatment, unless it finds that:

  - placement in an inpatient treatment facility is necessary in order to provide appropriate treatment; or

  - the defendant is unlikely to comply with an order for outpatient treatment. § 531.05(a)(2).[23]

- If the court orders inpatient treatment it may commit the person directly to Saint Elizabeth's Hospital or it may direct DMH or DDS (formerly "MRDDA"), or both, to designate an appropriate inpatient treatment facility. § 531.05(a)(3).

- If the court orders outpatient treatment, it must direct DMH or DDS, or both, to designate an appropriate treatment provider. Id.

- Outpatient treatment providers are defined to include:
  - DMH,
  - DDS, or
  - An entity or individual designated by DMH or DDS to provide competence evaluation, examination, treatment, or habilitation pursuant to this title that:
    - is licensed or certified under D.C. law to provide services to persons with MR or MI, or both; and
    - has entered into an agreement with the District to provide services to persons with MI or MR. § 531.01(10).

Duration of commitment for treatment:[24]

- Inpatient treatment/non-violent offenses: inpatient commitment for treatment cannot exceed the lesser of 180 days or the maximum possible sentence the defendant could receive if convicted of the pending charges. §§ 531.05(b) & (d).

- Inpatient treatment/violent offenses: court can order successive periods of inpatient treatment up to 180 days at a time, provided the aggregate period does not exceed the maximum possible sentence the defendant could receive if convicted of the pending charges, and provided the court finds:
  - there is a substantial probability the defendant will attain competence or make substantial progress toward that goal during the period to be ordered; and
  - inpatient treatment continues to be the least restrictive setting. §§ 531.05(c) & (d).

- If the defendant is still incompetent at the end of any maximum allowable period of inpatient treatment, the court must either order the person's release or authorize [23] As in the examination phase, dangerousness is not a permissible consideration in determining whether inpatient is the least restrictive setting for competence restoration treatment.

[24] The time limits summarized here are statutorily-created caps. Under the circumstances of individual cases, due process may require termination of treatment much earlier. See Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715, 738 (1972) (defendant may be held only for the reasonable period of time necessary to determine whether it is substantially probable he will attain competence in the foreseeable future; and any continued commitment must be justified by progress toward that goal).

- Outpatient treatment: in all cases, the court can order successive periods of outpatient treatment up to 180 days at a time, provided the court finds there is a substantial probability the defendant will attain competence or make substantial progress toward that goal during the period to be ordered. § 531.05(e)(1).

- Dismissal of charges: the duration of treatment, whether inpatient or outpatient, is also limited by the mandatory dismissal of charges: for non-violent offenses, charges must be dismissed if the defendant has not attained competence after 180 days of treatment and proceedings for the defendant's civil commitment are concluded or the opportunity for initiating such proceedings has expired. (See Jackson phase below). The corresponding time to dismissal for violent offenses, is five years. The statute exempts murder, first degree sexual abuse, and first degree child sexual abuse from mandatory dismissal. §§ 531.08(a) & (b).

- The foregoing time limits are tolled to the following extent:
  - Any time in which the defendant is unable to participate in a preliminary screening examination, a full competence examination, or treatment to restore competence due to physical incapacity;
  - Any time in which the defendant fails or refuses to participate in a preliminary screening examination, a full competence examination, or treatment to restore competence;
  - Any time due to the defendant's failure to appear for a preliminary screening examination, a full competence examination, or treatment to restore competence;
  - Any time from the filing of a motion or petition through its disposition, including any appeals, which prevents or delays the conduct of a preliminary screening examination, a full competence examination, or treatment to restore competence, including involuntary medication. § 531.11.[25]

Review hearings:

- The court must hold a hearing upon the completion of any treatment period ordered or upon receipt of a report from a treatment provider that reasonable grounds exist to believe that:
  - The defendant has attained competence;
  - There is no longer a substantial probability that the defendant will attain competence during the allowable treatment period;
  - (For inpatients) inpatient treatment is no longer the least restrictive setting
  - (For outpatients) outpatient treatment is no longer the appropriate setting. § 531.06(a).

[25] However, the defendant is entitled to full credit against any term of imprisonment he may later receive in the case for time committed to an inpatient treatment facility for competence examination or treatment. § 531.05(d)(3).

- In advance of any review hearing, the treatment provider must submit a report addressing:
    - The defendant's competence, including any progress or lack thereof made toward attaining competence;
    - Whether there is a substantial probability that the defendant will attain competence during the foreseeable future, or make substantial progress toward that goal;
    - (For inpatients) whether inpatient treatment continues to be the least restrictive setting;
    - (For outpatients) whether outpatient treatment continues to be the least restrictive setting. § 531.06(b).

- The court must hold a prompt hearing on the report and make findings as to:
    - The defendant's competence, and
    - If incompetent, the probability of attaining competence or making substantial progress in the foreseeable future, and
    - If further treatment is to be ordered, the least restrictive setting for such treatment. §§ 531.06(a) and (c)(1) through (c)(3).

"JACKSON" PHASE

- If the court finds the defendant incompetent and not likely to attain competence or make substantial progress in the foreseeable future, it must
    - Order the defendant's release, or
    - Order continued treatment in the least restrictive setting for up to 30 days to permit the initiation of civil commitment proceedings (§ 531.06(c)(4));[26] or
    - In cases involving mentally retarded defendants, place the individual with DDS for placement in an appropriate habilitative setting. See D.C. Code § 7-1303.12a(c).

- If it orders continued treatment, it must hold a status hearing 30 days later to determine whether civil commitment proceedings have been initiated. § 531.07(a).

    - If civil commitment proceedings have not begun, the court must either release the defendant, or, upon extraordinary cause, allow five more days for filing a commitment petition. § 531.07(a)(1).

        - If the court orders the person's release, it may stay the release for 48 hours to give DMH, DDS, or both the opportunity to initiate civil proceedings for the person's detention. § 531.07(d).

[26] In the unlikely event that a petition for civil commitment has already been filed, the court has the additional option of ordering continued treatment pending final disposition of the commitment proceeding. §§ 531.06(c)(4) and 531.07(a)(2).

- If a petition has been filed, the court can order the defendant's release or continued treatment pending completion of the civil commitment proceedings (§ 531.07(a)(2)), or, in cases involving mentally retarded defendants, place the individual with DDS for placement in an appropriate habilitative setting. See D.C. Code § 7-1303.12a(c).

    - If the court orders the release of a person committed to an inpatient treatment facility, it must remand the person to the facility.
    - Upon remand to the inpatient facility, the defendant can request a probable cause hearing within the next seven days, and the hearing must be held within 24 hours. §§ 531.07(b) & (c).

APPENDIX B

COMPETENCY ISSUES

1. Why are you here?
    - For treatment to become competent for trial

2. How do you become competent for trial?
    - Know your charge
    - Know what happens in court
    - Know the function of the judge, jury, prosecution, and defense attorneys
    - Be able to cooperate with your lawyer
    - Know what the police say you did
    - Know pleas and what happens when you take them

3. The next time you go to court, what type of hearing will you have?
    - Competency hearing

4. If the court finds you competent for trial, what will they do to you?
    - Set a date for you to enter a plea

5. What will the court do with you while you wait for your date to enter the plea?
    - The judge can do any of the following:
        - Put you out on bond
        - Release you on your own recognizance
        - Put you in jail
        - Send you back to St. Elizabeth's Hospital

6. What happens if the court finds you incompetent?
    - You are sent back to St. Elizabeth's for further treatment and your competency hearing is rescheduled

7. What happens if you never become competent?
    - Civil commitment proceedings are started. If the Mental Health Commission decides you are still dangerous to society or yourself, they recommend inpatient or outpatient commitment to the civil side of the hospital

8. How serious is your charge?
    - For a misdemeanor, you can receive up to one year for each offense
    - For a felony, you can receive from one year to life for each offense

9. What three pleas can you make to the judge?
    - Guilty
    - Not guilty
    - Not guilty by reason of insanity

10. What happens if you plead guilty?
    - The judge sentences you to either
        - Jail
        - Probation
        - Time served
        - Suspended sentence

11. If you plead guilty, what rights do you give up?
    - Right to a trial
    - Right to an appeal

12. What is probation?
    - A sentence in which you are living in the community under the supervision of a probation officer. Examples of probation requirements are:
        - No change of address
        - Mandatory drug screen for use of illicit drugs
        - Receive outpatient mental health treatment

13. What happens if you plead not guilty?
    - The judge sets a trial date

14. What is a trial?
    - A court hearing to determine if you are guilty or not

15. Who has to be present for a trial to take place?
    - You, the defendant
    - Your lawyer, the defense attorney
    - The government's lawyer, the prosecutor
    - The judge
    - Witnesses
    - Possibly a jury

16. Who is the defense attorney?
    - A lawyer assigned to you to represent you in court. He or she tries to prove that you are not guilty

17. Who is the prosecuting attorney?
    - A lawyer that tries to convince the court that you are guilty

18. What is evidence?
    - Something presented to prove what happened, which may include the testimony of witnesses, fingerprints, weapons, etc.

19. What is a witness?
    - Someone who testifies for you or against you because he/she saw what happened (eye witness) or claims to know something about what happened

20. Can you be a witness for yourself?
    - Yes

21. Do you have to be a witness for yourself?
    - No, you have the right to remain silent: no one can make you testify

22. What should you do if you disagree with the testimony of a witness?
    - Quietly tell your lawyer, so he/she can cross examine the witness

23. What does the judge do?
    - The judge makes sure all rules are followed in court
    - The judge imposes sentences on people who are found guilty
    - If there is no jury, the judge decides guilt or innocence

24. If you chose to have a jury trial, what is the function of the jury?
    - A jury listens to the evidence and decides whether or not your are guilty

25. How many people make up a jury?
    - 12

26. How does a jury make its decision?
    - All 12 members must agree on whether you are guilty or not guilty. If they cannot agree, the judge declares a mistrial. The government then has to decide if they will have a new trial on the same charge

27. Can the judge over-rule the jury's decision?
    - No

28. Who has the "burden of proof" in a trial?
    - The prosecutor must prove that you are guilty beyond a shadow of a doubt

29. What happens in the jury finds you innocent?
    - You are released

30. What happens if the judge or jury finds you guilty?
    - You are sentenced

31. What happens if you plead not guilty by reason of insanity?
    - You have a trial to determine if you were so mentally ill at the time of the offense that you did not know what you were doing

32. What happens if you are found not guilty by reason of insanity by the judge?
    - You are sent back to St. Elizabeth's for 50 days to await a Bolton hearing

33. What is a Bolton hearing?

- A hearing when the court decides, based on doctor's testimony, if you are still mentally ill

34. If the court decides that you are not mentally ill at the Bolton hearing, what happens?
    - You are released

35. If the court decides that you are still mentally ill at the Bolton hearing, what happens?
    - You are returned to St. Elizabeth's for treatment for an indefinite period of time. You are kept there until the court agrees that you are well enough to be released. The average stay is for 4-6 years

36. What is plea bargaining?
    - An agreement between you, your lawyer, and the prosecuting lawyer in which you agree to plead guilty to a lesser charge

37. Who is your lawyer? How can you find out if you don't know?
    - Ask any staff member to assist you

38. When can you call your lawyer?
    - At any time. Often the best time is first thing in the morning or late in the afternoon

CHAPTER 4

THE PRELIMINARY HEARING

When the government charges a defendant with a felony or an indictable misdemeanor,[1] such defendant is entitled to an adversarial preliminary hearing before a neutral fact-finder.[2] Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(b). The stated purpose of this preliminary hearing is to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that an offense was committed and that the defendant committed it. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(d). If, following the preliminary hearing, the court finds probable cause to believe that a crime was committed and that the defendant committed it, the case is "bound over" for grand jury action. If not, the court must dismiss the complaint and discharge the defendant.[3] Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(d).

Rule 5(d) explicitly states that the "purpose of a preliminary hearing is not for discovery." Nevertheless, the preliminary hearing presents defense counsel with an excellent opportunity to learn about the government's case. In addition, the preliminary hearing presents an excellent opportunity for defense counsel to "lock in" a witness that likely will testify at the trial, and to lay the groundwork for the impeachment of other witnesses at trial. The simple fact is that probable cause is almost always founds at preliminary hearings in Superior Court. That said, when counsel thoughtfully and carefully prepares for a preliminary hearing, she can greatly advance her client's ultimate interests of winning at trial or securing a favorable negotiated resolution with the government. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(b).

I. PROCEDURES

Time Limits: The preliminary hearing must be held within ten days of presentment if bond is imposed or the defendant is held under D.C. Code § 23-1325(a) (first-degree murder, second-degree murder, and assault with intent to kill while armed). If the defendant is released at presentment, the hearing must be held within twenty days. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(d)(2). For those who are held under D.C. Code § 23-1322(a) or (b), the hearing must be held within five days if the government asks for a continuance, or within three days if the arrestee asks for a continuance. § 23-1322(d)(1). Absent the defendant's consent, these time limits may be extended only upon a showing that extraordinary circumstances exist and that delay is indispensable to the interest of justice. See Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(d)(2).

[1] See Super. Ct. Crim. R. 114. Indictable misdemeanors are generally those misdemeanors that are joined with a felony charge against the defendant or a joinable defendant, for example when possession of drugs is charged against the buyer and joined with a felony distribution charge against the seller.

[2] The adversarial preliminary hearing that Rule 5 provides may not be constitutionally mandated. The Fourth Amendment requires prompt judicial determination – which may be based on an ex parte showing – that there is probable cause to believe the defendant committed an offense. Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 120-22 (1975). Although a non-adversarial hearing, where permitted by local rule, is not a "critical stage" of the prosecution, an adversarial preliminary hearing such as that required in this jurisdiction is a critical stage in the prosecution, to which the Sixth Amendment right to counsel applies. Id. at 122-23.

[3] If an indictment or information is returned before the scheduled preliminary hearing, as often occurs in drug cases, the right to a hearing is lost. See Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(d)(2).

Immediate Hearing: In general, counsel should request an immediate hearing if the client is likely to be released, i.e., has good social factors such as ties to the community, minimal criminal record, and employment. The government should be apprised, in writing, of counsel's intent to demand an immediate hearing, so that the police officer will be kept available. See Appendix B for a sample letter.

Continuance: In general, counsel should oppose a continuance and move for dismissal if the government is not ready to present evidence on the scheduled date or when the case is called. Judges and commissioners in Superior Court most often adhere to the routine practice of dismissing the case, resulting in the client's release.

Evidence: At the hearing, both hearsay and evidence that was obtained illegally are admissible. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(d)(1). However, the court may require a showing that admissible evidence will be available at trial. See Fed. R. Crim. P. 5.1 advisory committee's note. The defendant has the right to cross-examine government witnesses. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(d)(1). The defendant also has the right to present evidence. Id. However, the decision to present evidence is an important one and should be made only after careful consideration. See infra Section IV.

Probable Cause: At the preliminary hearing, the government must meet "the standard of probable cause which . . . is roughly equivalent to the standard required for issuance of an arrest warrant or for an arrest without a warrant." Coleman v. Burnett, 477 F.2d 1187, 1204 n.96 (D.C. Cir. 1973); see also Staley v. Hannon, 402 A.2d 814, 816 (D.C. 1979). Thus, the constitutional standards for determining probable cause to arrest, developed primarily in connection with motions to suppress evidence, apply equally to preliminary hearings. Staley, 402 A.2d at 816 (hearing re-opened for further cross-examination and re-determination of probable cause where court refused to allow counsel to explore reliability and veracity of informant's out-of-court statement that formed basis for finding of probable cause).

The court will find that probable cause exists if each element of the charged offense is established. The reviewing judge does not have to make factual findings. On appeal, however, the appellate court will make a "more careful review" of the probable cause determination when the trial court adopts the government's findings of fact verbatim. Otts v. United States, 952 A.2d 156, 164 (D.C. 2008) (vacating Otts v. United States, 936 A.2d 782 (D.C. 2007).

If all the elements of the charged offense are not established, there should not be a finding of probable cause and the complaint should be dismissed. A finding of probable cause for only a lesser-included offense can be a significant basis for a motion to reduce bond.

Dismissal: Dismissal of the complaint does not preclude the government from seeking an indictment. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(d)(1). When a complaint is dismissed, counsel should consult the grand jury assistant assigned to the case to determine whether the government intends to proceed with the prosecution, and should keep the client fully aware of any potential criminal exposure. To the extent possible, counsel should proceed as if the government is going forward. Investigations are still best at the beginning of the case, when witness memories are fresh and it has not yet been suggested that he or she not speak with the defense. If the government plans to proceed, counsel should continue to investigate and prepare a defense. If a grand jury original indictment is returned, Super. Ct. Crim. R. 4-I embodies a preference for the issuance of a summons to the defendant to appear in court instead of a bench warrant and requires the government to inform defense counsel when charges are reinstituted.

The Right to a Preliminary Hearing:

- ✓ Request an immediate hearing if the client is likely to be released
- ✓ Oppose a continuance or move for dismissal if the government is not ready to present evidence on the scheduled date
- ✓ If the complaint is dismissed, proceed, to the extent possible, as if the government will go forward by way of grand jury original indictment

II. THE JUDICIAL OFFICER

Except in Accelerated Felony and Felony I cases, magistrate judges usually conduct preliminary hearings, as authorized by D.C. Code § 11-1732(j)(3). An appeal of a magistrate judge's ruling is filed in Superior Court. D.C. Code § 11-1732(k). The Superior Court may also review the magistrate judge's determination sua sponte. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 117(g)(2). If a magistrate judge improperly limits cross-examination or the presentation of evidence, counsel should file a motion requesting Superior Court review. The procedures are set out in Superior Court Criminal Rule 117(g)(1). Review by the Court of Appeals is available only upon appeal from the ruling of the Superior Court, see Speight v. United States, 558 A.2d 357, 360 (D.C. 1989), and any issue not raised before the Superior Court is waived, Bruce v. United States, 617 A.2d 986, 993 (D.C. 1992).

The mechanism for obtaining a stay of the commissioner's order and securing the defendant's release while review is pending is provided in Rule 117(g)(3). Counsel should also request a stay of any formal grand jury action pending resolution of the review.[4] If a defendant is incarcerated as a result of a commissioner's determination, review must take place within one day. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 117(g)(1). Otherwise, the motion for review must be submitted within ten days of the judgment. Id. Any sua sponte review in Superior Court must take place within thirty days. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 117(g)(2).

Felony I and Accelerated Felony cases are assigned at presentment to a specific judge, who handles all subsequent matters in the case, including the preliminary hearing. A Felony I is any rape, first-degree murder, or sex case with a child victim, and some serious cases involving four or more co-defendants. Accelerated Felony Trial Calendar (AFTC) cases meet the papering criteria of the United States Attorney's Violent Crime Section. Usually the government requests that the defendant be held without bond in these cases. If the client is released, the case may be moved to a normal Felony II calendar.

Review of a Magistrate's Ruling:

- ✓ Appeals of a magistrate judge's decision are filed in Superior Court
- ✓ File motions requesting review, e.g., if the magistrate judge improperly limited cross-examination or the presentation of evidence
- ✓ Obtain a stay of the commissioner's order
- ✓ Secure defendant's release while review is pending
- ✓ Request a stay of any formal grand jury action pending resolution of the review, where appropriate

III. CROSS EXAMINATION

It is important you speak with your client BEFORE the hearing. Your cross-examination can be much stronger if you know your case from your client's perspective as opposed to what the government has written in an Affidavit in Support of Arrest Warrant. At a preliminary hearing, the government must produce evidence sufficient to establish probable cause. The court must consider answers to both the direct testimony and the cross-examination. Therefore, thorough cross-examination is critical. See Appendix A for sample preliminary hearing questions.

Effective cross-examination in the preliminary hearing is an excellent opportunity to gain firsthand information about the government's case. While "[t]he purpose of a preliminary examination is not for discovery," Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(d)(1), the fact that a question may produce discovery is of no moment, so long as the question is relevant to probable cause. "[S]ome discovery becomes a by-product of the process of demonstrating probable cause." Coleman, 477 F.2d at 1200. Counsel should be prepared to respond to any objection on discovery grounds by showing how the question is relevant to probable cause.[5]

Another frequent objection to cross-examination is that it is "beyond the scope" of the direct. See Tyler v. United States, 705 A.2d 270, 277-78 (D.C. 1997). If that objection is sustained, but the questions are relevant to probable cause, counsel should consider calling the witness as a defense witness. See Poteat v. King, 487 A.2d 215, 216-17 (D.C. 1984); In re R.D.S., 359 A.2d 136, 139-40 (D.C. 1976). Counsel may be required, however, to proffer the expected testimony. See infra Section IV.

Counsel may also be asked to make a proffer regarding questions asked on cross-examination, for example, when the court inquires whether counsel has a basis in fact. However, "[c]ounsel often cannot know in advance what pertinent facts may be elicited on cross-examination. For that reason it is necessarily exploratory." Alford v. United States, 282 U.S. 687, 692 (1931). See also United States v. Pugh, 436 F.2d 222, 225 (D.C. Cir. 1970) ("counsel in many cases cannot possibly have a foundation in fact for all questions, only a well reasoned suspicion that a circumstance might be true"). If the court still requires a proffer, counsel should ask to make it ex parte if it would disclose information to which the government is not entitled.

[5] Occasionally, the hearing presents an opportunity to discover facts relating to issues of illegal search or seizure. For example, an officer may testify that he stopped the defendant's car in a routine traffic stop and found a gun in his waistband after noticing a "bulge," establishing probable cause that the defendant was carrying a dangerous weapon. Cross-examining the officer on what the defendant was doing, what the bulge looked like, what drew the officer's attention to the vehicle, etc., in the context of probing the direct testimony, has the ancillary effect of locking in the officer's testimony and developing information useful for a subsequent suppression motion.

Areas to Explore on Cross-Examination: While counsel should prepare a thorough cross-examination on all relevant areas, particular care should be taken when examining the circumstances and reliability of any eyewitness identification. Counsel should be wary of in-court identifications by the testifying police officer.[6] Prior descriptions and the degree to which they match the defendant's appearance, misidentifications or failures to identify, and the witness's opportunity to observe the perpetrator are all appropriate lines of cross-examination. Counsel should also elicit the witness's exact language in making the identification. The conclusory statement that there was a positive identification might mean that the witness said, "That looks like him," or "I think that's him."

If the government relies on the allegations of a single witness, counsel is entitled to thoroughly question that witness's reliability. The court in Staley, 402 A.2d at 816, vacated a finding of probable cause and ordered that the preliminary hearing be reopened for cross-examination regarding the reliability of an informant. A similar conclusion was reached in Poteat, 487 A.2d at 216-17, however, not only was the hearing reopened, after a "meaningful proffer," the defense was allowed to call the witness as its own.

Preparation for the Hearing:

- ✓ Investigate the case: speak with your client about the charges BEFORE the hearing, interview witnesses, and visit the crime scene
- ✓ Subpoena relevant documents that may negate probable cause
- ✓ Prepare a written cross-examination

IV. TACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS

In many cases, it will be clear whether the government will be able to establish probable cause. Then, the major benefit of the hearing is the opportunity to obtain information about the case. Consequently, at least during the initial inquiry into each issue, counsel should refrain from objecting to government counsel's questions and should forsake narrow and precise cross-examination for relatively general questions to place as much information as possible on the record. Many of the questions should be non-leading and relatively open-ended. Counsel must be careful to obtain precise, responsive and complete answers. A line of examination that begins with "Did the witness give a description?" or "Was the complainant examined by a doctor?" or [6] On occasion, the government will offer the testimony of an officer who has investigated the case but has never actually seen the defendant. Unless the officer can establish the basis of the in-court identification, counsel should object. As the officer is walking to the witness stand, ask the client if the officer participated in the arrest or post-arrest processing.

"What did Mr. Smith say regarding . . . ?" should be followed by "Did the witness give any further description to you [or anyone else] at any other time?" "Were any other tests or examinations performed at any other time?" or "Did Mr. Smith say anything else regarding . . . ?" "Is that all the witness said about . . . ?" "Are those the witness's words? Or your words?" "What did the witness say in his or her own words?"

The Sixth Amendment right to confrontation "is basically a trial right" which does not apply at the preliminary hearing. In re R.D.S., 359 A.2d at 140 n.10 (D.C. 1976). However, the defense may call any witness, even a complainant, if there is reason to believe that person would negate probable cause. Counsel may be called upon to give a meaningful proffer of the witness's testimony. See, e.g., Poteat, 487 A.2d at 216-17 (after "meaningful proffer," defense could call person who supplied information leading to defendant's arrest). The proffer must be "based on more than mere hope or speculation" and must show "how [the witness's] participation [in a preliminary hearing] would [tend] not to affirm, but to negate probable cause." In re R.D.S., 359 A.2d at 139-40; see also Beck v. United States, 402 A.2d 418, 421 (D.C. 1979); United States v. Davis, 330 A.2d 751, 753 (D.C. 1975). The defense may also subpoena documents to the preliminary hearing that may negate probable cause.

From a tactical standpoint, it is rarely advisable for the defense to present testimony, especially that of the defendant. The dangers of possible self-incrimination by the defendant, locking in defense evidence, government discovery of defenses and witnesses, and government subpoenaing of defense witnesses to the grand jury are too great, and the likelihood of dismissal is minimal. Moreover, even if the court credits the defense evidence and dismisses the case, the government may indict the case as a grand jury original. When the government is requesting detention, counsel should consider not only whether the evidence will negate probable cause, but also whether the evidence will provide the court with information to consider in determining whether to detain the defendant. Tyler, 705 A.2d at 275-76; s*ee also* D.C. Code § 23-1322(b), (d), (e).

The government's case at the preliminary hearing often consists of no more than an officer adopting an affidavit submitted in support of an arrest warrant. However, issuance of an arrest warrant does not foreclose the right to a preliminary hearing or to cross-examination. Coleman, 477 F.2d at 1204 n.96. The fact that a judge has made a probable cause finding in signing the arrest warrant is not determinative, because the affidavit was not subject to cross-examination. In addition to cross-examining the officer on the contents of the affidavit, counsel should ask the officer to reread the affidavit, and then ask whether it is correct or whether subsequent investigation requires any modification. In this way, the affiant's testimony is pinned down should it become important at trial.

PRACTICE TIP:

During the preliminary hearing defense counsel should lay the groundwork for the impeachment of the government's witnesses at trial. Hearsay is admissible in preliminary hearings. Typically, the government will present a police officer, who will testify as to what other witnesses told her. In order to produce a transcript that can be used to impeach these other witnesses later at trial, it is critical to ask questions in a manner that exposes the source of the officer's knowledge. Counsel thus should incorporate the source of information in all questions: e.g., "the complainant told you that she did not see the perpetrator's face?"; "the complainant told you that the gun was silver?"; "the eyewitness told you she was fifty feet from the fight?" Should the source witness testify in a contrary manner at trial, counsel can impeach the witness with the "locked in" testimony of the preliminary hearing witness.

The government may make a plea offer at presentment that expires at the preliminary hearing. If the offer is accepted, the preliminary hearing is waived and a date is set for the plea. In many cases, however, counsel does not have adequate time to investigate before the preliminary hearing date and to make an intelligent recommendation to the client concerning the plea decision. One solution is to negotiate a continuance of the preliminary hearing and an extension of time in which to accept the offer. Reasonable extensions that both the government and defense support are generally granted.

Strategies at the Preliminary Hearing:

GOAL: Place as much information on the record

- ✓ Refrain from objecting to government's questions
- ✓ Cross-examine each witness by asking non-leading and open-ended questions
  - Be sure to explore all possible areas including: the circumstance and reliability of any identification, prior descriptions, opportunities to observe, and exact language used
  - For objections on discovery grounds, carefully craft questions and be ready to defend each and every question as relevant to probable cause
  - For objections to questions outside the scope of direct, consider calling the government's witness as a defense witness
  - If asked to make a proffer, request it to be ex parte so as not to disclose information to which the government is not entitled
- ✓ It is rarely advisable for counsel to call witnesses. Counsel MUST consider all dangers (such as self-incrimination, locking in defense evidence, and government discovery of defenses and witnesses) when making this decision
- ✓ If given a plea offer, seek a continuance in order to investigate and intelligently discuss the plea agreement with your client

When defendants are released at preliminary hearings, often times the court issues a stay away order "from the area," or "one block radius from this address." Defendants were being repeatedly re-arrested for violating stay away orders that were often unclear or ambiguous. The Court of Appeals has held that a defendant can only be convicted of criminal contempt if he or she has notice of the specific conditions of the stay away. See Smith v. United States, 677 A.2d 1022, 1031 (D.C. 1996). In Vaas v. United States, 852 A.2d 44 (D.C. 2004), the court did not address the specific issue regarding the meaning of "one block radius," but did "strongly suggest" that in the future, such orders should set more defined parameters "using maps, if practicable, that can be attached to the stay away orders to provide defendants with clear guidance about this important aspect of a release order." Id. The Vaas court held this to be particularly important in cases in which the defendant lives in the immediate neighborhood of the location from which he or she is barred. Id.

SAMPLE QUESTIONS FOR PROBABLE CAUSE AND PRELIMINARY HEARINGS

These questions are not exhaustive, and are only a guide to help counsel think about what questions counsel should consider at the hearing. Counsel should make sure the answer to the question is complete. For example, if you ask an officer what the length of the incident was, and he answers 5 minutes, you can ask more detailed questions so that the officer is unlikely to change his answer later. "Officer, you say it was 5 minutes, could it have been longer/shorter than that?" "Well, how much longer/shorter?" "What makes you say that?"

Basic Identification Questions

Opportunity to observe – for each witness or complainant

1. Time, location and length of incident?
2. What was the lighting like? (Street lights? Where? Daylight?)
3. How long did each witness observe the incident and what drew its attention to scene?
4. How far was each witness from the scene?
5. Where was each witness standing in relation to assailant? (In front? To side? Behind?)
6. Were there any obstructions to the view?
7. Witness's physical condition: Tired? Drinking/drugs? Age? Eyesight?
8. Was offender wearing a mask? A hat?
9. Was there a prior relationship between any witness and defendant?
10. For each witness and each suspect, what was the description given to police: age, height, weight, eye color, complexion, hair, clothing, build, facial hair, distinguishing features?
11. Was there a lookout? When? What was the lookout description?

Identification Procedure

1. What procedure was used? (Show-up, line-up, photo spread, second sighting?)
2. When? Where?

3. What did each witness say?

4. Any non-identifications? Misidentifications?

5. Procedure done with all witnesses together? Separately?

Drug cases

1. Did the lookout give a location for the suspect? Where was the suspect going?

2. What was recovered? Money? Pre-recorded money? Drugs? From defendant, ground or stash?

3. How many people were involved in transaction? What was defendant's role? Were other people around?

4. What was the time of arrest?

5. Identification questions, above.

Robbery

1. Was any property taken? From where? Was it recovered? From where/whom?

2. How was the property identified?

3. What was the number of victims?

4. What was the number of robbers?

5. How was the property taken? (Force? Snatch?)

6. Were any threats made?

7. What was the role of each robber?

8. What was said by each robber? To whom?

9. Were any weapons used?

10. Were any injuries sustained?

11. Identification questions, above.

12. Bias of witnesses?

UUV

1. Driver or passenger?
2. How many people were in the car?
3. How long was the vehicle followed? Attempt to elude? How were vehicle occupants signaled about police presence?
4. Where was arrest made? What was the distance from car at the time of the arrest?
5. Was there any damage to car? What was the extent of the damage (or how was it damaged)? How visible was the damage? From what vantage point did police notice damage?
6. Were any keys in the ignition? Was there damage to steering column?
7. When was the car reported stolen? By whom?
8. Who talked to the owner? What did the owner say?
9. Were fingerprints removed from the automobile?
10. Was anything recovered from the car?
11. Identification questions, above.
12. Bias of witnesses?

Burglary

1. How were the premises entered?
2. Were any tools used? Recovered?
3. Were there any marks or damage to premises?
4. Was anyone inside premises?
5. Were there any witnesses? What did they see? How far were they from the scene?
6. Was property taken? What? Was it recovered?
7. Was the property identified? How? By whom? Basis for identifying?
8. Was property secreted by windows or doors? Any property found outside?

9. Identification questions, above.

10. Bias of witnesses?

Assault

1. Was the complainant injured? How did the injury occur? What is the nature of the injury? Was the complainant hospitalized?

2. Were any threats made?

3. Was there a prior relationship between defendant and complainant?

4. What was the cause of the altercation?

5. What did the complainant say? What did the offender say?

6. Were any weapons used? Were any weapons recovered from defendant or complainant?

7. Identification questions, above.

8. Bias of witnesses?

Sexual offenses

1. What age is the victim?

2. Was there any hospital treatment? When?

3. What is the extent of the injuries? Where? How severe?

4. Lab test results?

5. Where did incident occur?

6. Was there a prior relationship between defendant and complainant?

7. What did assailant say? What did complainant say? Was there a struggle?

8. Was any weapon used?

9. Were any articles recovered from the scene?

10. When was the incident reported to police? Reported to anyone?

11. Circumstances of first report?

12. Identification questions, above.

13. Bias of witnesses?

CHAPTER 5

DISCOVERY AND OTHER PRE-TRIAL MATTERS

I. DISCOVERY PURSUANT TO RULE 16

A. Practice Under Rule 16

Discovery is an on-going process that is difficult to complete because both parties are still interviewing witnesses, awaiting the results of medical examinations and scientific analyses, and otherwise investigating and preparing the case. A uniform practice for dealing with this problem has not evolved. Some judges require that motions be filed by status; some prefer that they not be filed until after status (i.e., after the client has actually decided to go to trial); and some require that motions to late-file be filed within the time allowed by Superior Court Criminal Rule 47-I. Counsel should promptly determine the assigned judge's practices, and request leave to late-file motions so that necessary discovery may be completed. Alternatively, counsel may choose to file motions, reserving the right to supplement once discovery is complete.[1]

Superior Court Criminal Rule 16 is largely derived from, and to be construed consistent with, the federal rule. See Waldron v. United States, 370 A.2d 1372, 1373 (D.C. 1977). It applies only to pre-trial discovery, and its expressed limits do not circumscribe "the court's potential discovery powers." Clifford v. United States, 532 A.2d 628, 633 n.5 (D.C. 1987).[2] The rule arguably requires defense counsel to attempt to obtain informal discovery from the prosecutor within the time allotted under Rule 47-I(c) for the filing of pre-trial motions. See (Donald) Lee v. United States, 385 A.2d 159, 161 n.2 (D.C. 1978); Rosser v. United States, 381 A.2d 598, 605 n.6 (D.C. 1977). Although the general practice in felony cases is that the government provides discovery after indictment, Rule 16 is silent regarding when the right to discovery vests. Early discovery facilitates investigation and is indispensable to pre-indictment plea bargaining. See United States v. Bacon, 428 A.2d 852 (D.C. 1981) (dismissing as moot a government petition for writ of mandamus where lower court granted, in part, pre-indictment requests for discovery, but

[1] With respect to the problem of obtaining adequate discovery for the timely filing of pre-trial motions, the Court of Appeals in Duddles v. United States, 399 A.2d 59, 62 (D.C. 1979), noted:

> [D]efense counsel cannot always be expected to have completed enough discovery within 10 days to provide a sufficient statement of grounds for a motion to suppress. But this is not to say that the defense is compromised by Rules 47 and 47-I. Counsel, during the 10 days, can file a motion for extension of time within which to file a motion to suppress; e.g., an extension until 10 days after completion of timely discovery. Alternatively, counsel can file a motion to suppress based on currently available information, requesting both deferral of a hearing or ruling until completion of discovery and amendment of the motion with further particulars. If counsel has asserted valid reasons for such an extension or deferral, it would be an abuse of discretion for the trial court to compromise a defendant's rights by denying such a motion.

[2] Counsel may also be able to obtain "discovery" under Rule 5(d) (preliminary hearing), 6(e) (grand jury proceedings), 7(f) (bill of particulars), 12(c) (request for notice of intent to use evidence), 15 (depositions), and 17(c) (subpoenas). For a general discussion of appellate review of Rule 16 discovery issues, see Washington v. United States, 600 A.2d 1079, 1081 (D.C. 1991); (James) Wiggins v. United States, 521 A.2d 1146, 1148 (D.C. 1987); and (Adrian) Wiggins v. United States, 386 A.2d 1171, 1174 (D.C. 1978).

defendants were indicted during pendency of appeal). Thus, counsel should seek pre-indictment discovery particularly on the accelerated felony calendar where judges encourage pre-indictment discovery. Rule 16(c) imposes a continuing duty to disclose discoverable material "promptly" once an initial request has been made. See Smith v. United States, 491 A.2d 1144, 1148 n.7 (D.C. 1985); Rosser, 381 A.2d at 605.

Discovery Practice:

- ✓ Know the discovery and motions practice of the particular judge
- ✓ Request discovery at the earliest possible opportunity (presentment or arraignment)
- ✓ Memorialize requests in writing
- ✓ File a copy of "Rosser" letter with the court

Although the rule does not require it, the clearest and most effective way to make a discovery request is to deliver a "Rosser" letter to the prosecutor, specifying the types of material desired. The prosecutor should then confirm in writing that all requested material has been produced or that certain material is being withheld pending a defense request for a judicial determination regarding whether it must be produced. See Mangrum v. United States, 418 A.2d 1071, 1077 n.12 (D.C. 1980); Rosser, 381 A.2d at 607. Alternatively, counsel may file a letter specifying which material has been disclosed and making additional requests. A copy of all correspondence should be filed with the court. Filing a Rosser letter is the most reliable method of memorializing the results of informal discovery. See id. at 610. Any unresolved discovery issues should be raised with the prosecutor sufficiently in advance of trial to allow enough time to respond and litigate the matter before the court.

1. Judicial Regulation of Discovery

To secure judicial involvement in the discovery process, counsel must file a motion to compel discovery or for other appropriate relief. The motion must be accompanied by written certification that counsel has made a "bona fide attempt to secure the necessary relief from the prosecutor on a voluntary basis and that the prosecutor has not complied with such request." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 16-II; Super. Ct. Juv. R. 16-I; s*ee also Washington v. United States*, 600 A.2d 1079, 1080-81 (D.C. 1991) (citing Rosser). Thus, a motion to compel discovery may be filed only after having sought the discovery at issue without the court's intervention.

Motion to Compel:

- ✓ First seek informal discovery
- ✓ Submit motion to compel in writing, in order to secure a broad range of sanctions
- ✓ Rule 16-II requires a written certification that counsel has made an attempt to secure the requested discovery on a voluntary basis before filing a motion to compel

The trial court is also empowered, "[u]pon sufficient showing," to "order that the discovery or inspection be denied, restricted, or deferred, or make such other order as is appropriate." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 16(d)(1). A motion for a protective or modifying order may include an ex parte written statement, which will be sealed and made available for appellate review if necessary. Id.

2. Sanctions

Sanctions may be imposed if the government fails to comply, belatedly complies, or cannot comply with a discovery request or order because it has lost or destroyed discoverable material. The range of available sanctions is set out in Rule 16(d)(2): "[T]he Court may order [a] party [who has failed to comply with the rules of discovery] to permit the discovery or inspection, grant a continuance, or prohibit the party from introducing evidence not disclosed, or it may enter such other orders as it deems just under the circumstances." The range of available sanctions is extremely broad, provided that the sanction is just under the circumstances. See Gethers v. United States, 684 A.2d 1266, 1272 (D.C. 1996) (quoting Davis v. United States, 623 A.2d 601, 605 (D.C. 1993)). The decision as to what sanctions, if any, to impose for a Rule 16 violation is committed to the discretion of the trial court. See id.; see, e.g., Sheffield v. United States, 397 A.2d 963, 967 (D.C. 1979).

Sanctions:

- ✓ Courts have the power to sanction parties for Rule 16 failures
- ✓ Counsel should propose alternative sanctions short of dismissal, in addition to requesting dismissal of the case
- ✓ Broad range of orders that should be sought:
  - Enforce right of disclosure or inspection
  - Grant a continuance
  - Prohibit government from introducing evidence not disclosed
  - Seek instruction that absence of evidence is not adverse

A defense failure to provide discovery may also result in sanctions. Cf. Clifford v. United States, 532 A.2d 628, 638-39 (D.C. 1987) (finding no abuse of discretion by trial court in excluding defense psychologist from testifying where counsel refused to turn over reports or documents on which expert relied in forming his opinion). The Sixth Amendment right to compulsory process may be implicated, however, if a discovery sanction prevents the defense from putting on a witness. See Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 409 (1988) (rejecting "the . . . argument that [the Sixth Amendment right to compulsory process] may never be offended by the imposition of a discovery sanction that entirely excludes the testimony of a material defense witness"). Preclusion was deemed an appropriate sanction in Taylor, where counsel's failure to disclose the names of witnesses pursuant to a state rule was "both willful and blatant," and "the inference that he was deliberately seeking a tactical advantage [was] inescapable." Id. at 416-17; see also Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145, 152 (1991) (suggesting that alternative sanctions are appropriate in most cases).

2014 Supplement

Simmons v. United States*, 999 A.2d 898 (D.C. 2010). Motion for discovery sanctions for police failure to disclose out-of-court identification procedure in timely manner properly denied where defense counsel knew of procedure more than one month before trial took place and failed to file motion challenging the identification or Rule 16 violation and where officers made in-court identification of defendant and had seen him in neighborhood previously.

a. Lost or destroyed evidence

Brown v. United States, articulated the appropriate analysis for determining whether sanctions should be imposed in situations involving the loss of discoverable material:[3] "While we do not purport to fashion a precise test herein, any appropriate test must require an evaluation of (1) the circumstances occasioning the loss; (2) systematic steps taken toward preservation; and (3) the magnitude of demonstrated materiality." 372 A.2d 557, 560-61 (D.C. 1977),

The first and second factors should be assessed in light of the government's clear obligation to preserve potentially discoverable material:

> [S]anctions for nondisclosure based on loss of evidence will be invoked in the future unless the Government can show that it has promulgated, enforced, and attempted in good faith to follow rigorous and systematic procedures designed to preserve all discoverable evidence gathered in the course of a criminal investigation. The burden, of course, is on the Government to make this showing. Negligent failure to comply with the required procedures will provide no excuse.

United States v. Bryant, 439 F.2d 642, 652 (D.C. Cir. 1971) (Bryant I), appeal after remand, 448 F.2d 1182 (D.C. Cir. 1971) (Bryant II). But see Rodriguez v. United States, 915 A.2d 380 (D.C. 2007) (police return of pouch to victim of robbery who subsequently discarded pouch because clasp had been broken during robbery did not require court to impose sanctions for failure of police to preserve evidence because police photographed pouch before returning it and absence of pouch had no significant impact on outcome of trial).

In response to Bryant I, the Metropolitan Police Department promulgated General Order No. 601.2, which established policies and procedures for preserving discoverable evidence. This Order may be helpful in demonstrating the existence and degree of negligence in the police department's destruction or loss of discoverable evidence. See Bryant II, 448 F.2d at 1184; Marshall v. United States, 340 A.2d 805, 809 (D.C. 1975); cf. March v. United States, 362 A.2d 691, 698 n.8 (D.C. 1976) (appellate courts which lack "direct supervisory authority over . . . day-to-day law enforcement activities," may not directly enforce the general order).
Although a finding of negligence does not automatically require imposition of sanctions, cf. Jones v. United States, 343 A.2d 346, 352 (D.C. 1975) (addressing sanctions under Jencks Act), the degree of negligence or bad faith is relevant to the decision whether to impose sanctions and what sanctions to impose. See (James) Wiggins v. United States, 521 A.2d 1146, 1148 (D.C. 1987) (finding abuse of discretion for failure to impose sanction for failure to produce key evidence for defense inspection); Fields v. United States, 698 A.2d 485, 489 (D.C. 1997) (affirming trial court's decision to impose no sanction because court, rather than government, lost the evidence and evidence was not material); United States v. Day, 697 A.2d 31, 36 (D.C. 1977) (affirming trial court's denial of motion to dismiss because no bad faith in destruction of car); cf. Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988) (holding that there is no due process violation for failure to preserve potentially exculpatory evidence unless police act in bad faith); Edwards v. United States, 483 A.2d 682, 684-85 (D.C. 1984) (finding no error in failure to assign Jencks Act sanctions when court did not request them); United States v. McKie, 951 F.2d 399, 403-04 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (finding no due process violation because the loss of evidence was not the result of government's bad faith and did not substantially prejudice the defendant). Accordingly, in seeking sanctions for lost or destroyed evidence, counsel should hold the government to the burden set forth in Bryant I of demonstrating good faith and lack of negligence.

The third factor identified in Brown – materiality – often determines whether sanctions will be imposed. In Brown, the police department lost a note given by the assailant to a witness. The defense intended to have a handwriting analysis undertaken in order to show that the defendant was not the assailant. No sanctions were warranted because the loss was inadvertent and the materiality of the note was speculative because its brevity rendered a conclusive handwriting analysis unlikely. Similarly, in Marshall the government returned a purse to the complainant, who destroyed it. Although the defense wished to subject the purse to a fingerprint analysis, rain made the purse soggy and molded, thus rendering it unlikely to yield fingerprints. The purse also could have been handled by "a number of people" before its recovery. The court, therefore, reasoned that the materiality of a fingerprint analysis was highly speculative and found no abuse of discretion by the trial court in denying sanctions. Marshall, 340 A.2d at 809-10. However, (James) Wiggins, 521 A.2d at 1149, reversed a conviction for taking property without right because the government failed to produce and disclose an altered dollar bill which formed the basis for the prosecution. The bill was highly material to the "development of a defense" because it may have supported the "reasonable mistake of fact" defense that was advanced.

Bean v. United States*, 17 A.3d 635 (D.C. 2011). No due process violation in government's failure to preserve actual liquor bottle in POCA case where nothing in record suggested intentional loss or destruction of bottle and where defendant provided no reason as to why trial court should not have credited arresting police officer's testimony at suppression hearing that included description of bottle.

Sandwick v. District of Columbia*, 21 A.3d 997 (D.C. 2011). Trial court did not plainly err in failing to sanction government for its failure to preserve photographs of defendant's truck that had collided with pedestrian where photographs were negligently lost and there was no dispute about what they portrayed.

Lost or Destroyed Evidence:

✓ Argue extent of negligence and the materiality of the lost evidence to the case

b. Failure to disclose and belated disclosure

Where the government either erroneously fails to disclose existing materials or makes belated disclosure the defendant is entitled to relief. The Court of Appeals has observed, however, that > [a]lthough undisclosed evidence may have been properly subject to discovery, Rule 16 does not require a court to impose sanctions against the nondisclosing party. Rather, in considering the imposition of sanctions, the court must consider a number of factors, including the reason for nondisclosure, the impact of nondisclosure, and the impact of the proposed sanction on the administration of justice.

Yoon v. United States, 594 A.2d 1056, 1061 (D.C. 1991). Also relevant is the extent to which the defense could have uncovered the evidence by other means. See Washington, 600 A.2d at 1081 (finding no prejudice in allowing prosecutor to introduce belatedly disclosed arrest photo because defendant "obviously had first-hand knowledge of his appearance at the time of his arrest"); Jackson v. United States, 589 A.2d 1270, 1271 n.2 (D.C. 1991) (holding that allowing prosecutor to introduce defendant's statement to police which the government had failed to disclose before trial was not reversible error because, among other things, "defense counsel could have inquired of appellant what statements he had made"). But see Wilson v. United States, 606 A.2d 1017 (D.C. 1992) (reversing because defendant prejudiced in exercise of peremptory challenges and in decision to go to trial where prosecutor belatedly disclosed defendant's prior impeachable convictions). Wilson is discussed further infra n.6. The court may limit the government's use of belatedly disclosed evidence. See (Angel) Davis v. United States, 623 A.2d 601, 605 (D.C. 1993) (affirming trial court's ruling permitting use of late-disclosed statement in government's rebuttal case); United States v. McCrory, 930 F.2d 63, 69-70 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (approving sanction limiting production of undisclosed evidence, but not testimony about it). Most frequently, the relief to which a defendant is entitled is a continuance or recess of the trial to assess and counter the evidence. See (James) Wiggins, 521 A.2d at 1149; (Larry) Lee v. United States, 454 A.2d 770, 776 (D.C. 1982); (Donald) Lee, 385 A.2d at 163.

Mistrial or Exclusion: A mistrial or exclusion of the evidence may be mandated in certain situations. For example, in Smith v. United States, 491 A.2d 1144 (D.C. 1985), the government called a police officer in rebuttal to testify about an oral statement the defendant made. Because adequate disclosure of the statement had not been made before trial, and timely disclosure of the oral statement might have altered defense preparation and strategy, the conviction was reversed. Cf. Cantizano v. United States, 614 A.2d 870, 873-74 (D.C. 1992) (finding no abuse of discretion and denying mistrial despite government statement before trial that witness had made no pre-trial identification and would make no in-court identification, on cross-examination the witness said she had identified defendant after the line-up); Thomas v. United States, 444 A.2d 952 (D.C. 1982) (although confrontation of testifying defendant with undisclosed statement violated Rule 16, error was harmless where trial court mitigated damage by prohibiting government rebuttal witness from testifying about the statement).

Accordingly, in seeking sanctions for belated disclosure of discoverable evidence, counsel should proffer (in camera if necessary) how late disclosure prejudiced the defense. Compare Carr v. United States, 585 A.2d 158, 163 (D.C. 1991) (finding no abuse of discretion in denying request for sanctions when defense failed to make adequate showing of prejudice); and Washington, 600 A.2d at 1081 (finding no abuse of discretion in admitting arrest photograph and two chemists' reports where defendant failed to show prejudice); with Yoon, 594 A.2d at 1061-64 (holding that continuance not sufficient to cure prejudice resulting from mid-trial disclosure of defendant's statement to police, which differed significantly from the defense presentation of the facts in opening statement and on cross-examination). Areas of possible prejudice include investigating the undisclosed information, preparing and filing motions to suppress, obtaining expert witnesses, preparing opening statements and cross-examination, deciding whether a client should testify, subpoenaing witnesses, plea bargaining, and questioning prospective jurors.

Failure to Disclose or Belated Disclosure:

- ✓ Demand sanction appropriate to the case
- ✓ Articulate the specific prejudice of the Rule 16 violation
- ✓ Consider prejudice through the entire history of the case, e.g., tactical decisions at trial, investigation, witness preparation, plea negotiations, and voir dire

Biles v. United States*, 101 A.3d 1012 (D.C. 2014). Reversible Brady violation where defense did not know until midtrial that government's warrantless search could not be justified under any exception to warrant requirement and where officer's disclosure of true basis for search—an informant's tip rather than a search incident to arrest—was favorable to winning motion to suppress that would have excluded key evidence of guilt at both of defendant's trials.

Jones v. United States*, 99 A.3d 679 (D.C. 2014). No Brady violation for failure to provide full grand jury transcript of complainant's testimony where defendant failed to point to any "favorable or impeaching information."

c. Post-conviction discovery

Post-conviction discovery may be provided and an evidentiary hearing held when specific allegations are able to show reason to believe that, once the facts have been fully developed, the defendant would be entitled to relief. Brown v. United States, 726 A.2d 149, 155 (D.C. 1999) (citing Harris v. Nelson, 394 U.S. 286, 300 (1969)). Brown sought such relief by asserting that the prosecution had violated Brady by withholding bias information about the complaining witness. However, the trial court denied his motion to vacate his conviction because his theory, and the support for it, was deemed "overly broad and speculative." Id.

B. Disclosure of Evidence by the Government

1. Statements By the Defendant

Rule 16(a)(1)(A) requires production of:

> any relevant written or recorded statements made by the defendant, or copies thereof, within the possession, custody or control of the government, the existence of which is known, or by the exercise of due diligence may become known, to the attorney for the government; that portion of any written record containing the substance of any relevant oral statement made by the defendant whether before or after arrest in response to interrogation by any person then known to the defendant to be a government agent; and recorded testimony of the defendant before a grand jury which relates to the offense charged. The government must also disclose to the defendant the substance of any other relevant oral statement made by the defendant whether before or after arrest in response to interrogation by any person then known by the defendant to be a government agent if the government intends to use that statement at trial.

In United States v. Bailleaux, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals urged a broad interpretation of "relevant" because the government cannot assess relevance from the defendant's point of view:

> Rule 16(a)(1)(A) can fully serve its intended purpose only if the Government takes a broad view of what is relevant for purposes of that provision. We believe the Government should disclose any statement made by the defendant that may be relevant to any possible defense or contention that the defendant might assert. Ordinarily, a statement made by the defendant during the course of the investigation of the crime charged should be presumed to be subject to disclosure, unless it is clear that the statement cannot be relevant. Where the Government is in doubt, the written or recorded statement should be disclosed, if a proper request is made.

685 F.2d 1105, 1114 (9th Cir. 1982). Rule 16 does not define "statements," and there has been continuing controversy over what the rule encompasses. The Advisory Committee Note to the identical federal rule notes that the definition of "statements" was deliberately left open to permit development by the courts. However, the Note further implies that the definition of "statement" should be broader than that of the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500, and notes that the following types of statements have been held to be discoverable under pre-amendment Rule 16: substantially verbatim and contemporaneous statements, see United States v. Elife, 43 F.R.D. 23 (S.D.N.Y. 1967); statements that reproduce the defendant's exact words, see United States v. Armantrout, 278 F. Supp. 517 (S.D.N.Y. 1968); a memorandum that was not verbatim but included the substance of the defendant's statement, see United States v. Scharf, 267 F. Supp. 19 (S.D.N.Y. 1967); written summaries of the defendant's oral statements, see United States v. Johnson, 525 F.2d 999 (2d Cir. 1975); United States v. Morrison, 43 F.R.D. 516 (N.D. Ill. 1967); and statements discovered by means of electronic surveillance, see United States v. Black, 282 F. Supp. 35 (D.D.C. 1968).

Written or Recorded Statement: Further development of the definition of a "written or recorded statement"[4] of the defendant in the courts has deemed the following items discoverable pursuant to Rule 16(a)(1)(A) when they are in government possession:

- Any statement, letter, or other document written by the defendant, regardless of the time it was made or audience for which it was intended, see, e.g., United States v. Caldwell, 543 F.2d 1333, 1352 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (finding post-arrest personal letter to friend, given to government by jailhouse informant discoverable); United States v. Silien, 825 F.2d 320, 323 (11th Cir. 1987) (holding that immigration file biographical sheet should be disclosed); United States v. Scafe, 822 F.2d 928, 935 (10th Cir. 1987) (allowing that Rule 16 covers letters to defendant's father and fellow inmate, intercepted by prison officials).

- Any transcribed, tape recorded, or videotaped statement by the defendant, regardless of the time it was made or its intended audience, see, e.g., United States v. Bufalino, 576 F.2d 446, 449 (2d Cir. 1978); United States v. James, 495 F.2d 434, 435-36 (5th Cir. 1974); United States v. Sherwood, 527 F. Supp. 1001, 1003 (W.D.N.Y 1981), aff'd without opinion, 732 F.2d 142 (2d Cir. 1984); and law enforcement officers' written reports or notes summarizing or otherwise recording the defendant's oral statements to law enforcement officers, see, e.g., United States v. Harris, 543 F.2d 1247, 1252-53 (9th Cir. 1976) (finding original interview notes discoverable especially when given by the accused); United States v. Johnson, 525 F.2d 999, 1004 (2d Cir. 1975) (holding that written summaries as well as statements copied verbatim are discoverable); United States v. Lewis, 511 F.2d 798, 802 (D.C. Cir. 1975) (defendant's oral statements communicated to police are discoverable); United States v. Fallen, 498 F.2d 172, 174-75 (8th Cir. 1974) (defendant's statements, before and after commission of a crime, are discoverable); United States v. Jefferson, 445 F.2d 247, 250 (D.C. Cir. 1971) (allowing discovery of police officer's handwritten notes); United States v. Layton, 564 F. Supp. 1391, 1395-96 (D. Or. 1983) (holding government must disclose all evidence already within the defendant's knowledge); United States v. Egan, 501 F. Supp. 1252, 1264 (S.D.N.Y. 1980) (holding that any rough notes or copies of such from law enforcement agents concerning the defendant's statement(s) are discoverable).

Rule 16(a)(1)(A) does not encompass an oral, unrecorded statement made to a citizen, even if the statement is subsequently communicated to a government agent who records it. See Reavis v.

[4] Whether a statement is "written or recorded" or "oral" can be critical; all relevant "written or recorded statements" are discoverable; oral statements in the form of a written record are discoverable only if: (1) made by the defendant in response to interrogation; (2) to any person then known to the defendant to be a government agent. Any other oral statements are discoverable only if: (1) the government intends to offer them in evidence at trial, and they were (2) made by the defendant in response to interrogation, (3) to any person then known to the defendant to be a government agent. See Super. Ct. Crim. R. 16(a)(1)(A).

United States, 395 A.2d 75, 77 n.2 (D.C. 1978); Heiligh v. United States, 379 A.2d 689, 692 (D.C. 1977); Robinson v. United States, 361 A.2d 199, 201 (D.C. 1977). It also does not "include statements made by the accused's co-conspirators, even if those statements can be attributed to the defendant for purposes of the rule against hearsay." United States v. Tarantino, 846 F.2d 1384, 1418 (D.C. Cir. 1988). The law in this jurisdiction is otherwise silent on co-defendants' statements. But see (Keith) Thomas v. United States, 978 A.2d 1211 (D.C. 2009). Rule 16(a)(1)(A) also does not encompass non-verbal communication recorded by a police officer when such physical gestures are ambiguous and non-communicative. See United States v. Baucum, 80 F.3d 544, 545 (D.C. Cir. 1996).

With respect to oral statements, the government must turn over only the substance of those made directly to a person known by the defendant to be a government agent, in response to interrogation. See Rosser, 381 A.2d at 603-04; United States v. Cooper, 800 F.2d 412, 416 (4th Cir. 1986) (remark, "Not yet, I am not finished," to correctional officer who told defendant to stop stabbing another inmate was not in response to interrogation). The substance of the statement must be disclosed even if it has not been recorded or reduced to writing and even if it is intended only to be used in rebuttal. See United States v. Lewis, 511 F.2d 798, 801 (D.C. Cir. 1975). Moreover, the "substance" of a statement can "include what it does not say as well as what it says"—that is, if the government intends to impeach the defendant with an omission, the omission is part of the "substance" and must be disclosed. See Yoon, 594 A.2d at 1060-61.[5] The government must disclose the substance "accurately and unambiguously" and in sufficient detail to prevent unfair surprise at trial. See Smith v. United States, 491 A.2d 1144, 1147 (D.C. 1985). Rule 16(a)(1)(A) requires disclosure of "any written record containing the substance of any relevant oral statement made by the defendant" in response to interrogation by government agents, whether or not the government intends to use the statement at trial.

The traditional rationale for grand jury secrecy – the protection of witnesses – does not apply to the defendant's own testimony, which is producible under Rule 16. If the defendant's grand jury testimony was not recorded, but the prosecutor intends to introduce it orally by means of witnesses who heard the testimony, it is disclosable under 16(a)(1)(A) as an oral statement to a government agent.

For purposes of this and all other relevant subdivisions, the government "possesses" all evidence in the hands of its investigative and custodial agencies including, for example, the Drug Enforcement Administration, see Bryant I, 439 F.2d at 650; and the Department of Corrections, see United States v. Butler, 499 F.2d 1006, 1008 (D.C. Cir. 1974). In most cases, the prosecutor can discharge the government's obligation by diligently searching, or requesting that a diligent search be made of, the prosecutor's own files and the files of administrative or police agencies investigating the case or the defendant. In Robinson v. United States, the Court of Appeals held that the United States Attorney's Office was in possession of a phone call recorded by the District of Columbia Department of Corrections, and that the government had an obligation to preserve that statement for trial. 825 A.2d 318, 328 (D.C. 2003).

[5] In Yoon, after the government rested its case, the prosecutor disclosed that the appellant had spoken with the police on the scene of the shooting at issue and had not mentioned the defense's contention at trial that the decedent possessed a gun. This statement was discoverable under Rule 16, even though the prosecutor intended to use it only if the defendant testified, and the failure to disclose caused substantial prejudice. Id. at 1060, 1064.

Items typically discoverable under Rule 16(a)(1)(A) include the PD 47 "waiver of rights" card, the PD 118 "Defendant/Suspect Statement," the section of the PD 163 for "Defendant's Version/Remarks," and the substance of any oral statement to police in response to interrogation. It is not uncommon for the government belatedly to "discover" additional statements, often made to arresting officers, not previously disclosed. Counsel should therefore take great care, by memorializing disclosures in a discovery letter and by other means, to insure that the government has revealed all statements of the defendant. Moreover, counsel should request, as a "written or recorded statement made by the defendant," a copy of all sections of the PD 163 containing information furnished by the defendant, e.g., employment, address, family and associates. See Townsend v. United States, 512 A.2d 994, 1000 (D.C. 1986).

Recent practice also has included the government collecting and using recorded telephone calls from jail. These calls are recorded but usually not in response to police interrogation. Counsel should specifically inquire about receiving any jail phone calls the government seeks to use in its case in chief or on rebuttal.

2. Defendant's Prior Record

Rule 16(a)(1)(B) requires disclosure upon defense request of "such copy of the defendant's prior criminal record, if any, as is within the possession, custody or control of the government, the existence of which is known, or by the exercise of due diligence may become known, to the prosecutor." Ordinarily, the prosecutor can discharge this obligation by turning over a copy of the defendant's FBI "rap sheet," or NCIC report, which should include out-of-state as well as local convictions.[6] Counsel must obtain arrest records if character evidence is being considered, because lack of knowledge of a defendant's arrests can be used to impeach character witnesses.

The government's form discovery letter asserts that the Pretrial Services Agency (PSA) report provides notice of prior convictions. Counsel should independently request from the government an accounting of prior convictions. The PSA report provides limited information. Further, it is the government's obligation to provide the information not the Pretrial Services Agency. In addition, counsel should request certified copies of any convictions pursuant to D.C. Code § 14-305(c) as well as any information regarding any arrests or other acts that the government would use to rebut possible character evidence at trial. Morris v. United States, 469 A.2d 432, 436 (D.C. 1983).

3. Documents, Photographs and Tangible Objects

Upon request, the government must permit the defense to: > inspect and copy or photograph books, papers, documents, photographs, tangible objects, buildings or places . . . which are within the possession, custody or control of the government and which [1] are material to the preparation of the defense, [2] are intended for use by the government as evidence in chief at the trial, or [3] were obtained from or belong to the defendant.

[6] The defense can rely on the prosecutor's disclosures regarding the criminal record. See Wilson v. United States, 606 A.2d 1017 (D.C. 1992). In Wilson, during a pre-trial status conference before the defendant's second trial, the prosecutor represented that the defendant had no impeachable convictions. When the defendant testified, the prosecutor was allowed to impeach him with prior convictions for sodomy and indecent acts. The defense reasonably relied on the prosecutor's pre-trial assurance, especially since the government did not impeach the defendant with these convictions at his first trial, which resulted in a mistrial. See id. at 1022. The defendant was prejudiced in his use of peremptory challenges, since "different considerations might well affect jury selection for a defendant who knows he will be impeached with convictions for sex offenses." Id. at 1025. He was also prejudiced in deciding whether to go to trial or enter into plea negotiations. See id.

Super. Ct. Crim. R. 16(a)(1)(C). The latter two categories are straightforward; whether an item is "material to the preparation of the defense" may not be. An item is "material" if it is intended to be used in the defense case or "if there is a strong indication that will play an important role in uncovering admissible evidence, aiding witness preparation, corroborating testimony, or assisting impeachment and rebuttal." United States v. Felt, 491 F. Supp. 179, 186 (D.D.C. 1979). To be "material," evidence need not be exculpatory or even favorable. "Inculpatory evidence, after all, is just as likely to assist in 'the preparation of the defendant's defense' as exculpatory evidence." United States v. Marshall (Marshall II), 132 F.3d 63, 67 (D.C. Cir. 1998).

"Material" under Rule 16:

- ✓ Intended for use by the defense
- ✓ Likely to play a role in discovering admissible evidence, witness preparation, corroborating testimony, or assisting with impeachment or rebuttal
- ✓ Items need not be exculpatory or even favorable

As the drafters of the federal rule recognized, it "may be difficult for defendant to make this showing if he does not know what the evidence is." Advisory Committee Note to the 1974 Amendments. Therefore, courts have required the defense to make only a prima facie showing of materiality to obtain discovery. See (Adrian) Wiggins, 386 A.2d 1171, 1178 (D.C. 1978) (Ferren, J., concurring); see also United States v. Thevis, 84 F.R.D. 47, 51 (N.D. Ga. 1979); C. Wright, 2 Federal Practice and Procedure, Criminal 254 at 66-67 (2d ed. 1982). Reversible error was committed in a cocaine prosecution when the government failed to turn over a wallet taken from the defendant, then bolstered its weak case by using names and telephone numbers found in the wallet on cross-examination to link the defendant to Colombia. See United States v. Rodriguez, 799 F.2d 649, 652-54 (11th Cir. 1986). Discovery under this section is subject to the limitations for "internal government documents" and Jencks statements, as set forth in Rule 16(a)(2). See infra Section I.B.5.

Discoverable Items: Items typically discoverable under Rule 16(a)(1)(C) include police reports not otherwise exempt from disclosure, physical evidence, medical records, mug shots and modus operandi photos of the defendant, photo arrays,[7] line-up photos and videotapes, crime scene

[7] Washington v. United States, 377 A.2d 1348 (D.C. 1977), held that the government is not obligated to preserve an array from which no identification was made, at least where the possibility that the array contained a photograph of the defendant is speculative. Arrays from which an identification is made must be preserved. See Sheffield v. United States, 397 A.2d 963, 967-68 (D.C. 1979).

photos, photos of complainants' injuries, photos taken by the medical examiner's office, and tape recordings of 911 calls and police radio communications (unless these are Jencks material). In an unauthorized use of a vehicle case, the car itself may be discoverable. In re Q.D.G., 706 A.2d 36, 38 (D.C. 1998) (remanding for trial court to consider sanctions where government failed to preserve car). Counsel should request copies of all appropriate items. To view physical evidence at the MPD Public Property Control Branch (2235 Shannon Place, S.E.), counsel should request a "viewing letter" from the prosecutor authorizing inspection by counsel or an investigator and setting forth the evidence or laboratory numbers of the relevant items. The prosecutor must provide a viewing letter with your name and the name of your investigator before you will be allowed to view the evidence. You must then fax over your request to view the evidence 72 hours prior to viewing the evidence. In addition, you should bring the viewing letter with you. Rules regarding viewing evidence change regularly, so carefully read the viewing letter provided by the government.

4. Reports of Examinations and Tests

Rule 16(a)(1)(D) entitles the defense to:

> inspect and copy or photograph any results or reports[8] of physical or mental examinations, and of scientific tests or experiments, or copies thereof, which are within the possession, custody or control of the government, the existence of which is known, or by the exercise of due diligence may become known, to the prosecutor, and which are material to the preparation of the defense or are intended for use by the government as evidence in chief at the trial.

There is no work-product or Jencks Act exemption in this section, and counsel does not have to designate the particular items sought if counsel is unaware of what examinations or tests have been made. Once discovery of this information has been obtained, counsel should interview the government's expert(s) who performed the examinations, tests, or experiments. Many government experts, including those employed by MPD and the FBI, are willing to discuss their reports with defense counsel. Counsel should assume, however, that the discussions will be revealed to the prosecutor. Counsel should also promptly assess the advisability of retaining independent experts to evaluate the government's reports, to make independent tests and evaluations, and to assist defense counsel in preparing for direct and cross-examination of government witnesses. Counsel is entitled to ex parte consideration of a request to retain an expert and an ex parte order precluding the custodian of the evidence (e.g., MPD, FBI or DEA) from revealing to the prosecution the identity of the defense expert and the results of that expert's analysis. See Gaither v. United States, 391 A.2d 1364, 1367 n.4 (D.C. 1978); D.C. Code § 11-2605(a).

Independent Experts:

- ✓ Consider retaining independent experts to evaluate government's reports, make independent tests and evaluations, and assist defense counsel in preparing for direct and cross-examination of government witnesses

Certain scientific tests that government agents regularly conduct may constitute a mishandling of evidence in violation of Rule 16. See Whalen v. United States, 379 A.2d 1152, 1163-64 (D.C. 1977), rev'd on other grounds, 445 U.S. 684 (1980). In Commonwealth v. Gliniewicz, 500 N.E.2d 1324 (Mass. 1986), the government's expert subjected the defendants' boots to electrophoresis to test for blood, which destroyed that entire portion of the boots. Because the defendants were not informed of the test, and so could not have their own expert on hand to observe it, it was error for the trial court not to have excluded the evidence for discovery violations. See id. at 748.

Items typically discoverable under Rule 16(a)(1)(D) relate to drug analyses, medical examinations, ballistics tests, handwriting analyses, hair and fiber analyses, blood and semen analyses, and fingerprint examinations and comparisons.

Counsel should make specific requests for the underlying data and reports of any examination or test. For example, in cases involving fingerprints, DNA, or drug evidence, specific requests should be made.

For requests for fingerprint cases counsel should request the following from the government:

1. Case File: Please provide a complete copy of the fingerprint analysis case file, including all records made by the laboratory in connection with this case. These materials should include: copies of all bench notes, examination worksheets recorded by latent print examiners in the course of analyzing any and all evidence in this case. If the file includes photographs, please include photographic quality copies.

2. Fingerprint Cards and Digital Files: Please provide copies of all fingerprint cards and digitized fingerprint files to which the laboratory had access in connection with this case.

3. Protocols: Please provide a copy of all Fingerprint Technician Quality Assurance and Training Guidelines and Protocols used in the laboratory that analyzed the fingerprint evidence. This includes, but is not limited to, the Quality Manual [see SWGFAST (Scientific Working Group on Friction Ridge Analysis Study and Technology), Quality Assurance Guidelines for Latent Print Examiners, version 2.11 (Aug. 22, 2002), §3].

4. Chain of Custody and Current Disposition of Evidence: Please provide copies of all records that document the treatment and handling of fingerprint evidence in this case, from the initial point of collection up to the current disposition.

5. Software: Please provide a list of all Automated Fingerprint Identification Systems (AFIS) used in this case, including name of software program, manufacturer and version used in this case.

6. AFIS & IAFIS Data Files: If AFIS or IAFIS was used in any way in this case, please provide the following:
    - Latent prints: All electronic images of any and all "latent" prints (prints recovered as evidence in this case) entered into an AFIS in this case in standard (.eft or

.wsq) format

- Search results: Hard copy printout or electronic output in easily readable format of the results of any and all AFIS/IAFIS searches run in connection with this case. Information provided should include, but is not limited to:
    - Ranked list of "candidate matches"
    - Identification numbers of all images appearing on the "candidate list"
    - "Match scores" of all images appearing on the "candidate list"
    - Candidate matches: Electronic images of all items appearing on the candidate list in standard (.eft or .wsq) format
    - Client's records: Electronic images of any and all ten-print records associated with or identified to my client in standard (.eft or .wsq) format

These files should include all data necessary to: (i) independently reanalyze the raw data; and (ii) reconstruct the analysis performed in this case.

7. Digital Enhancement: If the fingerprint evidence in this case was digitally enhanced at any time for any reason, please provide
    - A list of all software used for digital enhancement in this case, including name of software program, manufacturer and version used in this case
    - Any existing validation studies of that software
    - Documentation that the enhancement process complied with the requirements the guidelines recommended by the Association for Information and Image Management (AIIM). If the enhancement process did not comply with AIIM guidelines, it is sufficient to respond: "The enhancement process did not comply with the AIIM guidelines."
    - Printouts of any digital enhancements used in the analysis of this case

8. Documentation of Corrective Actions for Discrepancies and Errors: According to SWGFAST, Quality Assurance Guidelines for Latent Print Examiners, version 2.11 (Aug. 22, 2002), §8.2, "The specific policies, procedures, and criteria for any corrective action taken as a result of a discrepancy in a technical case review should be clearly documented in writing." Please provide a copy of all documentation of corrective actions maintained by the laboratory that performed fingerprint analysis in this case. If the laboratory does not comply with the SWGFAST requirement that it maintain this documentation, it is sufficient to respond: "The laboratory does not comply with the SWGFAST requirement that it document corrective actions."

9. Laboratory Accreditation: Please provide copies of all licenses or other certificates of accreditation in fingerprint analysis held by the laboratory

10. Laboratory Personnel: Please provide background information about each person involved in conducting or reviewing the fingerprint testing performed in this case, including:
    - Current resume

- Job description
- Copies of all proficiency examinations and their results
- All Testimony Reviews [see SWGFAST, Quality Assurance Guidelines for Latent Print Examiners, version 2.11 (Aug. 22, 2002), §10]

For cases involving DNA counsel should request the following:

With regard to any nuclear DNA testing conducted or contemplated in this case, you are asking for the following materials. Much, but not all, of these materials should be found in what is termed by the MPD laboratory the "case" and "batch" files for each DNA test.

1. Case file of DNA testing results: Please provide a legible copy of the complete case file with all records pertaining to DNA testing in this case. For materials that are represented in any format other than black and white copies, please provide copies that are equivalent in content and quality (e.g., x-ray film copies of x-ray films, photographic quality copies of photographs, color copies of electropherograms, and CD-ROM copies of electronic data). The records requested include, but are not limited to, the following, even if located separate from the laboratory "case file."

    a. Hand written bench notes;

    b. Extraction, quantitation, PCR, hybridization, capillary electrophoresis, and final analysis worksheets;

    c. Worksheets and other notes used in calculating frequency statistics;

    d. Any printouts of electropherograms;

    e. Any printouts of electronic quantitation data;
    f. Records of any errors, discrepancies, or trouble-shooting that occurred during the testing in this case, as well as an explanation of actions taken to remedy the problems—such records should include documents maintained pursuant to SWGDAM Standard 14.1.1;

    g. Color photographs or copies of slot blots, restriction gels, yield gels, dot strips, or autorads (if used in testing);

    h. Copies of phone and other communication logs reflecting conversations by laboratory personnel internally and externally with other people about testing in this case; and

    i. Case notes maintained pursuant to SWGDAM Standard 11.1;

2. Data files for testing done in this case: Please provide copies of all data files created and used in the course of performing DNA testing and subsequent analysis of DNA data in this case. These files should include all data necessary to: (a) independently reanalyze the raw data; and (b) reconstruct the analysis performed in this case (As a non-inclusive example, if the laboratory used Genescan and Genophiler, all electronic data files from both programs should be included). Please provide these data files on a CD-ROM on which the DNA examiner has written the date he or she copied the data onto the CD-Rom, the laboratory case number, and the DNA examiner's initials. Transmit the data intact, as originally collected, whether on a Macintosh or PC platform. In addition, to the extent that this request pertains to commercially available software that was used unmodified in this case, you may respond to this request simply by indicating the name of the software item, the manufacturer, and the version used to create the data files you deliver. However, in the event that data files were created with internally created software or commercial software modified in any way, please provide either a copy of the modified software item or a detailed list of the changes or modifications that were made with regard to the software along with the data files. Data files should include, but are not limited to, the following:

a. Project files;

b. Sample files;

c. Gel files (when gels used);

d. Matrix files (including the data used to compile the matrix files);

e. Analysis parameter files;

f. Sample sheets;

g. Injection lists; and

h. Log files.

3. Statistical information relied upon to interpret tests: Please identify the statistical method used to calculate probabilities in this case. In addition, please provide copies of the materials that were used or relied upon in performing any statistical analyses in this case. These materials should include, but are not limited to, the following:

   a. The complete STR database or databases on CD-ROM, in a format such that the multi-locus genotype is given for each sample tested;

   b. Copies of all documents describing the source or origin of samples in STR databases used, including documents regarding the method by which samples were collected, the background and/or characteristics of the individuals who were the sources of the samples, the choice of populations and sub-populations that were sampled, and the nature of the sampling procedure used to collect the samples;

c. Copies of all documents generated by computer statistical programs (e.g., PopStats) used to aid statistical calculations in this case;

d. Allelic frequency tables relied upon; and

e. Computer data files relating to statistical analyses.

4. Laboratory procedures relied upon when performing tests: Please provide legible copies of all documents that were, or are claimed to have been, followed or relied upon in executing, interpreting, and/or reporting the DNA tests performed in the instant case. These materials should include, but are not limited to, the following:

a. Standard operating procedures of the DNA testing laboratory, including those maintained pursuant to SWGDAM Standard 9.1.1;

b. User manual for any computer statistical program (e.g. PopStats) used to aid statistical calculations in this case;

c. Quality assurance manuals, including those maintained pursuant to SWGDAM Standard 3.1.1; and

d. Quality control manuals.

5. Documentation of laboratory and analyst expertise: Please provide legible copies documenting how the testing laboratory meets scientific community standards and how laboratory personnel have been trained to conduct DNA testing. These materials should include, but are not limited to, the following:

a. Copies of all licenses or other certificates of accreditation held by the DNA testing laboratory;
b. Copies of all audit reports for the last five years relating to the DNA testing laboratory used in this case, including all audit documents retained pursuant to SWGDAM Standard 15.1.2;

c. Copies of any contamination records kept by the laboratory—these materials should include: (i) instances of reagent blanks and/or negative controls registering the presence of DNA and/or positive controls registering the presence of DNA other than that of the control DNA; and (ii) all documents describing actions taken by the laboratory in response to contaminated controls or other forms of contamination;

d. Copies of any control or sample discrepancy logs kept by the laboratory—these materials should include: (i) the case number; (ii) laboratory number; (iii) name of the analyst; (iv) extraction/concentration method; (v) description of the discrepancy; (vi) the cause of the discrepancy; and (vii) the corrective action taken;

e. Copies of any proficiency tests that were taken by the persons who performed the DNA testing in this case—these materials should include: (i) the complete proficiency test case file; (ii) computer data files; (iii) evaluations and/or reports by the testing agency; and (iv) records maintained pursuant to SWGDAM Standard 13.1.1;

f. Current resumes, job descriptions, and descriptions of continuing professional training for all personnel involved in handling, conducting, and/or reviewing the biological material, serological testing, and DNA testing performed in this case, including all materials maintained pursuant to SWGDAM Standard 5.1;

g. A list of the last ten cases at which the persons involved with testing in this case have testified.

6. Explanation of laboratory and computer instruments relied upon to perform tests: Please provide legible copies of documentation about the equipment, reagents, and testing kits used to conduct DNA testing in this case. These materials should include, but are not limited to, the following:

a. A brief description of the kinds of forensic work done in the laboratory and a diagram of the laboratory that clearly designates the work areas for evidence storage, DNA isolation, PCR processing, and DNA typing;

b. A list of all the laboratory instruments used in the DNA testing in this case, including the name of the instrument, manufacturer, and version used;

c. A copy of the instructions provided by manufacturers of commercial tests kits, and protocols and manuals relating to the testing instruments (including user's manuals and machine-run specifications);

d. Documents regarding any modifications from the seller's specifications to any instrument (e.g. the ABI 310) or test kit along with any documentation of what, if any, validation was performed regarding such modifications;

e. Documentation of the maintenance of laboratory equipment maintained per SWGDAM Standard 10.3.2;

f. Materials that document any trouble-shooting or changes that were made to the genetic analyzer instrument used in the instant case, including: (i) copies of any notes, or records of communications relating to trouble-shooting that had to be done on the instrument, including calls to technical support lines and visits to field technicians to repair the instrument; (ii) records of any changes that were made to the instrument in the course of testing samples in this case, including replacement of parts such as laser or CCD virtual camera; (iii) records of all computer resets or reboots that had to be done during the testing in the instant case, including soft resets, cold boots, and/or clear memory resets; and (iv) records of all incidents in which manual control was used to override genetic analyzer presets;

g. A list of all software programs, filters, and any "macros" used in the DNA testing in this case, including the name of the software program, manufacturer, and version used in this case—if modifications were made to commercial software's default settings or software was created in-house, these modifications and software should be provided;

h. A copy of the instructions provided by manufacturers of the software used in this case;

i. Copies of developmental validation studies pertaining to the STR DNA test performed in this case, as required by SWGDAM Guideline 8.1.1—these materials should include copies of laboratory notebooks, computer data files, unpublished scientific papers, and citations to published scientific papers;

j. Copies of any internal validation studies pertaining to the specific STR DNA test performed in this case, as required by SWGDAM Guideline 8.1.3—these materials should include copies of laboratory notebooks, computer data files, unpublished scientific papers, and citations to published scientific papers.

7. Information regarding evidence control procedures and current disposition of evidence: Please provide legible copies of documentation about the laboratory control of evidence in this case. These materials should include, but are not limited to, the following:

   a. Copies of all chain of custody documents for each item of evidence subjected to DNA testing, starting with the first description or "log entry" for each item and continuing through to the current disposition of that item of evidence—such documentation should show: (i) where and how the materials were collected; (ii) where and how the materials were stored (including temperature and type of container); (iii) the amount of evidence material which was consumed in testing; (iv) the amount of material which remains; and (v) where and how the remaining evidence is stored;

   b. Copies of the lab's internal operating procedures regarding evidence control pursuant to SWGDAM Standard 7.1.

8. Information about DNA testing of other individuals: Pursuant to Rule 16 and Brady v. Maryland, please provide all results, analyses, printouts, and raw data with respect to any DNA tests performed in this case on any other individual besides my client. If no testing was conducted on any other individual, please indicate whether a DNA sample was taken from any other individual, and why no DNA testing was conducted in that instance.

9. Evidence of inconclusive DNA typing: Pursuant to Rule 16 and Brady v. Maryland, for any inconclusive DNA typing results please provide a particularized explanation as to why that typing result was determined to be inconclusive (e.g. insufficient quantity of DNA, degraded DNA, inhibited PCR, etc.).

10. Serology: Provide a complete copy of all laboratory protocols and records relating to any serological testing in the above captioned case, including but not limited to the following:

    a. Laboratory protocols;

    b. Laboratory notes;

    c. Photographs;

    d. Diagrams;

    e. Sketches;

    f. Bench notes;

    g. Final reports; and

    h. Draft reports.

For cases involving drug evidence you are requesting any scientific tests performed on the alleged controlled substances in this case. You should request the following materials:

1. Case file: Please provide a complete copy of the chemist's case file, including all records created by the Drug Enforcement Agency ("DEA"), the Metropolitan Police Department ("MPD"), or any other agency that participated in the testing of the alleged controlled substances in this case. These materials should include bench notes, including that of the drug extraction process, memoranda, DEA-7 reports, evidence reports, chain-of-custody reports, reports of equipment calibration checks, negative and positive control data, chromatographs, mass spectra, infrared spectra, communication logs, contamination logs, diagrams, and photographs of evidence and results of any color tests and microchemical crystal tests.

2. Chain of custody: Please provide copies of all records that document the collection and handling of physical evidence, from the initial point of collection to the current disposition.

3. Statistical information: Please provide the ranges of "expected results," including any gas and/or liquid chromatography retention times and peak heights, mass spectroscopy mass-to-charge ratios, UV-Vis and IR absorption peaks and shoulders, thin layer chromatography retention factors of, drug standards, internal standards, solvents, and any other analytes used to interpret the data from each of the tests performed in this case.

4. Protocols: Please provide a copy of all handbooks, guidelines, protocols and training materials used by each laboratory that conducted testing in this case. These materials should include:

    a. Quality control procedures governing the handling and examination of evidence samples;

    b. Quality assurance procedures employed by the laboratory to monitor and document its performance, including but not limited to internal and external auditing, proficiency testing, and document control procedures; and

    c. Standard operating procedures for each of the methods used to examine the substances in the above-captioned case (e.g., organic extractions, gas chromatography (GC); mass spectrometry (GC/MS); infrared spectrometry (IR)), including procedures for collection of analytical samples from evidentiary materials, i.e., for collection of representative aliquots.

5. Validation studies: Please provide the results of validation studies and calibration curves for each method used to analyze evidence. (If the DEA Mid-Atlantic Laboratory did not perform a formal validation study for the determination of controlled substances using the subject methods, provide a copy of empirical results verifying the laboratory's ability to meet the desired performance characteristics for each testing method that was externally validated, including explicit reference to the original validation record used by the laboratory.)

6. Reagents and materials: Please provide source, preparation, and usage records for any and all reagents or other materials used during testing, including but not limited to the quality control test results of the certified standard on the day the testing for this case was done; the date each reagent was made; HPLC graphs and UV spectra for all reagents; "as prepared" and "as determined" values for all negative and positive controls; records that demonstrate traceability for standards and reference materials used for calibration and quality-control purposes during casework testing.

7. Instruments and equipment: Please provide the make and model of any instruments or equipment used during testing of the alleged controlled substances in this case, as well as manuals and instructions provided by the manufacturer, validation studies pertaining to laboratory equipment, documentation of maintenance of laboratory equipment, and corrective action logs pertaining to laboratory equipment.

8. Laboratory production data: Please provide laboratory production data for the tests performed in the subject case (gas chromatography (GC); mass spectrometry (GC/MS); infrared spectrometry (IR)), including specifics of the instruments and columns, temperature ramping programs, solvent gradient programs, internal and external controls and solvents that were used, the total spectral ranges observed, the total chromatography run times, and the number of tests performed.

9. Audits and accreditation: Please provide copies of any audit reports for the period beginning one year prior to the testing performed in the above-captioned case to the present, as well as copies of all certificates of accreditation for the DEA Mid-Atlantic Laboratory.

10. Personnel: Please provide background information about each person involved in conducting or reviewing the controlled substance analysis in this case, including a job description, current resume, copies of all proficiency examinations and their results, and any performance evaluations.

5. Expert Witnesses

Rule 16(a)(1)(E) entitles the defense to:

> a written summary of the testimony of any expert witness that the government intends to use during its case-in-chief at trial.

Rule 16(a)(1)(E) further states:

> If the government requests discovery under subdivision (b)(1)(C)(ii) of this Rule and the defendant complies, the government shall, at the defendant's request, disclose to the defendant a written summary of testimony of any expert witness the government intends to use as evidence at trial on the issue of the defendant's mental condition. The summary provided under this subparagraph shall describe the witnesses' opinions, the bases and the reasons for those opinions, and the witnesses' qualifications.

In United States v. Curtis, the Court of Appeals held that, in a drug case, "[t]he requirements of Rule 16(a)(1)(E) were satisfied by the government's production of the DEA-7 reports of chemists' analyses, the Certificates of Compliance, and the curricula vitae of the chemists who analyzed the substances." 755 A.2d at 1016. The court further observed, "the summary need not be extensive where the expert is not 'expected to testify on matters which touch on new or controversial techniques or opinions.'" Id. (quoting, Fed.R.Crim.P. 16 advisory committee's notes regarding the 1993 amendments to the rules).

In Ferguson v. United States, however, the court found a violation of Rule 16(a)(1)(E) in the government's vague expert notice provided. 866 A.2d 54 (D.C. 2005). The court emphasized that Rule 16(a)(1)(E) "is intended to minimize surprise that often results from unexpected expert testimony, reduce the need for continuances, and to provide the opponent with a fair opportunity to test the merit of the expert's testimony through focused cross-examination" (quoting Fed. R. Crim P. Advisory committee's notes regarding the 1993 amendments to the rules). The court found lacking the government's "written summary" of the testimony and basis and opinion of the proposed expert testimony.

For Government's Expert Witness:

- ✓ Request with specificity the underlying basis and opinion of any expert
- ✓ Request the expert's CV
- ✓ Obtain any prior transcripts of the expert's testimony in similar cases

6. Information Not Subject to Disclosure

Rule 16(a)(2) exempts from discovery:

> reports, memoranda, or other internal government documents made by the prosecutor or other government agents in connection with the investigation or prosecution of the case, or . . . statements made by government witnesses or prospective government witnesses except as provided in 18 U.S.C. § 3500.

Rule 16(a)(2) does not apply to the defendant's statements or prior record or to results or reports of physical or mental examinations. Accordingly all of those items are subject to disclosure by the government.

The term "internal government document" is not defined by the rule, and neither the Court of Appeals nor any federal court has developed a precise definition. Other case law has included in this term prosecutorial work product, see, e.g., United States v. Penix, 516 F. Supp. 248, 252 (W.D. Okla. 1981); intra-agency communications about the case, see e.g. Gollaher v. United States, 419 F.2d 520, 528 (9th Cir. 1969); memoranda between prosecutors discussing the immunity of a government witness, see United States v. Pfingst, 490 F.2d 262, 274 n.14 (2d Cir. 1973); and documents discussing the decision to charge the defendant, see United States v. Berrigan, 482 F.2d 171, 181 (3d Cir. 1973). A "colorable basis" for a claim of selective prosecution may be sufficient to compel discovery of government documents relating to an initial decision to dismiss the complaint against the defendant and the subsequent decision to prosecute him. See e.g., United States v. Mitchell, 778 F.2d 1271, 1277 (7th Cir. 1985).

Rule 16(a)(2) does not permit pre-trial discovery of government witnesses' statements, except as provided in the Jencks Act, which requires disclosure if those witnesses testify at a pre-trial motion hearing. See United States v. Dockery, 294 A.2d 158, 164 (D.C. 1972); Super. Ct. Crim. R. 12(e) (both parties must produce statements of law enforcement officer called by defendant to testify at pre-trial motion to suppress). In addition, the testimony of a government witness, by itself, is not discoverable under Rule 16. See McIntyre v. United States, 634 A.2d 940, 945-46 (D.C. 1993).

Rule 16(a)(3) provides that, except as provided in Rule 6, 16(a)(1)(A), 12(e), and 26.2, no other recorded proceedings before a grand jury need be disclosed to the defense before trial. Rule 6(e)(3) sets forth the circumstances under which the court may order disclosure of grand jury proceedings.

These limiting provisions must give way, however, if such documents or transcripts contain Brady information to which the defense is constitutionally entitled. See (Adrian) Wiggins, 386 A.2d at 1173 n.3; infra Section II; see also United States v. Starusko, 729 F.2d 256, 260 (3d Cir. 1984) (finding that exculpatory FBI internal report discussing informant and containing informant's statements must be disclosed despite Jencks Act).

C. Disclosure of Evidence by the Defendant

1. Reciprocal Disclosure

Government compliance with certain defense discovery requests leads to entitlement to reciprocal disclosure of similar items by the defense. When the government discloses materials under Rule 16(a)(1)(C) or (D), the defense, upon government request, must disclose books, papers, photographs, documents and tangible objects in its possession, custody or control, if it intends to introduce them as evidence at trial. Similarly, following government disclosure of materials under Rule 16(a)(1)(C) or (D), the government is entitled upon request to copies of the results or reports of physical or mental examinations and of scientific tests or experiments, which the defendant intends to use as evidence at trial, or which were prepared by a defense witness and relate to that witness's testimony, if the defense intends to introduce the reports or the witness's testimony at trial.

Finally, if the defendant requests disclosure under Rule 16(a)(1)(E) and the government complies, at the government's request the defendant must provide the government with a written summary of any expert testimony the defense intends to use at trial.

Because the defense can be compelled to disclose the results of psychiatric tests of the defendant where an insanity defense has been raised, United States v. Carr, 437 F.2d 662, 663 (D.C. Cir. 1970), counsel should be absolutely certain that the results, or the experts who prepared them, will be used at trial, before turning the requested items over to the government.
Reciprocal obligations arise only as to the category of material the government has disclosed. There is no reciprocal right of discovery if the defense requests only copies of the defendant's statements or if the defendant has a constitutional right to disclosure under the principles enunciated in Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963).

2. Information Not Subject to Disclosure

Rule 16(b)(2) provides that:

> Except as to scientific or medical reports, this paragraph does not authorize the discovery or inspection of reports, memoranda, or other internal defense documents made by the defendant, or the defendant's attorneys or agents in connection with the investigation or defense of the case, or of statements made by the defendant, or by government or defense witnesses, or by prospective government or defense witnesses, to the defendant, the defendant's agents or attorneys.

This subdivision establishes a privilege for the defense similar to that provided for the government under Rule 16(a)(2).[9] See Middleton v. United States, 401 A.2d 109, 117 (D.C. 1979) (holding that trial court lacked authority under either Rule 16 or the Jencks Act to order disclosure of evidence obtained by defense investigator). But see Super. Ct. Crim. R. 26.2 (creating "reverse" Jencks Act).

In Parks v. United States, 451 A.2d 591 (D.C. 1982), the trial court refused the defendant's request to admit into evidence the testimony and interview notes of a codefendant's investigator, which concerned a government witness's line-up photo identifications, because they were attorney workproduct. The Court of Appeals found error, although harmless. It held that a defendant may invoke the work-product privilege against a codefendant, as well as the government. The party resisting disclosure must demonstrate that the disputed material was prepared in anticipation of litigation. The showing required to prevail against the privilege depends on whether the material sought is "fact work-product" or "opinion work-product." If it is fact work-product, the party seeking access must demonstrate a substantial need for the material. If it is opinion work-product, the party seeking production can overcome the privilege only by a showing of extreme necessity. If the material is a combination of both, the trial court should view the material in camera, and separate it appropriately, applying both standards. See id. at 607-08.

When calling an investigator, expert or other agent of the defense to testify as a witness, the defendant may waive the attorney work-product privilege and hence the guarantees of Rule 16(b)(2) with respect to reports or statements producible under the reverse-Jencks rule, Rule 26.2.[10]

West v. United States*, 100 A.3d 1076 (D.C. 2014). Trial court did not abuse its discretion by permitting prosecutor to introduce an automobile registration document showing that vehicle was registered to defendant, even though government had not produced document in response to Rule 16 discovery request, because admission of vehicle registration was not unfairly prejudicial [9] Gaither v. United States, 391 A.2d 1364 (D.C. 1978), discussed the provision in D.C. Code § 11-2605(a) for ex parte authorization of defense expenditures for investigative, expert and other services. The "request for defense related services should be by ex parte application," id. at 1367 n.3; "eligibility and need for a defense service [should] be determined in an ex parte proceeding" in order to avoid disclosure of the defense to the government, see id. at 1367 n.4; in passing upon the application, "the trial court should tend to rely on the judgment of counsel," and the resulting "conclusions and opinions need not be reported to either the court or the prosecution," id. at 1368.

[10] United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225 (1975), a pre-reverse-Jencks case, upheld an order, based on "the trial court's broad discretion as to evidentiary questions at trial," directing the defense to disclose statements obtained by an investigator from a government witness when the investigator was called to impeach the witness. The Court confined its ruling to disclosure during trial, to circumstances in which the defendant constructively waives the work-product privilege by calling counsel's agent as a witness, and to production of those documents that are relevant to the witness's testimony as determined by the trial court after in camera review. See id. at 234-36, 239-40. The result in most circumstances now would be achieved under Rule 26.2, but in unusual circumstances in which reverse-Jencks may not apply, Nobles is a supplemental vehicle for compelling disclosure of defense work-product.

where defendant knew without discovery that vehicle was registered to defendant and also knew that government might be able to prove this fact in some way other than introduction of vehicle registration.

Myers v. United States*, 15 A.3d 688 (D.C. 2011). Failure of Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority (WMATA) to provide assault defendant with digital video recording from bus on which assault took place did not constitute discovery violation because recording was not in possession of government where Metro Transit Police were not involved in case, and thus WMATA acted in proprietary, rather than governmental, manner.

II. THE BRADY DOCTRINE

Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), and its progeny require that the government disclose to the defendant, upon request, any evidence in its possession that is both favorable and material to guilt or punishment, at a time sufficient for it to be used for trial. The duty arises from the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment and is separate from and independent of any discovery under the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500, or the rules of criminal procedure. Failure to disclose such favorable evidence, regardless of the good or bad faith of the prosecutor, is a violation of Due Process. See Youngblood v. West Virginia, 547 U.S. 867 (2006) (reversing the defendant's conviction for sexual assault after ruling that he put forth a valid Brady claim that the government failed to produce evidence that two witnesses gave a written statement to a police officer that corroborated the defendant's claim of consensual sexual contact with the complainant).

Brady failed to establish a definition for "materiality;" Brady also failed to address the obligation of the prosecutor when no request for exculpatory evidence is made.[11] However, United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667 (1985), attempted to address both issues. The majority opinion looked to two cases outside the Brady context, in which the materiality of undisclosed evidence was an issue. See United States v. Valenzuela-Bernal, 458 U.S. 858 (1982); Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984). The Bagley Court then found the standard from these cases "flexible enough to cover the 'no request,' 'general request,' and 'specific request' cases of prosecutorial failure to disclose evidence favorable to the accused," Bagley, 473 U.S. at 682, and borrowed the standard for the materiality of undisclosed evidence from those cases. That standard is the one we know today—whether there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different. Id.[12]

The primary issues when litigating Brady are: what must be disclosed; who must make disclosure; the timing of the disclosure; and the effect of failure to disclose.

[11] "[T]he suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution." Brady, 373 U.S. at 87 (emphasis added).

[12] Note that the standard of materiality when the undisclosed evidence is perjured testimony appears to be less demanding; the prosecutor must disclose known perjury if "there is any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the judgment of the jury." United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 103 (1976). See discussion of perjury, infra Section A.1.f.

Gee v. United States*, 54 A.3d 1249 (D.C. 2012). Trial court did not err in refusing to grant mistrial or other sanction after government belatedly disclosed detective's notes and a photograph of defendant wearing hooded shirt where defense had already confronted complainant on key statement made in notes and cross-examined detective about statement and where photo was not used in case-in-chief but rather only upon defense inquiry as to whether detective had recovered hooded shirt from defendant's home.

Miller v. United States*, 14 A.3d 1094 (D.C. 2011). Reversible error for trial court not to find that government had effectively suppressed material exculpatory evidence in violation of Brady, thereby undermining fairness of defendant's trial, when government failed to disclose until evening before opening statements the grand jury testimony of principal eyewitness that gunman had shot pistol with left hand where defendant himself was right-handed.

United States v. Bailey*, 622 F.3d 1 (D.C. Cir. 2010). In case where trial court found probable cause to conduct traffic stop based on defendant's running of stop sign, thus leading to arrest for drugs in plain view on back seat, defendant failed to show Brady violation in government's inability to locate ticket for running stop sign where, although inability to locate was disclosed only on last day of trial, defendant was able to argue ticket's absence during closing argument to attack witness credibility and government's evidence in general, and where defendant could have recalled witness to further question him regarding apparent discrepancy in testimony.

Vaughn v. United States*, 93 A.3d 1237 (D.C. 2014). Government violated its Brady obligation to accurately and completely disclose the contents of an Internal Affairs final investigation report of prison guard, which evidenced the officer's prior false reporting and consequent demotion, and which the defense would have been able to use to impeach the officer who testified as to the identity of the defendant on a video recording.

Exculpatory Evidence:

- ✓ Counsel must request all exculpatory and/or inconsistent evidence from government
- ✓ Counsel should memorialize every request in written documents filed with the court

A. What Must Be Disclosed

The obligation of the prosecutor pursuant to Brady is to disclose any evidence that is both favorable and material to either guilt or punishment. Evidence is material, and constitutional error results from its suppression by the government "if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different." Bagley, 473 U.S. at 682. "A 'reasonable probability' of a different result is shown when the Government's evidentiary suppression 'undermines confidence in the outcome of the trial.'" Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 434 (1995) (quoting Bagley, 473 U.S. at 678). Material evidence includes both evidence that is directly exculpatory, and impeachment evidence. See Bagley, 473 U.S. at 676-77.

Despite these defining terms, "materiality" remains "an inevitably imprecise standard." Agurs, 427 U.S. at 108. For that reason, "and because the significance of an item of evidence can seldom be predicted accurately until the entire record is complete, the prudent prosecutor will resolve doubtful questions in favor of disclosure." Id. However, the "mere possibility that an item of undisclosed information might have helped the defense, or might have affected the outcome of the trial, does not establish 'materiality' in the Constitutional sense." Id. at 109-10. Although materiality must be evaluated on a case-by-case basis, there are certain situations in which the courts have determined that suppressed evidence was material, and from these cases one can begin to see some boundaries to the rule developing.

In Boyd v. United States, the court interpreted Strickland as saying that the Supreme Court's language in that case "can fairly be read only as recognizing that a duty of disclosure exists even if it later appears that reversal is not required." 908 A.2d 39 (D.C. 2006). The court also held that the Brady determination must be made "with a view to the need of defense counsel to explore a range of alternatives in developing and shaping a defense." Thus, under Boyd, it would seem that the defense, upon a showing of materiality, is entitled to all Brady-type defenses even if, for example, the client gave an alibi defense upon arrest, but evidence of self-defense existed. But see Reyes v. United States, 933 A.2d 785 (D.C. 2007) (no Brady violation where government did not have in its possession the information that defendant contended was Brady material. Brady imposes no duty upon police officers to investigate information that defendant might like to have); Watson v. United States, 940 A.2d 182 (D.C. 2008) (government's error in failing to disclose complete criminal history of informant under Brady did not require reversal where informant's motive to curry favor and escape further prosecution was fully probed before the jury and evidence apart from informant's testimony was strong); Tyler v. United States, 975 A.2d 848 (D.C. 2009) (holding that information that the government had obtained pretrial that defendant's girlfriend was a "pathological liar" was not Brady material that needed to be turned over to the defense – even when defense announced it would call her as a defense witness).

Porter v. United States*, 7 A.3d 1021 (D.C. 2010). No Brady or Sixth Amendment violation in government's failure to turn over PD-127 "confidential funds" form filled out for informant in case because form immaterial to defense as it was neither exculpatory evidence, as it was consistent with arresting officer's testimony, nor impeachment evidence, because informant did not testify.

1. Impeachment of Government Witnesses

Impeachment evidence challenging the witness's credibility generally falls within the Brady rule. See Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 154 (1972); Lewis v. United States, 408 A.2d 303, 307 (D.C. 1979). The importance of impeachment evidence was noted in Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39 (1987) (plurality opinion), where the Court remanded for the trial court to re-examine confidential records for materiality:

> [W]hen reviewing confidential records in future cases, trial courts should be particularly aware of the possibility that impeachment evidence of a key prosecution witness could well constitute the sort whose unavailability to the defendant would undermine confidence in the outcome of the trial. . . . Impeachment evidence is precisely the type of information that might be deemed to be material only well into the trial, as, for example, after the key witness has testified.

Id. at 65 (Blackmun, concurring); see also In re Sealed Case (Brady Obligations), 185 F.3d 887 (D.C. Cir. 1999); Conley v. United States, 415 F.2d 183 (1st Cir. 2005) (finding Brady violation for withholding of FBI memorandum indicating that key witness had expressed uncertainty about his recollection of the incident); Silva v. Brown, 416 F.3d 980 (9th Cir. 2005).

In Bennett v. United States, the Court of Appeals held a Brady violation had occurred when the government was allowed to redact portions of an important government witness's grand jury testimony showing she lied about another murder she witnessed. 797 A.2d 1251 (D.C. 2002). Given the government's case rested on the credibility of three witnesses, the court held there was a reasonable probability that had the evidence been disclosed the result of the proceeding would have been different leading the court to reverse Bennett's convictions. Id. at 1258. The Bennett court stated impeaching evidence is exculpatory and thus can be material to guilt or punishment within the meaning of Brady. Id. at 1256 (citing Lewis v. Untied States, 408 A.2d 303, 307 (D.C. 1979)). See Ginyard v. United States, 816 A.2d 21, 32 (D.C. 2003) (stating the government's constitutional duty to disclose material evidence favorable to the criminal defendant extends to evidence that could be used to impeach the credibility of a government witness); Gaither v. United States, 759 A.2d 655, 662 (D.C. 2000), mandate recalled and amended by, 816 A.2d 791 (D.C. 2003); Brown v. United States, 726 A.2d 149, 156 n.3 (D.C. 1999). Further support for this proposition is found in:

- United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667 (1985) – prosecutor gave defendant affidavits from witnesses that they had given their statements without threats, rewards or promises of reward; failure to disclose the fact that two main witnesses were paid commensurate with the information they could provide about this defendant specifically determined to be material Brady impeachment evidence.

- Giles v. Maryland, 386 U.S. 66 (1967) – suppression by prosecutor of evidence relevant to the rape victim's credibility (prior unsubstantiated rape claims, prior criminal record, prior history of mental illness, and inconsistent statement given to police the night of the incident) violates Brady.

- U.S. v. Quinn, 537 F.Supp.2d 99 (D.D.C. 2008) – Government failed to disclose that their "key" witness had made false statements, the witness was now a target of the investigation and was involved in plea discussions, and they would not use him at trial because they doubted his credibility. The government argued that although they had indications the witness was unreliable, there was no duty to disclose statements of his that they weren't sure were lies. This distinction between "knowing" and being "highly suspicious" was not a sufficient excuse and the government failed their duty to search for Brady information when they didn't investigate his credibility. The court found that government affirmatively misled defense on material aspects of the case and ordered a new trial.

a. "Merely cumulative" impeachment evidence

When a witness for the government is impeached at trial by the defense, further undisclosed impeachment evidence may be held not material because it is merely cumulative; that is, the undisclosed evidence does not attack the witness's statements in any new manner. This is true only if the witness was impeached at trial with the same kind of evidence. If the undisclosed impeachment evidence attacks the credibility of the witness in a manner unrelated to the trial impeachment, it is not "merely cumulative" and is therefore material, if admissible.

In United States v. Cuffie, the D.C. Circuit held that a co-conspirator witness's perjury in a past expungement hearing [witness was an ex-police officer] is material and failure to disclose the perjury violates Brady. 80 F.3d 514 (D.C. Cir. 1996). The court held that the impeachment was not merely cumulative where the trial impeachment involved evidence that the same witness was a drug addict and had violated his oath as a police officer by being involved in the drug conspiracy, but not evidence of witness's perjury in expungement hearing. Id. Similarly, in United States v. Smith, the D.C. Circuit held that undisclosed impeachment evidence of witness's deal with the prosecutor to testify in exchange for dismissal of two pending felonies, and witness's long history of serious mental illness were material under Brady. 77 F.3d 511 (D.C. Cir. 1996). Such information was not "merely cumulative" where the impeachment at trial consisted only of witness admitting under cross-examination that the government had agreed not to charge him with any uncharged, non-violent offenses he may have committed prior to the trial. Id.

b. Prior inconsistent statements of witnesses

Substantially inconsistent statements of government witnesses may be sufficiently material to the issue of guilt so as to constitute Brady material. See (Raphael) Smith v. United States, 666 A.2d 1216, 1224 (D.C. 1995); Giles v. Maryland, 386 U.S. 66, 76-77 (1967) (plurality opinion). Although the defense is entitled under the Jencks Act to production of prior inconsistent statements only at trial following the witness's testimony, disclosure under Brady may permit counsel to obtain statements before trial and may result in broader disclosure. See Black v. United States, 755 A.2d 1005, 1009-10 (D.C. 2000) (trial court erred in not conducting a Brady inquiry with regard to statements the government withheld that were inconsistent with the witness's testimony); United States v. Starusko, 729 F.2d 256, 263 (3d Cir. 1984); see also Bullock v. United States, 709 A.2d 87, 92 (D.C. 1998).

The seminal Supreme Court case is Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995). In Kyles, a witness testified at trial that he saw the murderer shoot the victim in the head with a black .32 caliber handgun, then get inside the victim's red LTD and drive away, and that he recognized the defendant as the shooter. The prosecutor's failed to disclose witness's prior statement to the police the night of the incident that he did not see anything until he heard a shot, and then saw an unidentified man driving away in a red Thunderbird. The Supreme Court held that considered together with other impeachment evidence, this information was material and therefore violated Brady. But see Coleman v. United States, 515 A.2d 439 (D.C. 1986) (finding no Brady violation where prosecutor only disclosed inconsistent statements of other witnesses in police report after the police officer testified). Inconsistencies were not so material as to conclude there was a reasonable probability of a different result to the proceedings because witnesses' credibility was impeached by defense on original cross-examination, and the witnesses admitted under oath that they had told different versions of the events at different times because they were afraid).

Thompson v. United States*, 45 A.3d 688 (D.C. 2012). Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying motion for mistrial, though government had discovered that a witness had testified incorrectly in a prior proceeding, where prosecution did not discover false testimony until trial was in progress and where defense counsel was able to make ample use of witness's cross-examination through impeachment over the mistaken statement.

Prior Inconsistent Statements:

- ✓ Follow-up and directly ask the witness about all statements he or she has made
- ✓ Request an in camera review to assess all prior inconsistent statements

c. Victim's or witness's character (including prior bad acts)

Because it is permissible to impeach witnesses with their prior bad acts "where '(1) the examiner has a factual predicate for such questions, and (2) the bad act bears directly upon the veracity of the witness in respect to the issues involved in the trial,'" Sherer v. United States, 470 A.2d 732, 738 (D.C. 1983) (quoting United States v. Akers, 374 A.2d 874, 887 (D.C. 1977)),[13] disclosure of such acts, when known by the prosecution, may be required by the Brady rule. Applying this general principle, cross-examination is permitted on prior false reports of similar "crimes" by a key witness. See Lawrence v. United States, 482 A.2d 374, 377 (D.C. 1984). The court has also raised the possibility that a witness may be cross-examined about unadjudicated acts of perjury. See Sherer, 470 A.2d at 738. Therefore, counsel should specifically request that the prosecutor conduct a search of available law enforcement agency records, as with Lewis material, to determine the existence of requested information. Documentation of the content and value of suspected Brady material is critical. See Farley v. United States, 694 A.2d 887, 890 (D.C. 1997)

[13] See also Grayton v. United States, 745 A.2d 274, 280 (D.C. 2000).

(remanding for review of content of police complaint review board investigation and witness statement.)

In Giles v. Maryland, 386 U.S. 66 (1967), a rape trial, evidence of juvenile victim's promiscuity (admissible under state law) was material and prosecutor's failure to disclose was a Brady violation. However, in United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976), the Supreme Court held that in a self-defense murder case, evidence of stabbing victim's prior criminal record, including guilty pleas to charges of assault and carrying a deadly weapon, were not material; the character of the victim was already apparent from the uncontradicted evidence at trial that he carried two knives. Notably, however, defense counsel had made no request for such material.

d. Impeachable convictions

A witness's prior impeachable convictions (those offenses involving dishonesty, false statements or fraud, or carrying a possible penalty of death or more than one year in prison, see D.C. Code § 14-305), known to the government must be disclosed before or at trial upon the request of the defendant. See Lewis v. United States (Lewis II), 408 A.2d 303 (D.C. 1979). While neither Brady, nor its progeny, has directly addressed impeachable convictions, other cases have expressly held that impeachment evidence is within the purview of Brady. See Bagley, 473 U.S. at 690-91. The factors favoring the mandatory disclosure of impeachable convictions were articulated by the court in Lewis II, 408 A.2d at 309:

> [G]iven (1) the legislative finding inherent in § 14-305 that use of impeachable convictions is likely to affect the outcome, (2) the Brady-Agurs concept of due process, and (3) the incongruity of leaving the decision about the potential impact of impeachable convictions of government witnesses in the hands of the prosecutor, we reaffirm our conclusion that the risk of a Brady violation from the failure to disclose impeachable convictions of government witnesses is so substantial that the right to a fair trial is implicated in the absence of a pre-trial enforcement mechanism. Although it may be somewhat strained to conclude that potentially all impeachable convictions can affect the outcome, we believe it is more strained to assume, as the government does, that failure to disclose such convictions is not likely to affect the outcome—an assumption contrary to Congress' implicit finding in adopting § 14-305. . . . We therefore reaffirm our holding that if the government knows about a prior conviction of one of its witnesses, usable for impeachment under D.C. Code 1973, § 14-305, then Fifth Amendment due process requires the government to disclose that conviction to the defendant, upon request.

Since disclosure is mandatory upon request, counsel should always include a demand for impeachable convictions of all government witnesses as a Brady request in each case. The prosecutor's personal knowledge of the witness's record is immaterial; the government is presumed to "know" any record listed in government records accessible to the prosecution. See Lewis v. United States (Lewis I), 393 A.2d 109, 116 (D.C. 1978).[14] There is no obligation to provide information otherwise available to the defense – especially information that is part of the public record.

[14] This standard may exclude records that have been destroyed pursuant to established record-keeping policies, records which are statutorily closed to the prosecutor, or even the temporary inability to access records between the time the request is made and the end of the trial. See Young v. United States, 478 A.2d 287 (D.C. 1984).

Lewis II also established a procedure for requests for juvenile adjudications: (1) upon timely pre-trial request, the prosecutor shall file with the court a record of all such adjudications, together with a representation as to whether the adjudication may indicate a bias against the defendant; (2) if the court determines that the adjudication bears on the issue of bias, it shall be disclosed; (3) if the court determines that there is no bearing on the issue of bias, it shall not be disclosed unless the court is convinced that impeachment of the witness on the basis of the adjudication is likely to be material to the outcome of the proceeding; and (4) after conviction, any undisclosed adjudication shall be sealed and made part of the record on appeal. See Lewis II, 408 A.2d at 312; see also Tabron v. United States, 410 A.2d 209, 212 (D.C. 1979).

2014 Supplement

Robinson v. United States*, 50 A.3d 508 (D.C. 2012). Insufficient basis to find that government suppressed evidence learned "shortly before she testified" of complaining witness's use of PCP morning of offense where witness had repeatedly represented pretrial that she had not been under the influence of any drug at time of offense and where defendants knew from co-defendant's statement that witness was PCP user.

Impeachable Convictions:

✓ Government's mandatory disclosure of all impeachable convictions must be provided before trial

e. Witness bias

Information that a government witness may have a bias in favor of the government or against the defendant is Brady material. See Bagley, 473 U.S. at 676; Giglio, 405 U.S. at 155; see also In re Sealed Case (Brady Obligations), supra (government witness's cooperation agreements constituted Brady in that they provided evidence of witness's motive to plant weapons in accused's home); United States v. Bowie, 198 F.3d 905, 909 (D.C. Cir. 1999) ("Bias can manifest itself in hostility to one side but it can also take the form of favoring a litigant."), citing United States v. Schaffer, 183 F.3d 833, 852 (D.C. Cir. 1999). The most commonly litigated bias pursuant to Brady is a witness's potential "liberty interest" bias – that the witness has a criminal case pending in court at the time of trial, or is on probation, parole, or supervised release any of which might be favorably affected by government action. See Artis v. United States, 505 A.2d 52 (D.C. 1986); McNeil v. United States, 465 A.2d 807, 811-12 (D.C. 1983). The following "liberty interest" cases are instructive:

- Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972) – suppressed evidence was material where assistant prosecutor promised a witness (a co-conspirator of the defendant) that he would not be prosecuted if he agreed to testify against the defendant; lead prosecutor suppressed the inducement under the claim that he did not authorize the promise.

- Sterling v. United States, 691 A.2d 126, 135 (D.C. 1997) – failure of prosecutor to disclose pending possession of heroin charge was not material where the witness's departure from his grand jury testimony caused the government to impeach his testimony at trial; since the impact of the witness's testimony was negligible, the possible use of the pending charge to impeach him would not have impacted the trial result.

- United States v. Smith, 77 F.3d 511 (D.C. Cir. 1996) – government failed to disclose agreement to dismiss two pending felony charges against a witness in exchange for his testimony. The witness had only admitted from the stand the government's agreement not to file any new charges against him for any non-violent crimes that he may have committed with which he had not yet been charged. Suppressed evidence was material and failure to disclose violated due process.

Also disclosable are monetary and other material benefits supplied to government witnesses who testify at trial. See generally (Melvin) Johnson v. United States, 636 A.2d 978, 980 (D.C. 1994); Sherer v. United States, 470 A.2d 732, 739 (D.C. 1983).

Other cases involving material benefits are:

- Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995) – state's witness received $1,600 reward for his testimony in murder trial of defendant. Because record is unclear whether this evidence was disclosed to defense, the case was remanded for lower court to determine if disclosure had occurred.

- United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667 (1985) – at trial, prosecutor provided affidavits from witnesses that they had received no payment or other inducement for their testimony; defense discovered post-trial that two main government witnesses were under contract to be paid "commensurate with the information given."

If the witness has some desire to minimize or hide his/her own involvement, known to the government, that information is likewise Brady material. For instance, in Kyles, 514 U.S. 419, the prosecutor suppressed evidence that government's primary witness, who gave police all the information about where and when to locate numerous pieces of evidence, was himself linked to other similar crimes that occurred at the same location where the instant offense occurred. The Court found a Brady violation.

Bias can take many forms, and counsel should be alert to request specifically under Brady all possibly relevant forms of bias of government witnesses so that the subject may be explored on cross-examination. See, e.g., (Dennis) Jackson v. United States, 623 A.2d 571, 583 (D.C. 1993)

(holding that witness's mental or emotional condition is ripe for bias inquiry when witness allegedly told his psychologist that defendant was a "devil"); In re C.B.N., 499 A.2d 1215, 1219-20 (D.C. 1985) (finding "corruption" of the witness – extorting money from the defendant – a form of bias); Moreno v. United States, 482 A.2d 1233 (D.C. 1984) (finding bias when witness harbors racial bias against persons of defendant's race); Beynum v. United States, 480 A.2d 698, 707-08 (D.C. 1984) (holding that defendant's pending civil suit against witness, or witness's other pecuniary interest in outcome of trial is bias); Petway v. United States, 391 A.2d 798, 801 (D.C. 1978) (finding bias when witness disliked defendant); see also In re Sealed Case, 185 F.3d 887 (Brady Obligations); United States v. Bowie, 198 F.3d at 909 (bias may be for one party or against another one).

Extrinsic evidence of bias is always admissible. See Grayton v. United States, 745 A.2d at 281 (citations omitted); Bethea v. United States, 599 A.2d 415, 417 (D.C. 1991); C.B.N., 499 A.2d at 1218. Counsel should request any extrinsic evidence, such as documents, showing the bias.

f. Perjury at trial

Even before Brady, the Supreme Court created a broad duty for the prosecutor to disclose perjured testimony. Due process is violated any time perjured testimony is procured by the prosecutor. See Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103 (1935); Hawthorne v. United States, 504 A.2d 580, 589-90 (D.C. 1986); United States v. Cuffie, 80 F.3d 514 (D.C. Cir. 1996). Solicitation of the perjury is not required; even when the perjury comes completely on the whim of the witness, if the prosecutor knows it is false, there is a duty to disclose. See Alcorta v. Texas, 355 U.S. 28 (1957).

Mooney and Alcorta dealt with perjury concerning the facts of the case, but the prosecutor has a duty to disclose perjury going to the credibility of the witness as well. See Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264 (1959) (finding that prosecutor's failure to correct or disclose a witness's false statement that he had not been promised lenient treatment in another matter in exchange for his testimony against the defendant, violated due process). Whether the defendant has requested any Brady material or not, the prosecutor must disclose known perjury if "there is any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the judgment of the jury." United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 103 (1976).[15] Other cases about perjury include:

- Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972) – witness denied promise of lenience by another prosecutor, of which examining prosecutor did not know; promise was within government's knowledge, so non-disclosure required reversal.

[15]Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, divided non-disclosure situations into three categories: 1) perjury; 2) specific requests for exculpatory material; and 3) general or no request for exculpatory material. Each situation had a different standard of materiality. Three of the five Justices in the Bagley majority stated in a concurrence that the unified standard announced in that case was "sufficiently flexible to cover all instances of prosecutorial failure to disclose evidence favorable to the accused," id. at 685, and it was generally assumed this meant the Court would use a single standard for instances of perjured testimony as well. But Kyles, 514 U.S. at 429, expressly discussed that Bagley "abandoned the distinction between the second and third Agurs circumstances, i.e. the 'specific-request' and 'general- or no-request' situations." Because the first Agurs circumstance, perjury, was omitted, it has been inferred that Kyles maintained the distinct standard for perjury situations.

- Giles v. Maryland, 386 U.S. 66 (1967) – victim and her boyfriend, both witnesses at defendant's trial, testified as to factual events in manner totally contradictory to the statements they gave to police: prosecutor made no attempt to correct their testimony despite knowing about the prior statements.

2014 Supplement

Longus v. United States*, 52 A.3d 836 (D.C. 2012) Government's obligation to disclose known perjury not dependent on whether government called witness in question.

g. Other areas of impeachment

Additional areas of impeachment which fall under Brady include the government's knowledge of conditions affecting a government witness's capacity to observe, perceive, or recollect, such as mental illness or retardation. See United States v. Smith, 86 F.3d 1237 (D.C. Cir. 1996). Alcohol or drug intoxication at a relevant time, or chronic substance abuse also should be disclosed. See (Stanley) Jackson v. United States, 377 A.2d 1151, 1154 (D.C. 1977); United States v. Kearney, 420 F.2d 170, 172 (D.C. Cir. 1969). Disclosure of medical or psychological records, certain juvenile records, and other confidential records will only be ordered by the court if the defendant can make a "proffer adequate to overcome [the] privacy interest" of the subject of those records. See Hammon v. United States, 695 A.2d 97, 106 (D.C. 1997) (holding that unsubstantiated hearsay that witness was suffering from an undefined psychiatric disorder and was implicated in unspecified homicides was insufficient to overcome the privacy interest). While there is no "formula" for what is adequate, counsel should note that the more detailed and substantiated the request is, the more likely the court will rule the proffer adequate.

2. Self-Defense

Information supporting a claim of self-defense is exculpatory. See United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976); Johns v. United States, 434 A.2d 463, 472 (D.C. 1981). Evidence of complainant or decedent's prior acts of violence and reputation for violence is admissible in support of a claim of self-defense, whether or not known by the defendant. See (William) Johnson v. United States, 452 A.2d 959, 961 (D.C. 1982). Therefore, counsel should always make a Brady request for the complainant or decedent's FBI rap sheet, see Martinez v. Wainwright, 621 F.2d 184, 188 (5th Cir. 1980); police reports and investigative files, including grand jury transcripts, on prior violent acts by the complainant/decedent; unadjudicated prior acts of violence by the complainant/decedent; and any witnesses who state that the complainant/decedent had a reputation for violence.

Communicated or uncommunicated threats against the defendant by, or at the behest of, the complainant or decedent, are admissible in support of a claim of self-defense in assault and homicide cases. See Frost v. United States, 618 A.2d 653, 663 (D.C. 1992) (citation omitted).

3. Guilt of Someone Other than the Defendant

Evidence tending to show someone other than the defendant committed the crime of which he or she is accused is unquestionably Brady material. See Barbee v. Warden, 331 F.2d 842, 844 (4th Cir. 1964). The evidence must be more than mere rumor or an unsubstantiated investigatory lead to trigger the disclosure requirements. Hence, failure to disclose that some unidentified person committed the crime does not rise to a Brady rule violation. See Winfield v. United States, 676 A.2d 1 (1996) (standard for admissibility of third party culpability). In United States v. Battle, 754 A.2d 312, 314 (D.C. 2000), the Court of Appeals held that "the trial court erred in excluding evidence of [an] earlier shooting" in which "another person so closely resembling [the accused] had been mistaken for [the accused and had] committed a similar (nonfatal) shooting two weeks before the murder with one of the same pistols used in the murder." With respect to sentencing, an accomplice's confession to being the principal in the offense, even if it implicates the defendant as an accessory, is material to punishment and must be disclosed before sentencing. As general matter however, and as the below listed cases indicate, the government's duty to disclose tends to be construed narrowly and excludes evidence of which the defendant is aware or to which the defendant has independent access. The lead case is Kyles, 514 U.S. 419, which held that the cumulative effect of all the suppressed evidence by the government: (list of all cars in crime scene parking lot did not include defendant's car, and testimony of witness was that he drove defendant back to the crime scene the next day to pick up his car; government's main witness knew exactly where and when key evidence would turn up; evidence that same witness was linked to several other crimes at the same location as this murder; and eyewitnesses' sworn testimony at trial that contradicted witnesses' statements to police), was material to guilt or innocence and failure to disclose violated due process. However, the following are cases that find no Brady violation on the facts presented:

- Matthews v. United States, 629 A.2d 1185 (D.C. 1993) – no Brady violation where government failed to disclose statement to the effect that defendant was not involved in the murder, where statement was double hearsay, vague, and unlikely by itself to have significant impact on the trial. Failure of prosecutor to disclose co-defendant's taped confession to police, exculpating the defendant of any involvement in the actual murder itself, was immaterial, where the court found as fact that the prosecutor did disclose the substance of the statement to the defense. Also immaterial was the failure to disclose the transcripts of the co-defendant's plea hearing, since it was readily available to the defense as a public record and the defense was aware of its existence.

- Johnson v. United States, 544 A.2d 270 (D.C. 1988) – disclosure during trial of misidentification by witnesses of someone other than defendant as the perpetrator did not violate Brady simply because it was not revealed before trial began.

- Henson v. United States, 399 A.2d 16 (D.C. 1979) – Since the Brady rule is applicable only to evidence unknown to the defendant, it was immaterial that the prosecution did not disclose a transcript of the defendant's parole hearing, in which witness, a passenger in defendant's car at the time of his arrest, testified as to ownership of the guns defendant was charged with possessing. Defendant was present at his parole hearing with his attorney, and was fully aware of the existence and contents of the passenger's testimony.

- Frezzell v. United States, 380 A.2d 1382 (D.C. 1977) – mid-trial disclosure of a statement of a witness who could not be located at the time of the trial, that the assailant was 17-19 years old, 5'7"-5'9" tall. Defendant was 40 years old and 6 feet tall. No Brady violation; the information was disclosed, and the court ruled that if defendant needed more time to prepare based on the disclosure, he should have requested a continuance.

- Smith v. United States, 363 A.2d 667 (D.C. 1976) – government withheld lab report until trial that none of the defendant's pubic hair had been found in combings of the rape victim's pubic area, nor had any been discovered in victim's bed, where rape took place. Immaterial for Brady purposes what evidence did not exist.

- United States v. Sedgwick, 345 A.2d 465 (D.C. 1975) – unverified "street rumor" that another person committed the crime, investigated by police until defendant confessed, was not disclosed until mid-trial (after police testify); immaterial because it was inadmissible hearsay.

B. Identification issues

Evidence that an eyewitness identified someone, other than the defendant, as the perpetrator of the alleged offense by name, or in any identification procedure is Brady material. See Cannon v. Alabama, 558 F.2d 1211, 1215-16 (5th Cir. 1977); Grant v. Alldredge, 498 F.2d 376, 382 (2nd Cir. 1974). But see Johnson, 544 A.2d at 275 ("the mere failure of a witness to make an identification is not exculpatory."). Similarly, information that a witness stated that the defendant was not the perpetrator is Brady. See United States ex rel. Meers v. Wilkins, 326 F.2d 135, 136 (2d Cir. 1964) (even where counsel did not request disclosure of the evidence). More commonly, information that a witness gave a description of the perpetrator that differs from the defendant in some material aspect, e.g., height, weight, race, complexion, clothing, age, etc. should be considered Brady material. See Frezzell, 380 A.2d at 1384-85 (D.C. 1977); Jackson v. Wainwright, 390 F.2d 288, 298 (5th Cir. 1968); cf. Davies v. United States, 476 A.2d 658, 661 (D.C. 1984) (failure to disclose that witness, who did not testify at trial, had told police that defendant's companion was white, when the trial witnesses described the companion as a light complected black man, did not require reversal because the information was not sufficiently "material," as it had no impeachment value).

2014 Supplement

Mackabee v. United States*, 29 A.3d 952 (D.C. 2011). Although government's handling of Brady obligations "troubling" in that it revealed less than one week before trial both information that one eyewitness failed to identify defendant from group photos including him and a videotaped statement of another eyewitness that included a description that "could not match" defendant, reversal not required where discovery package sent to defense counsel one year earlier contained sufficient information for defense counsel to track down witness that had failed to identify defendant and where discovery package included notes of videotaped statement and defense counsel had opportunity to cross-examine witness regarding his statement.

C. Disclosure of Evidence "in the Government's Possession"

Any exculpatory, material evidence personally known by the prosecutor, or in his or her personal possession, must be disclosed. However, the obligation to disclose is not limited to evidence personally known: evidence held by other agencies acting on behalf of the government, such as law enforcement agencies, also is covered by the Brady rule. The District of Columbia Circuit has extended this duty to cover any government investigative agency or jail authority. United States v. Butler, 499 F.2d 1006 (D.C. Cir. 1974). The Court of Appeals, however, has declined to embrace this holding. See March v. United States, 362 A.2d 691, 700 (D.C. 1976); cf. Farley v. United States, 694 A.2d 887, 890 (D.C. 1997) ("the government is responsible for knowing what the police know"). In the Jencks/Rule 16 context, however the Court of Appeals in Robinson v. United States, held that the United States Attorney's Office was deemed to be in possession of a phone call recorded by the District of Columbia Department of Corrections. In a case in which a threatening statement was captured on a jail phone recording system, the court held that the police "as an integral part of the prosecution team had an obligation to secure the tape recording." 825 A.2d 318, 328 (D.C. 2003).

The prosecutor has no constitutional obligation sua sponte to search the investigative files of other agencies for Brady material. See Agurs, 427 U.S. 109; Lewis I, 393 A.2d at 116. Therefore, it is of critical importance that a specific request for such material be made to put the prosecutor on notice that such evidence may exist and to trigger the duty to investigate. These requests should be sufficiently in advance of trial to allow for any investigation prompted by disclosure. See Young v. United States, 478 A.2d 287 (D.C. 1984) (when defense does not request a criminal record until the start of the trial, and the computer access to records was temporarily unavailable, the record the prosecutor did disclose was considered the complete record available to the government at the relevant time and there was no Brady violation).

Once requested, the collective knowledge of law enforcement is imputed to the prosecutor. See Kyles, 514 U.S. 419 (prosecutor's claim that much of the undisclosed exculpatory evidence was not disclosed to him by the police is irrelevant; the knowledge of the police is imputed to the prosecution); Giglio, 405 U.S. 150 (witness denied promise of lenience by another prosecutor, of which examining prosecutor did not know; promise was within government's knowledge, so non-disclosure required reversal); Lewis, 393 A.2d 109 (criminal record of the government's witness was readily accessible to the prosecution, prosecutor's personal ignorance of that record is irrelevant: government is deemed to know all prior convictions that are listed in government records accessible to the prosecution. Additionally, government is deemed to have knowledge of information in files of MPD and FBI).

The records of other government agencies may also be considered "in the possession of the government" and, therefore, subject to Brady rules for disclosure under certain circumstances.

- Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39 (1987) – case remanded where trial court refused to review in camera Children and Youth Services files related to defendant's daughter, the alleged victim of parental sexual abuse; state law allowed use of social services' files in some proceedings, and defendant's request for Brady material from said files created an obligation for court to review same to determine if such material existed, instead of summarily denying the defendant's motion to turn the files over as Brady material.

- Farley v. United States, 694 A.2d 887, 890 (D.C. 1997) – complaint filed with the Civilian Complaint Review Board by occupant of private residence against officer who arrested the defendant following an alleged "hot pursuit" into the residence may be Brady material. Such complaint goes to the credibility of the officer's statements about entering the residence in pursuit of defendant. Case remanded to determine if complaint was exculpatory and whether it had been disclosed to the defense.

- United States v. Smith, 77 F.3d 511 (D.C. Cir. 1996) – error where trial court refused to examine the government witness's available psychiatric history for evidence material under Brady. History of mental illness can be admissible for impeachment purposes, and trial court could not determine the materiality or admissibility of such information without a review of the evidence.

2014 Supplement

Myers v. United States*, 15 A.3d 688 (D.C. 2011). Failure of Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority (WMATA) to provide assault defendant with digital video recording from bus on which assault took place did not constitute discovery violation because recording was not in possession of government where Metro Transit Police were not involved in case, and thus WMATA acted in proprietary, rather than governmental, manner.

D. Court's Obligation when Defense Requests Brady Material

The court has an obligation to ensure that the mandates of the due process protections of the Brady doctrine are followed. In Boyd v. United States, the court held that the trial court had an obligation to assure that the government properly discloses Brady to the defense. 908 A.2d 39 (D.C. 2006). In Boyd, the court remanded the case to the trial court for production of the statements of witnesses that the trial judge had refused to review in camera, saying the trial judge abused her discretion by merely relying on the government's assertions that the statements contained nothing exculpatory. The court held that prosecutorial discretion to identify information that must be turned over pursuant to Brady is not unlimited, and "courts have the obligation to assure that it is exercised in a manner consistent with the right of the accused to a fair trial."

In the typical case, the government decides which information to disclose pursuant to Brady. Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 59 (1987). However, if the prosecutor acknowledges the existence of some evidence that could be considered inconsistent, or in any other circumstance where the defendant shows more than mere speculation of the existence of specific exculpatory evidence (e.g., a Department of Social Services file on the victim, transcript of a prior deposition, etc.), it is incumbent upon the trial court to review the evidence and determine if the information is material under Brady. Failure of the court to review such information before summarily ruling it to be immaterial often results in the conviction being remanded. A trial court's determination of materiality will not be disturbed on appeal unless the decision was "unreasonable." Agurs, 427 U.S. at 114. See Smith v. United States, 665 A.2d 962 (D.C. 1995) (court refused, after request of the defendant, to review transcripts of prior juvenile proceeding against a juvenile codefendant for statement of a now-unavailable witness that defendant was not involved in the shooting. Prosecutor implied that the transcript only contains "minor inconsistencies," not contradictory evidence. Trial court abused its discretion by not reviewing the transcript after the prosecutor made the implication).

Court's Obligation to Ensure Brady is Followed:

- ✓ Court can not merely rely on government's assertions that statements contain no exculpatory material
- ✓ Request that court make inquiry regarding potential Brady material on the record

E. Limitations on Disclosure

Only exculpatory information is covered by Brady. "There is no general constitutional right to discovery in a criminal case, and Brady did not create one." Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545, 559 (1977) (no contention that the information sought – the identity of an undercover agent—would be at all exculpatory; accused was simply trying to learn the identity of key witness before trial); cf. Lindsey v. United States, 911 A.2d 824 (D.C. 2006) (government's failure to make proper Brady/Giglio disclosures did not constitute reversible error because there was not a reasonable probability that results of proceeding would have been different had evidence been properly disclosed where court delayed proceedings to give government time to make its required disclosures, defense counsel was able to make effective use of information in cross-examining witnesses, and court instructed jury not to hold trial delays against any party).
Information otherwise known to or available to the defendant is not considered Brady material. This may include criminal records generally available to the public, such as records maintained by the local clerk of court. It may also include information known to defense counsel. See e.g., Sterling v. United States, 691 A.2d 126 (D.C. 1997) (failure to disclose witness's pending heroin possession charges prior to trial is not a Brady violation because the information regarding the pending charge was available to the public – and, therefore, the defendant – from the clerk of court); Simms v. United States, 634 A.2d 442 (D.C. 1993) (no Brady violation for governmental nondisclosure of complainant's misidentification at line-up where defense counsel was present at line-up and, therefore, knew about misidentification before trial, and effectively used the information at trial); Gates v. United States, 481 A.2d 120 (D.C. 1984) (government provided defense with copy of the scientific report regarding results of blood typing in rape/murder case, report did not explain the findings in layman's terms, and defense failed to appreciate significant information contained in the report; not a Brady violation because expert was known and available to defense to interpret the results); Henson v. United States, 399 A.2d 16 (D.C. 1979) (it was immaterial that the prosecution did not disclose a transcript of the defendant's parole hearing, in which witness, a passenger in defendant's car at the time of his arrest, testified as to ownership of the guns defendant was charged with possessing; defendant was present at his parole hearing with his attorney, and was fully aware of the existence and contents of the passenger's testimony).

The burden of showing the materiality of inadmissible evidence is far more demanding. While not completely foreclosing the possibility that inadmissible evidence can be material under Brady, Wood v. Bartholomew, 516 U.S. 1 (1995), held that such evidence (specifically, a polygraph result) could not directly affect the outcome of the trial. Although the appellant argued that the evidence could possibly lead to admissible evidence, the Court found that argument "mere speculation," and insufficient to require disclosure under Brady. Counsel must show definitely that specific and admissible evidence would be obtained from the use of the otherwise inadmissible evidence in order to argue the materiality of such inadmissible evidence. While this may be possible at the appellate level (where the appellant can show that the undisclosed evidence, discovered post-trial, led to some directly material evidence), this burden is difficult to overcome at the trial level, since the defendant's knowledge of such material evidence before trial negates the applicability of Brady.

- Wood v. Bartholomew, 516 U.S. 1 (1995) – government failed to disclose polygraph results in which witness, defendant's brother, showed deception on questions about his own involvement in the murder/robbery; results were not material because they were not admissible, and testimony of defendant's brother and brother's girlfriend, as well as the "accidental shooting defense" (where the weapon was a single shot revolver and the victim was shot twice execution style) made it not reasonably likely that disclosure would have made a difference in the outcome.

- Smith v. United States, 666 A.2d 1216, 1224 (D.C. 1995) – witness inability to pass a polygraph is not material because inadmissible, so government failure to disclose the polygraph result does not violate Brady.

F. Timing of Brady Disclosures

The "prosecution must disclose exculpatory material 'at such time as to allow the defense to use the favorable material effectively in the preparation and presentation of its case.'" Edelen v. United States, 627 A.2d 968, 970 (D.C. 1993) (quoting United States v. Pollack, 534 F.2d 964, 973 (D.C. Cir 1976)). Information that would require more than a cursory investigation should be disclosed prior to trial; other information can be disclosed during trial without implicating the rule. See United States v. Engram, 337 A.2d 488, 492-93 (D.C. 1975) (prior convictions and arrest record need not be disclosed before trial).

There is substantial authority recommending early disclosure of Brady material. In Ebron v. United States, the court emphasized:

> prosecutors are expected to resolve all reasonable uncertainty about the potential materiality of exculpatory evidence in favor of prompt disclosure . . . When the government fails to make prompt disclosure, as required, the opportunity for use of the material by the defense may be impaired, and the administration of justice may be impeded by the necessity for a continuance to allow the defense to make use of the material or by the need for reversal of a conviction.

838 A.2d 1140, 1156 n.13 (D.C. 2003) (internal quotations and citations omitted). In Sykes v. United States, the government failed to disclose until two days prior to defendant's murder trial the identities and grand jury testimony of two witnesses whose testimony would have impeached an informant's testimony that he had heard co-defendant admit to the crime, which formed the basis for an adoptive admission against Sykes. 897 A.2d 769 (D.C. 2006). The court reversed Mr. Sykes' convictions, emphasizing the importance of the timely disclosure of Brady information and finding a reasonable probability that the outcome of the case would have been different had the defense been able to present the live testimony of the witnesses, as opposed to grand jury transcripts. But see Stewart v. United States, 881 A.2d 1100 (D.C. 2005) (rejecting defendant's Brady challenge to the government's late disclosure of relevant police reports, holding that, while the government was obligated to disclose the reports, defendant had failed to establish the requisite reasonable probability that the proceeding would have been different with an earlier disclosure).

The defense generally can argue that the danger to the defendant's right to a fair trial outweighs any speculative danger of early disclosure, such as fabrication of testimony or influencing or intimidating witnesses. The ABA Standards call for early disclosure. Standards for Criminal Justice, 11-2.1(c), 11-2.2 (a) (2d. ed. 1980) (disclosure "as soon as practicable following the filing of charges"); 3-3.11(a) ("disclosure at the earliest feasible opportunity"). See D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 3.8. Special Responsibilities of a Prosecutor (2000). *See also Leka v. Portuondo, 257 F.3d 89 (2d Cir. 2001) (reversal based on failure to disclose Brady in timely fashion. Nine days before trial state disclosed name and address of off-duty police officer eyewitness who contradicted prosecution witnesses and theory. The Second Circuit outlined the problems with late disclosure: 1) that the limited and late disclosure "could have led to specific exculpatory information only if the defense undertook further investigation. When such a disclosure is first made on the eve of trial, or when trial is under way, the opportunity to use it may be impaired. The defense may be unable to divert resources from other initiatives and obligations that are or may seem more pressing." and 2) that "the defense may be unable to assimilate the information into its case. Moreover, new witnesses or developments tend to throw existing strategies and preparation into disarray." *Leka, 257 F.3d at 101.

There is some tension among cases involving disclosure of material mid-trial. Some of the cases hold that the issue is not preserved for appellate review unless the defendant moves for either a continuance to examine and investigate the disclosed material, or a mistrial because there is not time at this point in the proceedings for a proper investigation. Others hold that it is not necessary for the defense to make these motions to preserve the issue. While the courts have tried to distinguish these cases by the difficulty of recognizing the exculpatory value of the disclosure, the better practice would be for the defense to always move for a continuance or mistrial when midtrial disclosures are made.

- Curry v. United States, 658 A.2d 193, 197-99 (D.C. 1995) – government's ten-month delay in disclosing exculpatory statement of witness violated Brady. The error was not prejudicial, however, because the witness could not be located and there was no reasonable probability the result would have been different.

- Johnson v. United States, 544 A.2d 270 (D.C. 1988) – disclosure during trial of government witnesses' misidentification of the defendant as the perpetrator, and exculpatory grand jury testimony was timely for Brady purposes, because defense was able to use the evidence effectively to cross-examine the witnesses. See also Mercer v. United States, 724 A.2d 1176 (D.C. 1999).

- Frezzell v. United States, 380 A.2d 1382 (D.C. 1977) – prosecutor, in response to a general request for Brady material, disclosed mid-trial the statement of a witness who could not be located who gave a description of the perpetrator that was nothing like the defendant; timing of disclosure was sufficient; if defendant needed time after the disclosure to make effective use of statement, it was incumbent on him to request a continuance or a mistrial.

- But see James v. United States, 580 A.2d 636 (D.C. 1990) – mid-trial disclosure violates Brady when time of disclosure was insufficient for defense to use the disclosed material evidence. Prosecutor disclosed on fifth day of a six-day trial that Augustine, an unavailable witness, had told another witness to get rid of the murder weapon. Prior to this disclosure, Augustine's "spontaneous excited utterance" to an individual named Baptiste that the defendant shot at the victim had been admitted through Baptiste. Because Augustine's statement to Baptiste occurred after his statement regarding the gun, the spontaneity of the statement to Baptiste was questionable, and thus the admissibility of this purported excited utterance was in doubt. Although the defense had not moved for a mistrial > or continuance when the disclosure was made, it was not reasonable to expect the relevance of the disclosure to the hearsay issue in the statement to Baptiste to be immediately recognizable to the defense (unlike Frezzell, where the impact of the late-disclosed statement was immediately recognizable as exculpatory).

2014 Supplement

Williamson v. United States*, 993 A.2d 599 (D.C. 2010). No Brady violation for government to disclose four days before trial two witnesses who would have given conflicting testimony, one of whom would have testified that defendant's truck was at scene but could not identify defendant, and the other who would have testified that he did not see defendant's truck at scene, where testimony would not have had reasonable probability of producing different verdict in case.

G. Method of Disclosure

The defense can initiate a Brady demand by a standard request, preferably written or otherwise in the record, see Rosser, 381 A.2d 598 (D.C. 1997) for:

> any and all information within the possession of the government that could constitute evidence favorable to the accused, or that may lead to material exculpatory evidence, within the meaning of Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), particularly with respect to [insert type of evidence and/or investigative agency with specificity].

The government should then make disclosure by turning over the material to the defense attorney of record.

The government generally should familiarize itself with the evidence in order to make informed responses, and has a continuing duty to disclose Brady material. One Superior Court judge has formulated the following procedure for when an issue arises as to whether certain material is producible under Brady:

> (1) Upon defense request, the government either should produce the evidence or respond that it has no Brady information;
> (2) If the government has a "genuine doubt" whether information needs to be disclosed pre-trial, it should provide defense counsel with a general description of the undisclosed information and the reason for the withholding;
> (3) Defense counsel may then request that the court make an in camera inspection to determine whether the material must be disclosed under Brady and, if so, when it is to be disclosed.

United States v. Burnett, 102 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 985 (D.C. Super. Ct. May 14, 1974) (Goodrich, J.).[16]

H. Consequences of Nondisclosure

1. Nondisclosure discovered before trial

Upon learning, before trial, that the government may have failed to disclose Brady information, counsel should file a motion to compel disclosure and, if necessary, move to continue the trial so that the information may be obtained, investigated, and incorporated into the defense trial strategy. See Frezzell, 380 A.2d at 1385. The standard applied in deciding a pre-trial motion to compel disclosure of Brady information is different from the retrospective analysis reviewing courts use in deciding Brady claims on appeal. See Lewis II, 408 A.2d at 307. In a pre-trial setting:

> there can be no objective, ad hoc way to evaluate before trial whether [putative Brady material] . . . will be material to the outcome. No one has that gift of prophecy. To argue that the court can apply a material-to-outcome test before trial is to argue a contradiction. It also raises the serious possibility that a defendant may be forced, unfairly, to disclose his or her case before trial, in an effort to carry a virtually impossible burden.

Id. Accordingly, upon a pre-trial motion for discovery of specific Brady information, "a defendant is entitled to disclosure [if] 'a substantial basis for claiming materiality exists.'" Id. at 308.

In a pre-trial posture, counsel should take the position that the government's duty to disclose all favorable evidence must be complied with without regard to the government's "opinion" of its materiality. See United States v. Sudikoff, 36 F.Supp.2d 1196, 1198 (C.D. Cal. 1999); United States v. Carter, 313 F.Supp.2d 921 (E.D. Wis. 2004) ("[I]n the pre-trial context, the court should require disclosure of favorable evidence under Brady and Giglio without attempting to analyze its 'materiality' at trial."). As explained in by the district court in Sudikoff,

> This [materiality] standard is only appropriate, and thus applicable, in the context of appellate review. Whether disclosure would have influenced the outcome of a trial can only be determined after the trial is completed and the total effect of all the inculpatory evidence can be weighted against the presumed effect of the undisclosed Brady material. … This analysis obviously cannot be applied by a trial court facing a pre-trial discovery request.

36 F.Supp.2d at 1198-99; see also Carter, 313 F.Supp.2d at 923 ("[T]he materiality prong presumes that the trial has already occurred and requires the court to determine whether the result could have been different had the evidence been disclosed. But a court deciding whether materiality should be disclosed prior to trial does not have the luxury of reviewing the trial record."); Lewis, 408 A.2d at 307 (D.C. 1979); Odom v. United States, 930 A.3d 157, 159 (D.C. 2007); Boyd v. United States, 908 A.2d 39, 56-58 (D.C. 2006)

2. Nondisclosure discovered during trial

The same standard applies to mid-trial motions, although the court may have more information pertinent to the materiality determination. See James v. United States, 580 A.2d 636, 644 (D.C. 1990) (court must determine whether information disclosed mid-trial was material to the outcome of the trial or "obviously exculpatory"). The defense may seek: (1) to continue the trial in order to investigate the information, see Frezzell, 380 A.2d at 1385; (2) to recall witnesses for further cross-examination; (3) to strike witnesses' testimony, see Wigmore, Evidence 1390 (Chadbourn rev. 1974); or (4) a mistrial.[17]

Remedies for Brady violations are subject to the discretion of the Court. In Odom, the Court of Appeals held that the trial court has discretion to allow defendant to introduce otherwise inadmissible hearsay in order to remedy a perceived Brady violation that has impeded defendant from presenting declarant's exculpatory testimony at trial. 930 A.2d 157.

Counsel should always propose sanctions for Brady violations.

3. Nondisclosure discovered after trial and post-trial review of Brady issues

Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, clarified the standard of materiality applicable in determining whether a conviction should be reversed on post-trial review for failure to disclose Brady material.[18] It drew the following standard from Strickland, 466 U.S. 668, to govern all prosecutorial failures to disclose evidence favorable to the accused:

> The evidence is material only if there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different. A "reasonable probability" is a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome.

Bagley, 473 U.S. at 682. This standard of materiality is retrospective: "Brady . . . and now Bagley call for 'retrospective evaluations, i.e., decisions as to whether a defendant's due process rights had been violated by the government's withholding of particular evidence.'" Coleman v. United States, 515 A.2d 439, 448 (D.C. 1986) (quoting Lewis II, 408 A.2d at 306).

[17] James, 580 A.2d at 643-44, held that counsel's failure to recognize the relevance of Brady material disclosed mid-trial, and to move for a mistrial or for reconsideration of a prior evidentiary ruling, neither bars a Brady claim on appeal nor subjects the claim to plain error review.

[18] Previously, the standard of materiality depended on whether the defense had made "no request," a "general request" or a "specific request." Agurs, 427 U.S. at 106-07.

Although the inquiry is retrospective and must take into account all evidence presented at trial, the reviewing court still must consider the impact of a failure to disclose exculpatory information on defense preparation and strategy. Thus, the prosecutor's failure to comply with a specific Brady demand may substantially prejudice the defendant in preparing and presenting the defense:

> [T]he more specifically the defense requests certain evidence, thus putting the prosecutor on notice of its value, the more reasonable it is for the defense to assume from the nondisclosure that the evidence does not exist and to make pre-trial and trial decisions on the basis of this assumption. . . . [T]he reviewing court may consider directly any adverse effect that the prosecutor's failure to respond might have had on the preparation or presentation of the defense case . . . in light of the totality of circumstances and with an awareness of the difficulty of reconstructing in a post-trial proceeding the course that the defense and the trial would have taken had the defense not been misled by the prosecutor's incomplete response.

Bagley, 473 U.S. at 682-83.

On remand, the Ninth Circuit granted a new trial because the Brady violation – failing to disclose payments and inducements to key witnesses – undermined confidence in the outcome of the trial. See Bagley v. Lumpkin, 798 F.2d 1297 (9th Cir. 1986). But see Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263 (1999) (although certain inconsistent statements of government witness were not disclosed, defendant not entitled to new trial because confidence in verdict was not undermined); United States v. Bowie, 198 F.3d 905 (D.C. Cir. 1999) (failure to disclose that police officer witness was on "Lewis list" maintained by the Office of the United States Attorney – a computerized list of police officers under investigation – potentially might have opened up a line of cross-examination going to officer's credibility, but would not have been material in that there was no reasonable probability of acquittal had the information been disclosed to the defense). In Bagley v. Lumpkin, the court noted that "knowledge of the [payments] could have given Bagley an entirely different trial strategy that might have resulted in his acquittal." 798 F.2d at 1301. The defense might not have waived a jury trial, might have pursued the witnesses' bias on cross-examination, and might have otherwise undermined the witnesses' credibility. Id. at 1301-02. But see Brooks v. United States, 516 A.2d 913, 917 (D.C. 1986) (in self-defense case, failure to disclose evidence of prior violence by complainant's associate did not affect outcome of trial); Coleman, 515 A.2d at 448-49 (inconsistencies in witness's prior statements not sufficiently material to affect outcome of trial).[19] [19] Non-disclosure of a government witness's juvenile records did not violate due process where the jury learned of the potential bias when defense counsel elicited that the witness would be locked up if he did not testify, the witness testified that he was "locked up at Oak Hill" when he first spoke to police about the appellant, and counsel was aware during trial of the witness's custody and that charges against him were dropped during appellant's trial. Johnson v. United States, 537 A.2d 555 (D.C. 1988). For these reasons, and because "the witness was only one of seven eyewitnesses, in addition to the victim," the records were not "material": there was "no reasonable probability that disclosure…would have affected the outcome of appellant's trial." Id. at 559-60.

Unlike most trial error analyses, once error has been determined by applying Bagley, no harmless error analysis is required. If material evidence was suppressed, the conviction is overturned. The reason the Chapman harmless error analysis is unnecessary was explained by Justice Souter:

> Assuming arguendo that a harmless error inquiry were to apply, a Bagley error could not be treated as harmless, since "a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different," necessarily entails the conclusion that the suppression must have had "'substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict,'" Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619, 633 (1993), quoting Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, (1946).

Kyles, 514 U.S. at 435.

I. Preservation of Brady Material

In Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988), the Supreme Court held that in cases where the exculpatory value of the evidence is unknown, "unless a criminal defendant can show bad faith on the part of the police, failure to preserve potentially useful evidence does not constitute a denial of due process of law." Robinson v. United States, 825 A.2d 318, 325 (D.C. 2003) (citations omitted). "The Court refused to impose an 'undifferentiated and absolute duty to retain and to preserve all material that might be of conceivable evidentiary significance in a particular prosecution.' Instead, the Court required the defendant to make a showing of bad faith on the part of the police in order to 'limit[] the extent of the police's obligation to preserve evidence to reasonable bounds and confine[] it to that class of cases where the interests of justice most clearly require it, i.e., those cases in which the police themselves by their conduct indicated that the evidence could forma basis for exonerating the defendant.'" Id. (citing Youngblood, 488 U.S. at 58 (alterations in original)).

Youngblood overturned United States v. Bryant, 439 F.2d 642, 652 (D.C. 1971), which had held that there was a due process obligation for prosecutors and law enforcement to "promulgate and enforce" a rigorous and systematic procedure to preserve all discoverable evidence. Before Youngblood, unless the government could prove such a procedure was in place and enforced, it could not rely on a good faith claim when Brady material or other discoverable evidence was lost or otherwise disappeared.

Since Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988), the stricter rule of Bryant only applies to Jencks material. So long as the loss of evidence was due to mere negligence and was not intentional or to gain some tactical advantage at trial, there is no constitutional duty to preserve all evidence that could possibly exculpate an accused. Good faith is presumed; unless the defendant can prove bad faith, failure to preserve potentially useful evidence does not violate due process.[20] See also United States v. Day, 697 A.2d 31, 34-35 (D.C. 1997). However, in United [20] United States v. Bryant, 439 F.2d 642, 652 (D.C. 1971). Counsel should, however, recognize that the court's reasoning in Youngblood involved police procedures that at the time were not widely accepted and not consistently practiced. Thus, the court found no "bad faith" when those procedures were not followed. However, in situations in States v. McKie, 951 F.2d 399 (D.C. Cir. 1991) the police actually lost the crack cocaine that was the basis for the arrest of defendant and the prosecution relied on the lab report of what the lost evidence actually was. "Whatever the continuing vitality of Bryant in its original context regarding claims under the Jencks Act . . . it is clear the due process claims such as the one McKie raises here are governed by the standards enunciated in Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988)." Id. at 403. Counsel should keep in mind however that tangible objects may nonetheless be producible pursuant to Rule 16. Failure to preserve tangible objects pursuant to Rule 16 may entitle the defense to request sanctions against the government. See In re Q.D.G., 706 A.2d 36, 38 (1998).

III. OTHER DISCOVERY PROCEDURES[21]

A. Alibi Witnesses

If the defense will be alibi, Super. Ct. Crim. R. 12.1(a) requires the defense to disclose, upon written request from the government, the time, date and place of the alleged offense, the place the defendant claims to have been at the specified time and the names and addresses of alibi witnesses.[22] The defense must respond within ten days. Counsel should apprise potential alibi witnesses of the likelihood that detectives may attempt to interview them or that they may receive a witness conference letter from the United States Attorney's Office, and of what their rights are in such situations.

Within ten days of the defense response, but in no event less than ten days before trial, the government must provide the defense with the names and addresses of any witnesses on whom the government intends to rely to establish the defendant's presence at the scene of the alleged offense or to rebut the alibi witnesses' testimony. These provisions require disclosure of the names and addresses of complainants as well as other witnesses. Shambley v. United States, 391 A.2d 264, 266 (D.C. 1978). Rule 12.1 also establishes a continuing duty to disclose, authorizes striking the testimony of any witness (other than the defendant) whose identity was withheld improperly under the rule, and makes evidence of a declared, but subsequently withdrawn, intention to rely on an alibi defense inadmissible. See McKoy v. United States, 518 A.2d 1013 (D.C. 1986) (prosecutor may not cross-examine defendant about alibi witnesses not called at trial, about whom prosecutor learned through alibi notice).

The trial court has "considerable discretion" in deciding to admit or exclude evidence. Hall v. United States, 540 A.2d 442, 446 (D.C. 1988). It should consider: (1) the amount of prejudice which the police procedures are widely accepted and practiced according to general orders, it may be possible to distinguish Youngblood's "bad faith" requirement in a particular case.

[21] The court has no authority to compel disclosure of the nature of the defense. Bowman v. United States, 412 A.2d 10, 12 (D.C. 1980). Disclosure may alert the prosecution in advance to defense trial tactics or, if the client ultimately pleads guilty, suggest that the defendant had maintained a different version of events. In the rare event that a judge requests such disclosure, counsel should respectfully decline to disclose the nature of any defense except an insanity defense. See D.C. Code § 24.301(j); Super. Ct. Crim. R. 12.2.

[22] Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970), upheld the constitutionality of a similar statute. Wardius v. Oregon, 412 U.S. 470 (1973), held unconstitutional an alibi-notice statute that did not provide for reciprocal disclosure by the government of those witnesses upon whom it intended to rely to rebut the alibi.

that resulted from the failure to disclose; (2) the reason for the non-disclosure; (3) the extent to which the harm caused by non-disclosure was mitigated by subsequent events; (4) the weight of the properly admitted evidence supporting the defendant's guilt; and (5) other relevant factors arising out of the circumstances of the case. Id. at 446 n.6 (citation omitted). See also Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 415 n.19 (1988).

The use of preclusion as a sanction against a defendant who fails to comply with an alibi demand can implicate the Sixth Amendment. Id.; Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145 (1991). It is justified only in extreme circumstances. See id. at 152 (alternative sanctions are adequate and appropriate in most circumstances); Escalera v. Coombe, 852 F.2d 45, 48 (2d Cir. 1988) (remanding for determination, in light of Taylor, of whether counsel's failure to comply with alibi notice was "willful and motivated by a desire to obtain a tactical advantage").

(Richard) Smith v. United States, 325 A.2d 180 (D.C. 1974), found reversible error in the admission of testimony by a government witness in rebuttal to the defense of alibi when the government had failed to disclose that witness after defense compliance with the government's alibi demand. Beynum v. United States, 480 A.2d 698 (D.C. 1984), however, declined to reverse even though the government presented testimony by a previously undisclosed witness that rebutted the alibi revealed by defense counsel in compliance with Rule 12.1. The government's witness testified during the government's case-in-chief that he saw the defendant at 10:00 p.m. on the night of the offense. This contradicted subsequent testimony of the defendant's alibi witness, who said the defendant was with her at 9:20 p.m., when the offense occurred, and for the rest of the night. Because the government did not know that the defense would present an alibi for the entire night, and not simply for the time of the offense, the government was under no obligation to disclose the identity of its witness.

The timing requirements may be relaxed in extreme circumstances. In Hall v. United States, 540 A.2d 442 (D.C. 1988), the government revealed the names of some anti-alibi witnesses on the day of trial, and called them in rebuttal. Eleven days before trial, the prosecutor filed and served an alibi demand on the defense, along with a list of his own anti-alibi witnesses. When he called counsel two days later and learned that counsel had not received the information, he gave the defense the names and addresses over the telephone. The defense reciprocated. The names of the three witnesses the government presented on rebuttal were not on the list, however, because the prosecutor did not learn of the usefulness of the testimony of two of them until the evening before trial, nor of the existence of the third until the afternoon of trial. The court affirmed, noting that the rule contemplates this possibility, and imposes on both parties a continuing duty to disclose additional witnesses of whom they become aware. See Super. Ct. Crim. R. 12.1(c). By informing defense counsel of "the identities of his three rebuttal witnesses as soon as he learned of them himself," the prosecutor "took every possible precaution to avoid prejudice at trial." Hall, 540 at 446.

B. Government Witnesses

Rule 16 includes no provision for disclosing names and addresses of witnesses. See Rambert v. United States, 602 A.2d 1117, 1120 (D.C. 1992). Davis v. United States, 315 A.2d 157, 161 (D.C. 1974), held that absent a statutory or constitutional requirement, the government need not disclose a list of its witnesses except in capital offenses (of which there are none in Superior Court). However, United States v. Holmes, 343 A.2d 272, 277 (D.C. 1975), held that in an uncommon case, the government may be required to reveal its witnesses in the interests of fundamental fairness or administrative efficiency if the defense makes a clear showing of particular need, materiality and reasonableness, and the government has an opportunity to oppose the motion and seek a protective order. See Harling v. United States, 387 A.2d 1101, 1105 (D.C. 1978). Holmes, 343 A.2d at 277, used a test balancing the government's interest in protecting its witnesses and the integrity of their testimony, against the defendant's interest in preparing the defense and deciding whether to go to trial. See also United States v. Napue, 834 F.2d 1311, 1318 (7th Cir. 1987) (as part of its "inherent power, exercisable under appropriate circumstances, to assure the proper and orderly administration of criminal justice," court may require government to disclose list of witnesses).

The government has no duty to disclose names of potential witnesses who will not testify at trial, and whose testimony would neither contradict that of a key government witness nor be exculpatory as to the defendant. United States v. Harrison, 679 F.2d 942 (D.C. Cir. 1982); see also Catlett v. United States, 545 A.2d 1202 (D.C. 1988).

C. Government Informants

Disclosure of the names and addresses of informants is generally required only if necessary to a fair trial on the issue of guilt or innocence, and not for other purposes such as suppression motions. Compare United States v. Rugendorf, 376 U.S. 528 (1964), with McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300 (1967). The determination depends on "the particular circumstances of each case, taking into consideration the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony and other relevant factors." Rugendorf, 376 U.S. at 534-35 (citation omitted); see also Sturgess v. United States, 633 A.2d 56, 62 (D.C. 1993) (disclosure of informant's identity as eyewitness to cocaine sale was not compelled given strength of identification evidence presented by undercover officer who purchased cocaine from defendant in well lit room in presence of others, fact that defendant was arrested inside same premises two days later, testimony of defendant's wife that defendant had continuing connection to premises, and fact that trial court ordered eyewitness to submit sworn answers to defense counsel's questions); United States v. Lyons, 448 A.2d 872, 874 (D.C. 1982) (burden is on defendant to demonstrate that informant is a participant, eyewitness or someone who could give direct testimony at trial; interest in protecting the informant must be balanced, however, against right to prepare defense); United States v. Price, 783 F.2d 1132, 1139-41 (4th Cir. 1986) (new trial required where informant was more than a "mere tipster," having been necessary party to an attempted illegal sale, and defendant wished to present defense of duress or entrapment perpetrated by informant).

D. Observation Post

In drug cases, police officers frequently observe drug transactions, often with binoculars, from "secret" observation posts, which may be located in government buildings or large apartment buildings. The locations of observation posts are often material both to the preparation of the defense and for cross-examination on the officers' opportunity to observe. Although the locations of such posts would appear to be discoverable under Rule 16(a)(1)(C) ("buildings or places . . .within . . . control of the government") or at least through cross-examination of officers at the suppression hearing or trial, the courts have fashioned a privilege similar to that of the informant privilege. See Jenkins v. United States, 541 A.2d 1269, 1272 (D.C. 1988); Thompson v. United States, 472 A.2d 899, 900 (D.C. 1984). In determining "whether fairness requires that the government's privilege yield to the defense right of cross-examination," the court "must balance the public interest in legitimate criminal surveillance against the defendant's right to cross-examine the government witnesses and exercise its sound discretion in deciding whether to permit withholding of the information." Hicks v. United States, 431 A.2d 18, 21-22 (D.C. 1981). In reaching that conclusion at a suppression hearing, "the court should consider, among other pertinent concerns, whether the defense has established that the location of the surveillance post is a material and relevant issue; whether the evidence supports a finding of probable cause; and whether the evidence creates a substantial doubt about the credibility of the observer." Id. at 22-23.

At trial, the defendant's interests in disclosure are greater. Thompson, 472 A.2d at 900. If the government invokes the privilege, the defendant must establish "that he needs the evidence to conduct his defense and that there are no alternative means of getting at the same point." Id.; accord Anderson v. United States, 607 A.2d 490, 496 (D.C. 1992). The government can then offer specific evidence of the need to keep the location secret—that the post is still in use, or that the safety of cooperating civilians would be jeopardized. The defense then has the burden to show that, in spite of the proffered reasons for maintaining secrecy, the defendant's interest requires disclosure of the location. Anderson, 607 A.2d at 496.

In addition to showing that there is some vantage point in the area from which the officer's view would have been obstructed, the defense must show that "there is some reason to believe that the officer was making his observations from such a location." Id. at 497. The defense must be allowed a reasonable opportunity to make this showing, including asking whether the observation post was located in any obstructed vantage points of which counsel is aware. But if the court credits testimony that the officer's view was not impaired, "it will ordinarily be difficult if not impossible, absent other indicia of unreliability, for the accused to sustain his threshold burden." Id.

The privilege has also been applied to the nature and location of electronic surveillance equipment. See United States v. Van Horn, 789 F.2d 1492 (11th Cir. 1986).

IV. MISDEMEANOR PRE-TRIAL PRACTICE

Misdemeanors, non-jury and jury demandable,[23] are assigned at arraignment to a specific judge for all purposes, including pre-trial motions, trials, mental competence hearings, guilty pleas and sentencings. Counsel should contact the assistant United States Attorney to determine the expiration date of any plea offer.

[23] Although a misdemeanor for which the maximum period of incarceration is 180 days, there is no plain error when a judge fails to conclude, sua sponte, that defendant is entitled to a jury trial on the basis that the aggregate period of incarceration for two offenses exceeds 180 days. Foote v. United States, 670 A.2d 366, 369 (D.C. 1996); see also Turner v. Bayly, 673 A.2d 596, 602 (D.C. 1996) ("six months" and "180 days" are not equivalent for purposes of conferring right to jury trial for offenses carrying maximum penalty of 180 days and defendants are entitled to jury trial only where maximum penalty is six months or more).

The United States Attorney's Office Misdemeanor Trial Section assigns a team of up to four prosecutors to handle each misdemeanor judge's caseload. The most senior prosecutor serves as the team leader, and the prosecutors rotate between court and office duty, which includes providing discovery, working in the witness room, and papering new cases.

A. Diversion

Pre-trial diversion allows some alleged misdemeanants to resolve a pending case without a trial or guilty plea. Diversion is a program of the United States Attorney's office, and "'owes its existence and operation solely to prosecutorial discretion.'" Irby v. United States, 464 A.2d 136, 141 (D.C. 1983) (citation omitted). There is no entitlement to diversion. The decision to permit diversion rests with the prosecution. Likewise, the prosecution determines whether or not to terminate an individual from the program. See Baxter v. United States, 483 A.2d 1170 (D.C. 1984) (defendant who completed community service work after time limit for completion had expired could not obtain judicial review of termination of diversion); Wood v. United States, 622 A.2d 67 (D.C. 1993) (termination based on defendant's false statement did not violate Equal Protection Clause; termination of diversion is not a loss of liberty that rises to constitutional level requiring procedural due process).

The government's discretion is broad, but "'it is not unfettered. Selectivity in the enforcement of criminal laws is . . . subject to constitutional constraints.'" Federov v. United States, 600 A.2d 370, 376 (D.C. 1991) (en banc) (citation omitted). Federov held that a decision to deny admission into diversion constitutes a decision to prosecute, reviewable for conformity with equal protection principles. Because the defendants – charged with unlawful entry as a result of a political protest – had made out a prima facie case of selective prosecution based on assertion of First Amendment rights, the court remanded for a hearing on whether the government could give a "clear and reasonably specific" explanation for its decision to deny them diversion. Id. at 383.

Eligibility for diversion and for a particular diversion program depends on the defendant's prior record and the nature of the offense charged.

The diversion program may involve community service, psychiatric treatment, or alcohol treatment. Persons accepted into community service diversion must do forty or more hours of community service, supervised by the Community Services office of the Superior Court's Social Services Division. Restitution may also be required.

B. Motions

Timing: All motions except for bond review, continuance, and dismissal for lack of speedy trial, and in limine motions must be filed within twenty days after status hearing or, for non-jury cases, ten days of arraignment or entry of appearance of counsel, whichever is later. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 47-I(c). Pursuant to the Presiding Judge of the Criminal Division order dated May 28, 1996, on misdemeanor calendars presided over by judges . . . "motions governed by Rule 47-1(c) will be deemed timely filed, without prior approval by the Court, if filed thirty (30) days prior to the date initially set for trial." The time for filing motions may be extended by filing a motion requesting additional time during the initial period. Judges also may have their own filing schedules.

The assigned judge hears motions. Any request to extend the time for filing must be made in writing to the assigned judge and must contain the reasons for the request. Any motions filed late should be accompanied by a motion for leave to late file stating the reasons for the delay. Generally, non-evidentiary motions (e.g., speedy trial) may be heard before trial, while evidentiary motions (e.g., suppression) are heard on the day of trial.

Most judges require the defendant's appearance at any motion hearing absent a written waiver of the right to appear. In some circumstances, such as in court identification suppression motions, counsel may prefer tactically that the client not be present, and waiver must be permitted in such cases. See Singletary v. United States, 383 A.2d 1064, 1071 (D.C. 1978). In most cases, the judge will rule on the motion from the bench at the conclusion of the hearing.

If a judge has a personal bias or prejudice against a defendant, counsel should consider a motion asking the court to recuse itself. Such a decision should not be undertaken lightly because of the possible ramifications if the motion is denied. Super. Ct. Civ. R. 63-I requires a judge to recuse himself or herself when a party to a proceeding files the requisite affidavit and is able to establish that the judge has a personal bias or prejudice against the defendant. See Taylor v. United States, 451 A.2d 859, 860 n.1 (D.C. 1982) (oral motion for recusal without affidavit or testimony is not in compliance with rule and was properly denied); see also Gregory v. United States, 393 A.2d 132, 142 (D.C. 1978).

C. Discovery, Status Hearings and Trial

At arraignment in misdemeanor cases, the government typically provides discovery materials and a plea offer. Questions regarding a plea offer or outstanding discovery matters should be conveyed to the assistant assigned to the case.

Depending on the judge, the calendar call begins between 9:00 and 9:30 a.m. Counsel should advise the client to arrive at the courtroom early. Generally, after a preliminary call of the trial calendar, the judge will conduct status hearings, pleas and sentencings. In light of the court's policy of attempting to resolve misdemeanors expeditiously, last-minute requests for continuances are likely to be denied. See D.C. Superior Court Rule 111(c) (requiring motions for a continuance to be filed at least two days before trial). Similarly, last-minute attempts to strike a plea bargain with the government are likely to result in less generous offers than could have been obtained by earlier efforts. Counsel should consult with the prosecutor, as the United States Attorney's Office has on occasion enforced a policy against trial date pleas to anything other than a plea to the information.

V. FELONY PRE-TRIAL PRACTICE

After presentment, the next court date in a felony case is the preliminary hearing, at which the government must show that there is probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and that the defendant committed it.

In a few felony cases, a misdemeanor plea offer may be extended at or shortly after presentment. Typically, these cases involve relatively minor felonies where the defendant does not have an extensive record. Normally the plea offer must be accepted by the date of the preliminary hearing, and the plea is entered on the preliminary hearing date or on a date set at that time. If counsel needs more time for investigation before determining whether to recommend that the client enter a plea, it is generally possible to extend the deadline by contacting the assigned pre-indictment prosecutor.

If the case is indicted before the preliminary hearing, the preliminary hearing is not held and counsel and the defendant are merely informed that an indictment was returned. This is called the "rapid indictment process" or "RIP." Typically, the United States Attorney's Office presents the case to the grand jury after the preliminary hearing. After the hearing, the defense generally will not be contacted until an indictment is returned or the case is dismissed. An indictment may contain charges in addition to the ones upon which the defendant was arrested or presented.

Not infrequently, the prosecution will itself subpoena and present "defense" witnesses mentioned by the accused at the time of arrest, and may develop contradictions between these witnesses' testimony and the statement given by the accused. No matter whether it is the government or the defense who causes a potential defense witness to testify in the grand jury, defense counsel must analyze the testimony of that witness as carefully as if the witness were preparing to testify at trial. Any transcripts of grand jury testimony of favorable witnesses may be subject to pre-trial disclosure as Brady material.

Indictments may be returned within a few weeks or may take months. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 48(c) and D.C. Code § 23-102 require the grand jury to take action within nine months of presentment, if the defendant has been incarcerated or held on bail. If the indictment has not been returned within nine months, the defendant is to be released or the bail discharged. The court upon written application by the government, within the nine-month period, may extend the nine-month period, if good cause is shown. If the defendant is released on personal recognizance, Super. Ct. Crim. R. 48(b) is authority for dismissal of the complaint due to unnecessary delay in presenting the case to the grand jury.

Although most cases reach the grand jury through the normal process of arrest, presentment, and preliminary hearing, some are presented to the grand jury before any formal proceedings have been initiated against the defendant. Also, a case which has been dismissed at the preliminary hearing for want of probable cause may subsequently be presented to the grand jury. Indictments returned under this procedure are known as "grand jury originals." Usually, when an indictment is returned, the defendant is notified by mail of the date to appear in court for arraignment.[24]

[24] In rare cases in which there is a strong risk of flight, the government may request an arrest warrant for the defendant immediately upon return of the indictment. But see Super. Ct. Crim. R. 4-I.

Failure to appear will result in issuance of a bench warrant or a judicial summons for the defendant.

Where plea bargaining appears appropriate, it should be initiated before the return of an indictment. Once an indictment has been handed down and the defendant formally charged with a felony, it is far more difficult to obtain an agreement to reduce the charge to a misdemeanor or a minor felony charge. Although it is often difficult to assess the government's case properly so soon after counsel's appointment, and without full discovery, it is vital that counsel initiate investigation as soon after appointment as possible in order to determine whether a disposition is preferable to trial and, if so, what the plea bargain should be. An offer made by an individual Assistant United States Attorney is not necessarily the government's final offer, and it is sometimes appropriate to consult with the Chief of the Grand Jury Section before treating it as such. The pre-indictment offer is typically the best offer the government will make and so counsel may not want to engage in pre-indictment plea bargaining, to avoid the earlier expiration dates.

Indicted cases are assigned to a particular judge's calendar. At arraignment, the defendant will enter a plea of not guilty and the court will set dates for a status hearing and trial. Motions must be filed within twenty days after the status hearing, which is usually within a month after arraignment. The trial judge may, however, set up an alternative motions schedule. The purpose of the status hearing is to allow counsel for both parties to inform the court of the status of the case and the likelihood of disposition. Unless circumstances have changed or the defendant has violated the conditions of release, the judge must allow the conditions of pre-trial release previously set to remain. See Salley v. United States, 413 F.2d 364 (D.C. Cir. 1969). If a defendant has been detained, counsel should continue to make every effort to obtain release through written motions.

VI. PRE-TRIAL INEFFECTIVE ASSISTANCE OF COUNSEL CLAIMS

If the defendant claims before trial that counsel is rendering ineffective assistance, the trial court must, before trial, "conduct an inquiry sufficient to determine the truth and scope of the defendant's allegations." Monroe v. United States, 389 A.2d 811 (D.C. 1978); see also McFadden v. United States, 614 A.2d 11, 15 (D.C. 1992); Nelson v. United States, 601 A.2d 582, 591 (D.C. 1991); Gordon v. United States, 582 A.2d 944, 945-47 (D.C. 1990); Farrell v. United States, 391 A.2d 755, 760-61 (D.C. 1978).

> [W]hen a defendant requests new counsel, based on pre-trial ineffectiveness, several weeks before trial, and the trial court conducts no inquiry, this court will remand for findings on the issue. The court will also remand when the defendant has made a pre-trial request for new counsel immediately before trial but no inquiry has been made, and thus there is no basis on which to determine whether the claim may have merit. On the other hand, if "there is sufficient evidence on the record to sustain the ruling of the trial court in spite of the court's failure to make a proper inquiry before ruling," this court will affirm. We will reverse > outright, however, when there is obvious prejudice, or when the trial court's conclusions are unsupported by the pre-trial record.

McFadden, 614 A.2d at 17-18 (citations omitted).

On post-conviction review, if no pre-trial findings were made, the government must prove by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant was accorded representation at trial by an attorney who was prepared within the requisite range of competence. Matthews v. United States, 459 A.2d 1063 (D.C. 1983). Specifically, it must show that counsel: (1) conferred with the defendant as often as necessary and advised the client of his or her rights; (2) elicited from the defendant matters of defense and ascertained whether any potential defenses were available; and (3) conducted both factual and legal investigation sufficiently in advance to permit reflection and to determine whether matters of defense could be developed. Monroe, 389 A.2d at 821.

GUILTY PLEAS AND PLEA BARGAINING

In every criminal case, the accused must decide between proceeding to trial or entering a guilty plea to one or more charges. The decision is often difficult and requires consideration of a wide variety of factors. This chapter highlights those factors and reviews the current law and basic tactics behind negotiating, entering, and withdrawing guilty pleas.

Counsel must thoroughly investigate the case and obtain discovery before commencing negotiations, and must continue to prepare the case as the negotiation process – which may consume weeks or even months – wears on.

I. PLEA BARGAINING

A. The Decision to Plea Bargain

Effective representation through plea bargaining often requires as much preparation as a trial. Counsel must thoroughly investigate the case and obtain discovery before commencing negotiations, and must continue to prepare the case as the negotiation process – which may consume weeks or even months – wears on. Counsel must then evaluate a number of factors to assess the negotiated bargain and its ramifications.

First, counsel should review and analyze the government's case. Who are the government's witnesses and what is their likely testimony? What is the likelihood that they will appear in court, based on their record of appearances in the case, their attitude toward the case (the defendant, the police, the court system), and other information (e.g., health, plans to move) learned during investigation and discovery? What will be their impact as witnesses? Are they impeachable in any respect? What is the physical or scientific evidence? What are the legal strengths and weaknesses of the government's case with regard to pre-trial motions, evidentiary issues, and the motion for judgment of acquittal? What is likely to be the emotional impact of the case on the trier of fact (judge or jury) and on the judge at sentencing if the defendant is convicted after trial? What additional facts can be proffered at the sentencing hearing?

Second, who will present the government's case? How effective is the prosecutor with juries? Is he or she particularly skilled or inexperienced with respect to certain issues in this case or type of case? How well prepared is the prosecutor? How much emphasis does the government place on this case or defendant?

Third, what are the strengths and weaknesses of the defense case? The same factors relating to government witnesses must also be considered with respect to potential defense witnesses. Should the client testify given available impeachment, including prior convictions? Does the client want to testify? How effective will the client be on direct and cross-examination? Can the defense succeed without the client's testimony? What are the legal strengths and weaknesses of the defense?

Fourth, what are the stakes? What penalties could the client incur if convicted at trial? Do any of the charges merge? Are any mandatory or enhanced sentencing provisions applicable and, for the latter, are they likely to be invoked? [1] Is release pending sentencing more likely after a plea than following a trial? What other impact on the sentence might a trial or a plea have? Will client face punishment in other cases if convicted, for example, parole or probation revoked? Additionally, client should be informed of any potential collateral consequences of a plea (and trial), such as cases in other jurisdictions, family court matters and immigration consequences.[2]

Finally, who is the judge? Does the judge give sentencing concessions following a guilty plea?[3] What is the general range of the court's sentences after trial for the offense(s) for which the client could be, and realistically might be, convicted at trial? What, in comparison, is the general range in sentences by the same judge for pleas to the offense(s) to which the client could plead guilty? How is the evidence at trial likely to affect the court? What are the court's practices during trial and how might these affect the case?

B. The Plea Bargaining Process

Negotiations generally focus on five issues: (1) the offense or offenses to which a plea will be entered and what changes will be dismissed; (2) the factual basis to be proffered to the court by the government and agreed to by the defense; (3) the government's position on bond status between the plea and sentencing ("stepback"); (4) the government's position concerning enhanced sentencing provisions; and (5) the government's position at sentencing ("allocution"). However, although the government may agree not to oppose a particular sentence, such recommendation is not binding on the court. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 11(e)(1)(B).

[1] The client should be advised, to the extent possible, and with the caveat that the information may not be complete, as to his/her range in the Superior Court Voluntary Sentencing Guidelines.

[2] Denson v. United States, 918 A.2d 1193 (D.C. 2006) (requirement to avoid associating with minors is not a direct condition of supervised release – but rather a collateral condition of supervised release imposed by the United States Parole Commission – neither trial court nor defense counsel had a duty to inform defendant of the condition before he pled guilty).

[3] Language in the 1968 ABA standards allowing for sentencing concessions in return for lessening court congestion, has been deleted: "The fact that a defendant has entered a plea of guilty or nolo contendere should not, by itself alone, be considered by the court as a mitigating factor in imposing sentence." ABA Standards for Criminal Justice § 14-1.8 (2d ed. 1980). This revision could theoretically have profound implications, as it removes the explicit justification for a "break" in exchange for an "early" plea. The ABA Standards do, however, call for concessions under enumerated circumstances, such as when the defendant "is genuinely contrite," § 14-1.8(a)(i), or provides evidence to the government, § 14-1.8(a)(iv), and does not appear to disapprove consideration of early manifestations of remorse or willingness to take responsibility. Corbitt v. New Jersey, 439 U.S. 212, 223 (1978), approved a state statute that gave persons charged with first-degree homicide who plead guilty a chance to avoid the mandatory life sentence, and stated that it is "constitutionally permissible to take that fact into account … [I]t is not forbidden to extend a proper degree of leniency in return for guilty pleas."

Considerations that may need to be resolved: There are numerous questions which counsel may have to resolve prior to and during the negotiating process. These include: What are the penalties for the offenses? How will various sentences affect any probation or parole "backup time" the client may have? Would the conviction trigger mandatory or enhanced sentences in the present case or upon a subsequent conviction? Can the conviction be used for impeachment in subsequent proceedings? What civil liabilities does conviction entail? Will the plea have any immigration implications? Will charges in other pending cases be dismissed or reduced as part of the bargain? Will the client be required to testify against a co-defendant or in other cases?[4] Will the government improve its offer in return for the client's testimony or other assistance? Is the offer independent of, or contingent on ("wired to"), the decisions of a co-defendant?[5]

Proffer regarding the facts: What will the government proffer at the time of the plea regarding the facts of the case? For example, if a client who is charged with burglary and sexual abuse pleads guilty to burglary, will the government restrict its factual proffer to evidence regarding the burglary and not include evidence relating to the sex charge? The parties can agree beforehand to limit the factual proffer. Such an agreement is important if the facts of the case are particularly gruesome. If, during its proffer, the government fails to abide by the agreement, the defense may either proceed with the plea, if the facts revealed are not too harmful, or argue that the agreement was violated. The latter requires certification to another judge and an order that the government comply with the terms of the agreement. See infra Section II.A.

Detention: The government's position on detention ("stepback") pending sentence can be even more important than its position on sentencing, because if the client is in the community at the time of sentencing, there is a greater likelihood that counsel can develop the kind of community-based program that will persuade a judge to place the client on probation. On the other hand, the government's position on stepback is not binding on the court; counsel should ascertain the particular judge's practices with and without a government waiver.

Sentencing: As to sentencing, the government may agree to support (or not oppose) a particular sentence, to request no more than a certain number of years, or, in rare cases, to waive allocution entirely. The parties may even agree on the precise content of the government's allocution. However, please be reminded that the judge has the ultimate power.

Timing of Plea: Counsel should also consider when the plea is to be entered. Some clients wish to resolve the case as soon as possible. Others may see advantage in delaying the plea. For example, the client may have an opportunity to improve employment status or participate in some treatment or rehabilitative program before sentencing. However, many judges reduce [4] Because the privilege against self-incrimination no longer exists after sentencing on a plea of guilty, see McCarthy v. United States, 394 U.S. 459, 466 (1969), the government may require as a condition of the plea that the defendant testify at a trial of a co-defendant. The government's willingness to accept an agreement without requiring future testimony should be put on the record, as should all conditions of the bargain.

[5] The government is frequently reluctant to enter into an agreement with only one defendant for fear that the defendant who pled will testify for the co-defendant at trial. Sometimes the government is willing to accept an agreement by the defendant to make a statement under oath at the plea hearing, reciting the details of the co-defendant's role in the offense (an "insulating statement"), which the government can later use for impeachment if the defendant's version changes.

sentencing concessions as the trial date approaches. Again, counsel should find out the particular judge's policies regarding early pleas.

Alford Plea: In very limited situations, an "Alford" plea may be acceptable to the government if the client is unable or unwilling to acknowledge guilt.[6] If so, consideration should be given to the plea's impact on the eventual sentence.

Timing of Negotiations: Counsel must also decide when to begin negotiations. In misdemeanor cases, the government often extends a written plea offer at arraignment, typically in the form of a "plea packet" containing the offer and basic police reports. If no plea packet is available, an offer is usually available at the discovery conference. Discussions in felony cases should begin while the case is pending before the grand jury. Such discussions often provide useful preliminary discovery, and the government's interest in saving time and avoiding a trial often results in reaching favorable bargains before indictment.[7] Effective negotiation at such an early stage requires prompt investigation.

Although the U.S. Attorney's Office may extend a pre-indictment offer at presentment or prior to preliminary hearing in non-drug felony cases, it may not do so in cases that require further investigation to determine the potential charges. Pre-indictment offers are rarely extended in felony drug cases, which are on a very fast track in the grand jury section. If a client desires to enter an early guilty plea, counsel should negotiate with the Assistant United States Attorney conducting the grand jury investigation. In drug cases, counsel should contact a supervisor in the Same Day Presentment section of the Grand Jury Division.

Having a specific proposal in mind will facilitate pre-indictment discussions. Counsel should review the factual allegations and make an educated guess as to what charges may be levied and what issues affect the potential for an acceptable bargain. For example, in cases involving monetary loss, a plan involving restitution might satisfy the objectives of all interested parties. Regardless of the outcome, such discussions can occasionally result in fruitful discovery of the government's case. Counsel should not wait until the indictment is returned to seek discovery and investigate the case.

Although succeeding offers tend to be less favorable, pre-indictment offers may be renewed if additional information causes the government to reappraise the strength of its position. If counsel reasonably anticipates that the government's case will not weaken appreciably over time and trial is not in the client's best interests, counsel should think carefully before letting a plea offer expire. Obviously, counsel cannot indicate that an offer has been accepted unless the client clearly desires to plead guilty.

[6] See North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25 (1970), discussed infra Section II.A. Counsel should ensure that the client does not make admissions or take actions during the plea bargaining process that might evidence consciousness of guilt. Although statements made in connection with, or relevant to, a plea bargain generally may not be used if the plea bargain falls through, Super. Ct. Crim. R. 11(e)(4), some actions by the defendant may. See Gale v. United States, 391 A.2d 230, 235 (D.C. 1978) (holding testimony concerning defendant's efforts to make restitution did not fall within the protections of Rule 11, and was admissible at trial).

[7] Some judges also grant greater sentencing concessions for pre-indictment pleas. A pre-indictment plea to a misdemeanor will be certified to a judge in the misdemeanor branch.

Under certain circumstances a prosecutor may reindict the defendant on more serious charges if the defendant does not accept the plea offer. The court in Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 363-65 (1978), found nothing improper in the prosecutor's threat to indict the defendant on additional charges if the defendant did not accept the government's offer. The Court in United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368 (1982), held that there was neither actual nor presumptive vindictiveness in a decision to obtain a felony indictment after a defendant refused to plead guilty to non-jury triable misdemeanors and demanded a jury trial, even though the defendant had not been warned of such action during the bargaining process.

Similarly, Washington v. United States, 434 A.2d 394, 396 (D.C. 1980) (en banc), declined to interpret Bordenkircher as requiring the prosecutor to advise the defendant on the record that it will "up the ante" if the defendant fails to accept an offer, and upheld the defendant's conviction on additional charges lodged after initial negotiations were unsuccessful, concluding that the indictment resulted from a re-evaluation of the case, which only coincidentally occurred after negotiations broke down.[8]

The government is typically forthcoming about whether other charges are under investigation. The plea agreement should spell out in detail precisely which charges or incidents the government will dismiss or not pursue as part of the agreement.

Clark v. United States,* 51 A.3d 1266 (D.C. 2012). Trial court did not commit reversible error in sentencing defendant to ten years imprisonment for armed robbery and related offenses, even though prosecutor recommended 20 years in sentencing memorandum despite agreeing in plea agreement not to allocute for more than ten years and then argued at sentencing that ten years would be "very generous," where trial judge rebuked prosecutor for "error," defense counsel responded "okay" to judge's suggestion that sentencing go forward and did not request that sentencing proceed before different judge, and judge agreed with defense counsel that prosecutor should retract recommendation for 20 years and file new sentencing memorandum.

Johnson v. United States,* 30 A.3d 783 (D.C. 2011). Government did not breach plea agreement in which it promised to support defense request for sentence not exceeding mid-point of guideline range for second-degree murder (12 to 18 years) by describing offense as first-degree, premeditated murder, stating the government could have obtained longer sentence than it had agreed to recommend, and urging court to impose more than defense-requested 12 years where government repeatedly advocated for no more than 18 years and stated that such a sentence was appropriate given gravity of offense.

[8] The recommendation in Harvey v. United States, 395 A.2d 92, 98 (D.C. 1978), that "the better practice is to bring all the charges in the original indictment unless there are compelling reasons for bringing new or additional charges," is not mandatory. If, however, the circumstances support an inference of vindictive prosecution, the "better practice" may be legally required. See Wynn v. United States, 386 A.2d 695, 697-98 (D.C. 1978) (filing of additional misdemeanor charges after case dismissed for want of prosecution found invalid due to "manifestation of vindictiveness").

C. Attorney-Client Communications Regarding Plea Negotiations

> A lawyer may engage in plea discussions with the prosecutor, although ordinarily the client's consent to engage in such discussions should be obtained in advance…
>
> In conducting discussions with the prosecutor the lawyer should keep the accused advised of developments at all times and all proposals made by the prosecutor should be communicated promptly to the accused . . .
>
> Defense counsel should conclude a plea agreement only with the consent of the defendant, and should ensure that the decision whether to enter a plea of guilty or nolo contendere is ultimately made by the defendant.
> To aid the defendant in reaching a decision, defense counsel, after appropriate investigation, should advise the defendant of the alternatives available and of considerations deemed important by defense counsel or the defendant in reaching a decision.

ABA Standards for Criminal Justice §§ 4-6.1(b), 4-6.2(a), 14-3.2(a), (b) (2d ed. 1980). Lawyers frequently disagree when to begin plea discussions with clients. Some advise clients of the benefits of negotiations early in order to gain advantages from early negotiations and so that later offers to negotiate do not appear to the client as a betrayal by counsel. Others delay mentioning negotiations until they have the client's confidence. As in most matters, common sense and good judgment and the ability to see the client's perspective are indispensable. Ultimately, it is the client who must decide whether to enter a plea of guilty or proceed to trial. See D.C. Rules of Prof'l Conduct 1.2(a), 1.4 (2000). When client does accept a plea offer, counsel should spend considerable time going over the terms of the plea, its ramifications and should inform the client of what to expect during the Rule 11 inquiry.

Missouri v. Frye*, 132 S. Ct. 1399 (2012). Counsel has a duty to communicate plea offer and where plea offer has lapsed or been rejected due to counsel's deficient performance, defendant must show both that he would have accepted earlier plea offer if counsel had conveyed it and that plea would have been entered without cancellation by government or rejection by judge.

Lafler v. Cooper*, 132 S. Ct. 1376 (2012). Where incorrect advice of counsel leads to defendant's rejection of plea offer, even if defendant otherwise received fair trial, defendant may be able to show prejudice if he went to trial instead of taking plea that offered prospect of less-serious charges or lower sentence.

II. THE ENTRY OF A GUILTY PLEA

A. The Basic Principles

Superior Court Criminal Rule 11 governs the procedure for entering guilty pleas. With a few important exceptions, the Superior Court and federal rules are identical.[9] A guilty plea requires the defendant to admit guilt, unless it is entered pursuant to North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25 (1970). An Alford plea permits a defendant to plead guilty while still maintaining innocence:

> [W]hile most pleas of guilty consist of both a waiver of trial and an express admission of guilt, the latter element is not a constitutional requisite to the imposition of criminal penalty. An individual accused of crime may voluntarily, knowingly, and understandingly consent to the imposition of a prison sentence even if he is unwilling or unable to admit his participation in the acts constituting the crime.

Id. at 37.[10] It may be in a defendant's interest to plead guilty to a lesser charge to avoid the risk of conviction of more serious charges, even if the defendant is in fact innocent or, for whatever reason, cannot admit guilt. Id. An Alford plea is also appropriate when a client, because of intoxication, drug usage or other reasons, has no recollection of relevant events and is therefore unable to acknowledge guilt, and the government has built an overwhelming case.

The consent of the government is required when an Alford plea is entered to a lesser offense. If the defendant tenders an Alford plea to the indictment, only the court's acceptance is required.[11] Other than the fact that the defendant maintains a claim of innocence, an Alford plea is treated precisely the same as a plea in which the defendant admits guilt.

[9] One important difference is that the Supreme Court rule deletes those sections of the federal rule that permit the parties to agree on a specific sentence and allow the defendant to withdraw the plea if the court does not wish to be bound by it. See Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(1)(C), 11(e)(2), 11(e)(3). Sup. Ct. Rule 11(e)(1)(B) contemplates only a recommendation for sentencing as opposed to a specific agreement. See (Alphonso) Williams v. United States, 656 A.2d 288, 291-92 (D.C. 1995) (plea violated Rule 11(e) because the parties could not bind court's sentencing discretion; client and government agreed to waive consideration of a Youth Act sentence).

[10] Rule 11(b) authorizes entry of a plea of nolo contendere, which entails no adverse civil consequences, and requires the consent of the court "after due consideration of the views of the parties and the interest of the public in the effective administration of justice."

[11] The ABA Standards provide that the court should not reject an Alford plea except for specific reasons, stated on the record. ABA Standards for Criminal Justice § 14-1.6(c) (2d ed. 1980). Notwithstanding the ABA Standards, counsel may have difficulty convincing the court to accept an Alford plea to the entire indictment. Unless the government has agreed to dismiss charges or waive some right, it may be difficult to show the significant benefit to the defendant upon which the Supreme Court relied in accepting Alford's plea in the face of his assertion of innocence. See Alford, 400 U.S. at 37.

Rule 11(a)(2) permits "conditional pleas," allowing one to plead guilty while reserving in writing[12] the right to appeal the adverse determination of any specified pre-trial motions.[13] If the defendant prevails on appeal, the plea is withdrawn. Id. The consent of the court and the government is required for entry of a conditional plea. Id. If the defendant's guilty plea is not conditional, only jurisdictional defenses survive. Collins v. United States, 664 A.2d 1241, 1242 (D.C. 1995).

While a defendant has "no absolute right to have a guilty plea accepted[,]" Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257, 262 (1971), it is generally an abuse of discretion for the court to refuse to accept a tendered guilty plea for no good reason. Hockaday v. United States, 359 A.2d 146, 148 (D.C. 1976) (stating "if no proper cause exists to vitiate the plea, the trial court is obliged to accept it"). See also United States v. Maddox, 48 F.3d 555, 558-60 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (while trial court did not err in rejecting defendant's first guilty plea because defendant's reticence aroused suspicion that plea was involuntary, court did err in rejecting second plea based solely on first plea colloquy). This principle applies even if the defendant wishes to plead to one or more counts of an indictment in order to obtain a tactical advantage on the remaining counts at trial. Punch v. United States, 377 A.2d 1353, 1358-59 (D.C. 1977).

Rule 11(g) requires a verbatim record of the entry of a guilty plea, i.e., the Rule 11 inquiry and the defendant's answers. This record is particularly important if the defendant later attempts to withdraw the plea. Evidence of a plea of guilty or any statements made during plea proceedings or during discussions with a prosecutor may not be used in a later civil or criminal proceeding against the person making the plea, other than in a prosecution for perjury. Super. Ct. Crim. R. (11)(e)(4); Fed. R. Crim. P. 11(e)(6).[14] See (Darrell) Johnson v. United States, 420 A.2d 1214, 1215 (D.C. 1980) (statement made during subsequently withdrawn guilty plea may not be used over objection to impeach defendant at trial). These protections are waivable. United States v. Mezzanatto, 513 U.S. 196 (1995) (defendant's agreement that any statements made during plea negotiations could be used to impeach his testimony if a trial took place was enforceable).

The plea agreement must be made part of the record. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 11(e)(2). United States v. Roberts, 570 F.2d 999, 1010-12 (D.C. Cir. 1977), held that the government's position on allocution at sentencing was not adequately presented to the court at the time of Roberts' plea, and that it was incumbent on the government to make its intention to ask for a substantial sentence part of the record, for the benefit of the trial court and the defendant, and therefore permitted the defendant to withdraw his plea. Counsel also should make sure that the agreement is written on the waiver form to avoid confusion about the parties' agreement.

Plea Agreement:

- ✓ Make sure agreement is written on the waiver form to avoid any potential confusion
  - o To avoid later disputes and to make a clear record, the entire agreement, including all waivers, reservations and promises, should be written out on the standard waiver-of-trial-by-jury form or in a separate addendum and explicitly stated on the record
  - o The terms of the agreement must be spelled out in detail
- ✓ Thoroughly prepare the client for the plea proceeding
  - o Review the facts the client will admit as part of the factual basis for the plea, and the elements of the Rule 11 inquiry, so that the client is not surprised or confused by the court's questions

One prosecutor's promise binds all future prosecutors in the case. Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. at 262 (concluding new prosecutor bound by former prosecutor's negotiated plea). In determining whether the bargain has been satisfied, "[t]he court will construe any ambiguity against the government." White v. United States, 425 A.2d 616, 618 (D.C. 1980); accord Snipes v. United States, 507 A.2d 159, 162 (D.C. 1986). However, the Santobello rule applies only to promises actually made by the government, not to the defendant's expectations, even if reasonable. Judge v. United States, 379 A.2d 966, 967 (D.C. 1977). But see United States v. Bogusz, 43 F.3d 82, 94 (3d Cir. 1992) (court is not limited to express language of plea agreement, but must also consider what was reasonably understood by defendant); United States v. Hammerman, 528 F.2d 326, 330 (4th Cir. 1975) (prosecutor's prediction is likely to inculcate defendant's belief and reliance and is therefore an essential element of bargain).[15]

Any government promise that "can be said to be part of the inducement or consideration" for the defendant's guilty plea "must be fulfilled." Santobello, 404 U.S. at 262. That the government's breach was inadvertent does not lessen its impact. Id. Nor does it matter that the breach was of no effect. In Santobello, the government breached its promise not to make any sentence recommendation. Despite the sentencing judge's statement that the prosecutor's recommendation did not influence him, the Supreme Court vacated the judgment and remanded for resentencing or withdrawal of the guilty plea. Id. at 262-63. The test to be applied is objective – whether the agreement has been breached, irrespective of prosecutorial motivations or justifications for the breach. United States v. Brown, 500 F.2d 375, 378 (4th Cir. 1974) (vacating sentence because prosecutor only halfheartedly discharged obligation under plea agreement to make sentencing recommendation).

The trial court in United States v. Blackwell, 694 F.2d 1325 (D.C. Cir. 1982), accepted an agreement for a defense witness to plead guilty to possession of marijuana in return for dismissal of a pending gun possession charge. At Blackwell's trial, this witness was warned by the judge and implicitly warned by the prosecutor that she could still be prosecuted if she testified in Blackwell's behalf and admitted possession of the guns. Id. at 1329. The court, relying on Santobello, stated that both the judge and the prosecutor were bound by the plea agreement, even though sentencing had not yet occurred and the agreement was therefore not yet "final." Id. at 1337.

The government may not address an issue that it has agreed to "waive." In Snipes, the government had agreed to "waive stepback," i.e., to refrain from asking that the defendant be incarcerated pending sentencing, but brought to the trial court's attention that the defendant was an escapee. The trial court held the defendant without bond pending sentencing. 507 A.2d at 161 n.6. By providing information relevant to "stepback," the government had violated the agreement. Id. at 162 (but claim waived by failure to raise it before sentencing, despite several opportunities). The form of relief for breach of agreement is left to the trial court. The Supreme Court has recommended specific performance of the agreement or withdrawal of the guilty plea as appropriate remedies. Santobello, 404 U.S. at 263. The court in White, 425 A.2d at 619-20, [15] Perrow v. United States, 947 A.2d 54 (D.C. 2008) (Prosecutor did not breach a plea agreement to cap allocution at eight years even though he stated in a sentencing memo that the court was not bound to the cap because the statement was made in the context of explaining the court's prior inquiry regarding the agreement.).

ordered specific performance of an agreement not to oppose "a substantial suspended sentence" and "a residential drug program" at resentencing before a different judge, where the prosecutor made remarks that might reasonably have been read as disapproving a suspended sentence and after the parties noted a preference for this remedy. See also Green v. United States, 377 A.2d 1132, 1134-35 (D.C. 1977) (noting courts will specifically enforce agreements made by the government).

Due process does not preclude withdrawal of an offer after it has been accepted but before the agreement has been executed. A prosecutor in Mabry v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 504, 506 (1984), proposed that in exchange for a guilty plea to a charge of accessory after a felony murder, he would recommend a 21-year sentence to be served concurrently with the defendant's other sentences. When defense counsel called three days later to communicate the defendant's acceptance, the prosecutor withdrew the offer, proposing instead to recommend a consecutive 21-year sentence. Id. The defendant ultimately accepted the second offer, the agreement was executed, and the judge imposed a 21-year consecutive sentence. Id. The plea could not be challenged under the Due Process Clause because, unlike in Santobello, the defendant was fairly apprised of the consequences of the plea finally accepted, and the prosecution kept its promise with respect to the executed agreement. Id. at 510.

To avoid later disputes and to make a clear record, the entire agreement, including all waivers, reservations and promises, should be written out on the standard waiver-of-trial-by-jury form or in a separate addendum and explicitly stated on the record.[16] The terms of the agreement must be spelled out in detail.

Judicial Participation: The trial court cannot participate in plea discussions. In German v. United States, 525 A.2d 596, 601 (D.C. 1987), "the trial judge sua sponte commented negatively on the strength of the government's case, suggested that a misdemeanor plea would be an appropriate disposition and predicted that only a very light sentence, without incarceration, would result from a conviction." Such commentary was impermissible judicial participation in the negotiation process, violating Rule 11(e)(1). Id. However, the conviction was affirmed because the defendant failed to show prejudice (i.e., how he was penalized for exercising his right to a jury trial). Id. at 603; see also, Boyd v. United States, 703 A.2d 818 (D.C. 1997) (reversal required where judge described in vivid terms the consequences for not pleading guilty).

On the other hand, the trial court cannot accept an illegal bargain. (John) Jones v. United States, 386 A.2d 308 (D.C. 1978), expressed strong disapproval where the trial court accepted a guilty plea from three co-defendants with a stipulation that they would resist all subpoenas from their codefendant to testify on their behalf: "there is no question that the government's use of a plea bargain in order to induce or encourage a witness's silence cannot be tolerated. A court's acceptance of this sort of a plea knowing its purpose is, of course, similarly improper." Id. at 316 n.7. However, the plea bargain was affirmed for other reasons. Id. at 315-16.

[16] The standard waiver of trial by jury form is available in all courtrooms and should be completed prior to the entry of the guilty plea. However, a written waiver form is not required if the record clearly shows that the defendant wished to plea guilty. See Terrell v. United States, 721 A.2d 957 (D.C. 1998).

The court and the government must coordinate their individual roles in the plea bargain process. Green, 377 A.2d at 1134. Once a court has sanctioned an agreement by accepting the plea, it has the authority to insure that the terms are fulfilled. Judicial refusal to follow a recommendation or enforce a promise does not render a prosecutorial breach harmless. "In the interest of strictly enforcing the prosecutor's promises, the Supreme Court has chosen to rule out any possibility for harmless error based on a subjective inquiry into the sentencing judge's mental process." White, 425 A.2d at 618 n.2.

Lindsey v. United States*, 84 A.3d 50 (D.C. 2014). Co-defendants' sentences for simple assault vacated and cases remanded for resentencing by a different judge where original judge warned them, prior to trial, that they would assuredly go to jail if they rejected sentencing agreements offered by government and were convicted of assault.

Leander v. United States*, 65 A.3d 672 (D.C. 2013). Error, though harmless, for trial court to make statement about showing leniency in return for a guilty plea before defendant had chosen whether or not to exercise his right to trial where defendant did not plea guilty despite coercion he may have inferred from judge's remarks and no contention that judge imposed harsher sentence because defendant exercised right to go to trial.

Plummer v. United States*, 43 A.3d 260 (D.C. 2012). Defendant waived any disqualification on judge's part in expressly declaring after conferring privately with his attorney that he did not object to judge presiding over trial despite judge's conduct of Rule 11 inquiry in which defendant expressed readiness to plea guilty to deceptive labeling, but denied having tried to sell CDs and DVDs, thereby necessitating rejection of plea.

B. The Rule 11 Inquiry

Rule 11(c) specifies the matters that the court must explain to the defendant, and which the defendant must understand, at the time of the plea.[17] The defendant must comprehend the nature of the charge. The court is not required to give the formal definition of the crime, but may use language more comprehensible to the layperson. In appropriate circumstances, the court must explain the elements of the crime and relevant legal principles. See Austin v. United States, 356 A.2d 648 (D.C. 1976) (finding defendant understood nature of charges where defendant was fully informed about concept of aiding and abetting and made admissions of aiding and abetting).[18]

[17] Where the parties agree to a trial on stipulated facts (for example, to preserve certain legal issues for appeal), the defendant waives most of the same rights that would be forfeited by a plea of guilty. It is the trial court's duty to conduct a Rule 11 inquiry to insure that the defendant fully understands the waiver. United States v. Lawson, 682 F.2d 1012 (D.C. Cir. 1982); Legrand v. United States, 570 A.2d 786, 792-94 (D.C. 1990); Gaston v. United States, 535 A.2d 893, 895-96 (D.C. 1988); Jackson v. United States, 498 A.2d 185 (D.C. 1985).

[18] In Henderson v. Morgan, 426 U.S. 637, 647 (1976), a defendant with an "unusually low mental capacity" pled guilty to second-degree murder. Because neither the court nor counsel informed him that intent to cause death was an element of the offense "his plea was involuntary and the judgment of conviction was entered without due process of law." On the other hand, McClurkin v. United States, 472 A.2d 1348, 1356 (D.C. 1984) upheld a plea to second-degree murder in the absence of a formal recitation of the elements because the plea proceeding as a whole informed

The court must apprise the defendant of the maximum possible sentence and any mandatory minimum sentence. Super. Ct. Crim. R 11(c)(1); see also Gaston v. United States, 535 A.2d 893, 895 (D.C. 1988) (concluding trial court failed to address core concern of Rule 11 by failing to ascertain whether defendant knew of mandatory minimum penalties). Such advice should include any special provisions such as a mandatory consecutive sentence. Hicks v. United States, 362 A.2d 111, 113 (D.C. 1976); see also Eldridge v. United States, 618 A.2d 690, 692-97 (D.C. 1992) (Rule 11 inquiry inadequate where court did not discuss effect of revising package outlined at beginning of hearing that included plea to an additional offense).

An intelligent plea requires knowledge of its direct consequences. Brady v. United States, 397 U.S. 742 (1970). Consequences are direct when they have a definite and immediate effect on the range of punishment. Goodall v. United States, 584 A.2d 560, 563 (D.C. 1990). "Knowing the range of punishment is not limited to knowing just the maximum sentence possible." Id. In Goodall, the government promised not to oppose consideration of Youth Act sentencing, for which the plea to second-degree murder made the defendant ineligible. Id. at 561-62. The trial judge erred by neglecting to inform the defendant that he was ineligible for the benefits of the government's promises. Id. at 564.

> The defect in Goodall's plea proceeding was not that he was given a longer sentence than he believed possible, but that he was precluded, unknowingly at the time, from any possibility of alternative sentencing. Although Goodall knew he could be sentenced to life imprisonment, even a remote possibility of alternative sentencing never existed. That a sentence imposed remains less than the maximum possible does not cure a trial court's error of accepting a plea when that plea is based upon manifestly incorrect information.

Id. at 563-64; see also Eldridge, 618 A.2d at 697 (appellant suffered prejudice when court imposed consecutive 5-15 year term on added count); Holland v. United States, 584 A.2d 13 (1990) (court must warn defendant if restitution may be required). But see Ramos v. United States, 840 A.2d 1292 (D.C. 2004) (neither the trial judge nor defense counsel is required to explain collateral consequences of a guilty plea to the defendant).

The court must explain the defendant's constitutional trial rights: the right to retained or appointed counsel at every stage; the right to trial by jury; the right to confront and cross-examine the government's witnesses, with the assistance of counsel; and the right against self-incrimination. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 11(c). Finally, the court must inform the defendant that pleading guilty waives all such rights. Id.

The court must also give the following warning: "If you are not a citizen of the United States, you are advised that conviction of the offense for which you have been charged may have the consequences of deportation, exclusion from admission to the United States, or denial of naturalization pursuant to the laws of the United States." D.C. Code § 16-713(a) (emphasis added). After the advice, the court must allow the defendant sufficient time to decide whether to the defendant of the charge, and the defendant admitted conduct constituting the elements of second-degree murder. The "critical inquiry is whether the defendant has been apprised adequately of the substance of an offense, rather than its formal legal components." Id.

take the plea. Failure to give that advice is grounds for withdrawing the plea. § 16-713(b). It is imperative that counsel object to the court asking whether the client is a citizen of the United States, since the client has a Fifth Amendment privilege not to answer. Some judges misconstrue the statute to mean that the person pleading guilty must state whether she or he is a U.S. citizen. All the statute requires is that the court advise individuals that if they are not citizens, there could be detrimental immigration consequences.

The court may inquire about the offense, and the defendant's answers may be used in a later prosecution for perjury. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 11(c)(5). The court may ask the government to proffer the facts of the offense and then ask the defendant whether the proffer is true. Some require the defendant to state the details of the offense; some take the defendant's answers under oath. Whatever the procedure, Rule 11(f) requires that the court be satisfied that there is a factual basis for the plea.

Additionally, the plea "must be voluntary and knowing and if it was induced by promises, the essence of those promises must in some way be made known." Santobello, 404 U.S. at 261-62. The court must question the defendant personally in order to determine "that the plea is voluntary and not the result of force or threats or of promises apart from the plea agreement." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 11(d).[19] Even if the defendant states that the plea is voluntary, the court may look behind this statement in determining whether the defendant was coerced.[20] Occasionally, the source of undue coercion may be the trial court itself. See Byrd v. United States, 377 A.2d 400, 405 (D.C. 1977).

With the defendant's consent, a hearing commissioner may take a plea of guilty or nolo contendere and recommend sentence in any criminal matter in which the maximum sentence is 90 days and/or $300 or less. D.C. Code § 11-1732(j); Super. Ct. Crim. R. 117(d), (h). A judge may review the commissioner's order or judgment, sua sponte, and must review it on motion by either party. D.C. Code § 11-1732(k).

It is essential that counsel thoroughly prepare the client for the plea proceeding, reviewing with the client the facts the client will admit as part of the factual basis for the plea, and the elements of the Rule 11 inquiry so that the client is not surprised or confused by the court's questions. Of course, by carefully preparing the client for the plea, counsel may learn that the client in fact would prefer to go to trial, or cannot admit the offense designated in the agreement. Counsel should consider preparing a counter factual proffer and present it to the government. Sometimes a plea may hinge on the client disagreeing with a particular fact in the agreement. A Counter [20] Compare (John) Williams v. United States, 408 A.2d 996, 998-99 (D.C. 1979) (lack of any Rule 11(d) inquiry required further hearing on post-conviction allegation that counsel promised defendant he would receive probation), with (James) Williams v. United States, 412 A.2d 17, 20-21 (D.C. 1980) (inquiry under Rule 11(d) was fully made, and record conclusively showed that relief should be denied without a hearing).

Factual proffer may help resolve this problem. This preparation should avoid any "breakdown" of the plea.[21]

Although Rule 11 prescribes detailed procedures for entering a plea, Rule 11(h) makes clear that variance from these procedures which does not affect substantial rights is harmless error, and will be disregarded.

2014 Supplement

Bautista v. United States*, 10 A.3d 154 (D.C. 2010). Court erred when accepting defendant's guilty plea to criminal contempt without advising him of the immigration consequences.

III. COMPETENCE TO ENTER PLEA OF GUILTY

The conviction of an incompetent person violates due process. United States v. Masthers, 539 F.2d 721, 725 (D.C. Cir. 1976); even a post-sentence motion to withdraw a guilty plea must be granted if the defendant was incompetent or lacked capacity to enter an intelligent plea. Pierce v. United States, 705 A.2d 1086 (D.C. 1997).[22] Courts have traditionally required a greater showing of competence to plead guilty than to stand trial. See Westbrook v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 150 (1966) (per curiam) (by analogy – finding of competence to stand trial does not suffice as finding of competence to waive right to assistance of counsel). However, Godinez v. Moran, 509 U.S. 389 (1993), held that the competence standard is the same in either context: the defendant must have sufficient present ability to consult with counsel with a reasonable degree of rational understanding of the proceedings. The Court noted, however, that a finding of competence to plead guilty does not end the inquiry; a "second tier" of inquiry is required: whether waiver of the right to trial is intelligent and voluntary. Id. at 2687.

The standard Rule 11 colloquy is an inadequate measure of the validity of a plea proffered by a defendant of questionable mental competence. If the issue of competence is raised, the court must conduct a thorough hearing on the defendant's mental state and understanding of actions at the time of the plea. Willis v. United States, 468 A.2d 1320, 1323 (D.C. 1983).

The court must determine that the defendant understands the nature of the charges to which the plea is offered. Rule 11(c)(1). Monroe v. United States, 463 F.2d 1032, 1035 (5th Cir. 1972), in which the defendant had been diagnosed as borderline mentally deficient, specifically disapproved of the standard questions put to the defendant as to whether he understood the nature of the charges against him; a more probing inquiry was necessary. See also McCarthy, 394 U.S. 459 (personally addressing defendant on understanding of essential elements of charge is necessary prerequisite to finding that he understands meaning of charge).

[21] If the client wishes to plead but cannot admit to a factual proffer, counsel can explain the dilemma to the prosecutor and perhaps negotiate an Alford plea, discussed supra Section II.A.

[22] Wallace v. United States, 936 A.2d 757 (D.C. 2007) (trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion to withdraw guilty plea on grounds of defendant's alleged mental incompetence to enter a plea where court weighed differing testimony of numerous experts about competency in making its determination).

The court must also determine that the plea is made voluntarily. Rule 11(d). The court's inquiry into voluntariness requires consideration of "the totality of circumstances," including "the complexity of the charges, the personal characteristics of the defendant, the defendant's familiarity with the criminal justice system, and the factual basis proffered to support the court's acceptance of the plea." (Linda) Johnson v. United States, 631 A.2d 871, 875 (D.C. 1993) (quoting McClurkin, 472 A.2d at 1356). The plea may be involuntary if the defendant has such an incomplete understanding of the charge that the plea cannot stand as an intelligent admission of guilt. See Henderson v. Morgan, 426 U.S. 637 (1976) (defendant with I.Q. substantially below average found competent to stand trial); see also Coleman v. Burnett, 477 F.2d 1187, 1194 (D.C. Cir. 1973) (plea is not voluntary unless accused is aware of its consequences).

IV. WITHDRAWAL OF THE GUILTY PLEA

A. Timing of the Motion

> A motion to withdraw a plea of guilty or of nolo contendere may be made only before sentence is imposed or imposition of sentence is suspended; but to correct manifest injustice the Court after sentence may set aside the judgment of conviction and permit the defendant to withdraw his plea.

Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(e).[23]

1. Pre-sentence

Factors to be considered for Motions to withdraw guilty Pleas: Motions to withdraw a guilty plea filed prior to sentencing should be granted "if for any reason the granting of the privilege seems fair and just." Kercheval v. United States, 274 U.S. 220, 224 (1927); Bennett v. United States, 726 A.2d 156 (D.C. 1999). Although the Kercheval standard is flexible, several factors can be identified that bear on the court's exercise of its discretion: (1) whether the defendant has asserted legal innocence; (2) length of the delay between entry of plea and desire to withdraw it; and (3) whether the defendant had the benefit of competent counsel. Gooding, 529 A.2d at 305-07. All of these factors must be considered "cumulatively in the context of the individual case." Binion, 658 A.2d at 191 (quoting Gooding, 529 A.2d at 306).

While the court will weigh several factors in consideration of the motion, "'such a factor [i.e. the prisoner's assertion of innocence] not only is important, but may be conclusive.'" Daramy v. United States, 750 A.2d 552, 555 (D.C. 2000) (quoting Bettis v. United States, 325 A.2d 190, 195 (D.C. 1974)). The courts will also consider the effect of the timing of the motion on the government's ability to retry the case; a brief delay is much less likely to prejudice the government. United States v. Roberts, 570 F.2d 999, 1011-12 (D.C. Cir. 1977) vacated the denial of a request to withdraw a plea where the request was made within days after the plea was entered. But see Bennett, 726 A.2d 156 (three weeks too long of a delay to withdraw plea). The prompt filing of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea may also support an assertion that the plea was entered in "haste and confusion." Binion, 658 A.2d at 191.

[23] Prior to an appeal attacking the voluntariness of a guilty plea, the defendant must move to withdraw the plea pursuant to Rule 32(e) or vacate the sentence pursuant to D.C. Code § 23-110. Lorimer v. United States, 425 A.2d 1306, 1308 (D.C. 1981).

2. Post-sentence

A motion to withdraw a plea that is filed after sentencing is viewed with disfavor, as an attempt to avoid the sentence imposed, and may be granted only to "correct manifest injustice."[24] See Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(e); D.C. Code § 23-110; Watkins v. United States, 724 A.2d 1200 (D.C. 1999); Luckey v. United States, 562 A.2d 130, 132 (D.C. 1989) (Rule 32(e) "manifest injustice" standard also governs consideration of motion under § 23-110).[25]

The "manifest injustice" standard is justified by the systemic concern for finality of judgments. See, e.g., McClurkin, 472 A.2d at 1362 n.19; High v. United States, 288 F.2d 427 (D.C. Cir. 1961). The decision whether to allow withdrawal "is committed to the sound discretion of the trial judge whose decision will be disturbed on appeal only upon a showing of abuse of discretion." McClurkin, 472 A.2d at 1352; see also Patterson v. United States, 479 A.2d 335 (D.C. 1984); Willis v. United States, 468 A.2d 1320 (D.C. 1983); cf. Hilliard v. United States, 879 A.2d 669 (D.C. 2005) (reversible error to deny defendant a hearing on 23-110 claim fourteen years after his guilty plea where allegations, and affidavits in support thereof, were not refuted by the existing record, and the tape of the original plea colloquy had been destroyed).

Post-sentence withdrawals are permitted only in extreme circumstances, such as upon a showing that the defendant was incompetent at the time of the plea, United States v. Masthers, 539 F.2d 721, 726 (D.C. Cir. 1976), or proof that the plea was induced by coercion or perjured information, Byrd, 377 A.2d 400 (D.C. 1977), or through ineffective assistance of counsel, McClurkin, 472 A.2d 1348. See also Daramy, 750 A.2d 552 (court's failure to properly advise client of immigration consequence under D.C. Code § 16-713 resulted in manifest injustice, even absent claim of innocence); Goodall, 584 A.2d 560 ("manifest injustice" occurred where court did not inquire whether defendant wished to withdraw plea after it became clear that government's promise not to oppose alternative sentencing was worthless because defendant was ineligible); (John) Williams, 408 A.2d 996 (D.C. 1979) (trial court failed to make Rule 11(d) voluntariness inquiry; remanded for hearing on allegation that counsel promised probation would be imposed); Shepard v. United States, 363 A.2d 291 (D.C. 1976) (no manifest injustice based on unpersuasive assertion that government witness has recanted).

The Court of Appeals has suggested in dicta that a post-sentence motion to withdraw a guilty plea should, at a minimum, be predicated upon a claim of innocence. See Bettis v. United States, 325 A.2d 190, 195 (D.C. 1974). Of course such a claim of innocence should have support:

[24] Motions filed after provisional sentencing under 18 U.S.C. § 4205(c) or after a Youth Act sentence has been ordered are considered pre-sentence motions, though they may be considered post-sentence motions for other purposes.

[25] The "manifest injustice" standard is more stringent than the "harmless error" rule applicable to Rule 11 violations challenged in pre-sentence motions to withdraw a guilty plea. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 11(h); (Alphonso) Williams, 656 A.2d at 293-94.

> Normally, in ruling on a motion for withdrawal, a compelling consideration for the trial court is whether the grounds set forth in the motion are tantamount to a claim of innocence. A bald assertion of innocence, however, without any grounds in support thereof, will not give a defendant the absolute right to withdraw his guilty plea.

Patterson, 479 A.2d at 340 (citations omitted).

B. Grounds for the Motion

A motion to withdraw a guilty plea under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(e) will be granted if (1) there was a fatal defect in the Rule 11 inquiry;[26] or (2) justice demands withdrawal under the circumstances of the particular case. Gooding, 529 A.2d at 305-06; see also In re J.E.H., 689 A.2d 528, 530 (D.C. 1996) (applying only Rule 11 analysis where juvenile stressed the involuntary nature of his plea and failed to assert innocence). Although Rule 11 violations are serious because of the due process concerns inherent in the waiver of constitutional rights, Gooding, 529 A.2d at 305 (citing Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458, 464 (1938)), they justify withdrawal only if they affect substantial rights and are not purely technical. Id. at 305 (citing McCarthy, 394 U.S. at 471-72[27]). Gooding stated in dicta that when a withdrawal motion alleges a fatal defect in the Rule 11 inquiry, the motion is considered without regard to whether it was filed before or after sentence. 529 A.2d at 306.[28]

Another possible ground for withdrawal of a plea agreement is the prosecutor's failure to comply with its terms. See Gaston, 535 A.2d at 898 n.9 (failure to honor agreement not to oppose evidence that defendant qualified for addict exception); United States v. Bullock, 725 F.2d 118 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (prosecutor agreed not to allocute for more than 10 to 30 years but allocuted for "at least" 10 to 30 years). However, this ground alone will probably seldom provide a basis for withdrawal because in most cases the defendant can move for specific performance of the promises made. See United States v. Fitzhugh, 801 F.2d 1432 (D.C. Cir. 1986).

To prevail on a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel, the defendant "must show that the plea 'was motivated by advice received from counsel which fell short of the range of competence demanded of attorneys in criminal cases.'" McClurkin, 472 A.2d at 1360 (quoting Gibson v.

[26] When voluntariness is challenged, the court must examine the "entire plea record" and "the totality of the circumstances surrounding the plea." McClurkin, 472 A.2d at 1356; see also United States v. Goldberg, 862 F.2d 101, 103 (6th Cir. 1988).

[27] McCarthy found manifest injustice where the trial court failed to ascertain the factual basis for the plea, and never personally questioned the defendant on whether he was pleading guilty voluntarily and understood the nature of the offenses charged. 394 U.S. at 471-72.

[28] Wallace v. United States, 936 A.2d 757 (D.C. 2007) (trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion to withdraw guilty plea where court engaged in "careful, probing, patient, and extensive colloquy" with defendant during which he provided logical responses to court's questions, more than once objected to court's characterization of his statements, and provided detailed answers about matters not related to crime, and where testimony given by mental health experts indicated that defendant was capable of malingering and fabrication of his symptoms).

United States, 388 A.2d 1214, 1215 n.4 (D.C. 1978)); see also Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52 (1985) (defendant must show deficient performance and prejudice); Ortiz v. United States, 942 A.2d 1127 (D.C. 2008) (no abuse of discretion to allow defendant to withdraw his guilty plea where counsel made no effort to save or revive the guilty plea or to refute court's understanding that defendant wanted to go to trial); Valdez v. United States, 906 A.2d 284 (D.C. 2006) (case remanded to afford defendant opportunity to set forth fact, by sworn affidavit, that he had not been advised of the immigration consequences of pleading guilty, at the time of his plea, and that if the affidavit is sufficient, the burden would shift to the government to put forth a record even if it must be reconstructed because transcripts of the plea proceeding have been destroyed); Gaston 535 A.2d at 898 (plea was not knowing, voluntary or intelligent where defense counsel incorrectly told client she was eligible for the addict exception; manifest injustice occurred when trial court failed to advise defendant of mandatory minimum sentence); United States v. Streater, 70 F.3d 1314, 1318-23 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (where defense counsel's incorrect legal advice rose to level of ineffective assistance of counsel and induced defendant's plea of guilty, the plea was involuntary and unintelligent). But see Mason v. United States, 956 A.2d 63 (D.C. 2008) (defendant estopped from claiming error in his request to withdraw his guilty plea because of his sworn misrepresentation during the plea colloquy that he was a United States citizen, even though the resulting conviction had adverse immigration consequences).

GRAND JURY ISSUES

I. THE ROLE OF THE GRAND JURY

The Fifth Amendment guarantees that no person shall be prosecuted for "a capital or otherwise infamous crime" unless indicted by a grand jury. Court rules and the D.C. Code require that a grand jury consider the evidence for any offense carrying a possible penalty in excess of one year. D.C. Code § 23-301; Super. Ct. Crim. R. 7(a). Thus, all felony cases must be presented to a grand jury unless the defendant waives the right to indictment.[1]

It is the maximum potential punishment and the character of the crime, not the punishment actually imposed, that determines whether the crime is "infamous." Ex parte Wilson, 114 U.S. 417, 426 (1885). Indictment is required where punishment for the offense itself exceeds one year, exclusive of enhanced penalties for recidivists under D.C. Code § 22-104, see Smith v. United States, 304 A.2d 28, 33 (D.C. 1973), or where the total punishment, including recidivist penalties, exceeds three years, D.C. Code § 23-111(a)(2).

The duty of the grand jury is to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that a defendant or "target" has committed a crime and should be brought to trial.[2] The grand jury may serve up to an eighteen-month term, which the Chief Judge may extend for up to six additional months if it serves the public interest. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 6(g). In practice, a grand jury sits for several months, during which it hears evidence in as many as three or four hundred cases. In felony-one and accelerated-felony cases, the same assistant will usually paper the case, present the case to the grand jury, and try the case.

The grand jury may consist of sixteen to twenty-three members. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 6(a). Twelve or more jurors must concur in order to return an indictment. Rule 6(f). The Chief Judge may replace grand jurors during their term for good cause. Rule 6(g). An indictment may be returned by less than twelve of the original grand jurors so long as the replacement jurors voting for the indictment are sufficiently informed of the evidence presented before their service began. United States v. Lang, 644 F.2d 1232, 1239 (7th Cir. 1981). The grand jury must vote on the specific charging language of the indictment. Gaither v. United States, 413 F.2d 1061, 1071 (D.C. Cir. 1969).

[1] Smith v. United States, 304 A.2d 28, 31 (D.C. 1973) (defendant may waive right to indictment if done in open court and after being advised by court of the nature of charges and rights being waived); Super. Ct. Crim. R. 7(b).

[2] "For centuries the grand jury's responsibilities have included 'both the determination whether there is probable cause to believe a crime has been committed and the protection of citizens against unfounded criminal prosecutions." Miles v. United States, 483 A.2d 649, 653 (D.C. 1984) (quoting United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 343 (1974). In practice, the grand jury rarely returns a "no true bill" and "ignores" a case. Thus, counsel's most effective grand jury work will often be in use of materials created by the grand jury investigation.

2014 Supplement

Wilson v. United States*, 995 A.2d 174 (D.C. 2010). Not abuse of discretion to disqualify retained counsel that had represented at grand jury proceeding defendant's friend who had given him gun where counsel claimed not to remember anything about substance of that representation, thus making it impossible for court to assess whether conflict might arise at trial, and may have been forced to choose at trial whether to use or not to use any remembered information to the advantage or disadvantage of defendant.

A. The Independence of the Grand Jury

The grand jury must be both independent and informed: independent of the prosecutor and the court, and informed of the evidence. "[T]he grand jury is a constitutional fixture in its own right, belonging to neither the executive nor the judicial branch." United States v. Udziela, 671 F.2d 995, 999 (7th Cir. 1982). Its independence is essential if it is to protect innocent persons against hasty or misguided prosecutions.

> The constitutional requirement of an indictment . . . as a predicate to a prosecution for capital or infamous crimes has for its primary purpose the protection of the individual from jeopardy except on a finding of probable cause by a group of his fellow citizens, and is designed to afford a safeguard against oppressive actions of the prosecutor or a court. . . . The constitutional provision is, as has been said, for the benefit of the accused.

United States v. Cox, 342 F.2d 167, 170 (5th Cir. 1965) (footnote omitted).

The expansion of police and prosecutorial activity in conducting investigations, combined with the secrecy of the proceedings, however, has compromised the grand jury's historical independence; "the grand jury in modern times has lost much of its independent force." 8 Moore's Federal Practice 6.02[1] at 6-32 (2d ed. 1986).

> Today the grand jury's independence in the criminal justice system has declined with the increasing complexity of the crime and the growth of the role of prosecutors, professional police and investigative forces. . . . It is now the United States Attorney who gathers the evidence for later presentation to the grand jury. He calls and examines witnesses, presents documents, explains the law, sums up the evidence, and requests an indictment. The courts have recognized this leadership role.

United States v. Kleen Laundry & Cleaners, Inc., 381 F. Supp. 519, 521 (E.D.N.Y. 1974), some courts have attempted to use their supervisory authority to limit the extent to which the prosecutor may compromise the independence of the grand jury. See, e.g., United States v. Hogan, 712 F.2d 757, 759-61 (2d Cir. 1983); United States v. Ciambrone, 601 F.2d 616, 623 (2d Cir. 1979); ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, 3-3.5 (2d ed. 1980) (reviewing strictures placed on prosecutors in grand jury).

> When the framers of the Bill of Rights directed in the Fifth Amendment that "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury," they were not engaging in a mere verbal exercise.

United States v. Estepa, 471 F.2d 1132, 1136 (2d Cir. 1972) (Friendly, C.J.) (reversing convictions and dismissing indictment because grand jury was misled as to hearsay nature of testimony). Bank of Nova Scotia v. United States, 487 U.S. 250 (1988), "makes clear that the supervisory power can be used to dismiss an indictment because of misconduct before the grand jury . . . 'to ensure the integrity of the grand jury's functions.'" United States v. Williams, 504 U.S. 36, 46 (1992) (quoting United States v. Mechanik, 475 U.S. 66, 74 (1986) (O'Connor, J., concurring)). Thus, at least in theory, the right to an indictment retains some meaning as a protection for defendants.

B. Quality and Quantity of Evidence Required

The grand jury's "operation generally is unrestrained by the technical, procedural and evidentiary rules governing the conduct of criminal trials." Calandra, 414 U.S. at 343. Thus, the indictment may rest entirely on hearsay, Costello v. United States, 350 U.S. 359, 364 (1956); Minor v. United States, 647 A.2d 770 (D.C. 1994), or on evidence seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment, Calandra, 414 U.S. at 358, or the Fifth Amendment, United States v. Blue, 384 U.S. 251, 255 (1966); United States v. Washington, 328 A.2d 98, 100-01 (D.C. 1974), rev'd on other grounds, 431 U.S. 181 (1977). A grand jury can consider information from a variety of sources, including tips and rumors. United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1, 15 (1973).

But the prosecutor's discretion is not unfettered.[3] The quality and quantity of the evidence must not impair the independence of the grand jury. Thus, although no rules prevent the exclusive use of any specific type of evidence, the use of hearsay, absence of live witnesses, or failure to present exculpatory evidence may require further inquiry to determine whether the right to an independent and informed grand jury has been denied.

1. Hearsay

Although an indictment based solely upon hearsay does not violate the Fifth Amendment, Costello, 350 U.S. 359, the Court of Appeals has stated a "general preference for live testimony at a grand jury proceeding." Miles, 483 A.2d at 654; Harvey v. United States, 395 A.2d 92, 97 n.11 (D.C. 1978). But dismissal of the indictment or reversal of a conviction based on the exclusive use of hearsay will not be granted absent "some showing that the integrity of the grand jury proceedings has been impaired." Miles, 483 A.2d at 654; see also, United States v. Rodriguez-Ramos, 704 F.2d 17, 21-22 (1st Cir. 1983) (grand jury was not misled concerning hearsay nature of testimony). The inquiry must focus on whether the particular use of hearsay prevented the grand jury from exercising its own judgment, independent of the conclusions of the police or prosecutors. The grand jury may not become "a rubber stamp endorsing the wishes of a prosecutor as a result of the needless presentation of hearsay testimony in grand jury proceedings." United States v. Flomenhoft, 714 F.2d 708, 712 (7th Cir. 1983) (quoting United States v. Gallo, 394 F. Supp. 310, 314 (D. Conn. 1975)).

Specifically, the prosecutor may not mislead the grand jury, even by silence, into thinking that testimony is based on direct observation when it is actually based on hearsay. Nor may hearsay be substituted for direct testimony when there is reason to believe that the grand jury would not indict if it heard the direct testimony. For example, the government may not rely on a police officer's account of a witness's report that the witness has subsequently changed or retracted in a material respect. Estepa, 471 F.2d at 1136-37; see also Wright v. United States, 564 A.2d 734, 738 (D.C. 1989) (conviction reversed where indictment was based on false testimony).

2. Absence of Live Witnesses

The problem of hearsay is complicated further when the government reads, to a second grand jury, transcripts of testimony taken before an earlier grand jury. This process must not compromise the independence of the indicting grand jury. Thus, the transcripts must be presented in their entirety. They cannot be used to prevent revelation of information learned after the earlier proceedings. See United States v. Provenzano, 440 F. Supp. 561, 565 (S.D.N.Y. 1977) (indictment dismissed where prosecutor read transcript of testimony from prior grand jury without disclosing that witness had since recanted). Nor may transcripts be used where the original grand jury was not itself able to exercise an independent role. Most importantly, the second grand jury must be aware that it can, if it desires, compel the attendance of the live witnesses. See, e.g., Flomenhoft, 714 F.2d at 712. Especially when the government is dissatisfied with the action of a first grand jury – because of an error in its indictment, a change of circumstances, or the first grand jury's decision to return a "no true bill" – presentation of transcripts to a subsequent grand jury should be scrutinized closely. "Having decided to dismiss the first indictment and return for another indictment before a new grand jury, the government was bound to follow the rules and not to attempt a loose, shortcut procedure fraught with deficiencies of constitutional dimension." Gallo, 394 F. Supp. at 316; see also United States v. Pastor, 419 F. Supp. 1318, 1323-24 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) (dismissing second indictment where grand jury not told of hearsay quality of evidence or that it could call witnesses from first grand jury); cf. Flomenhoft, 714 F.2d at 712 (approving second indictment where "[t]he government offered to call any necessary witness if the second grand jury felt their testimony would be helpful [and] [t]he second grand jury independently decided that their testimony was unnecessary").

C. Subpoena Power

1. Scope of the Power in General

The grand jury has broad power to issue subpoenas to advance its investigation. A "presumption of regularity attaches to a grand jury subpoena," and ordinarily "need" for the subject of the subpoena need not be shown. United States v. Moultrie, 340 A.2d 828, 831 (D.C. 1975). Neither must the grand jury show that it cannot obtain the information from another source. Id. "Where a legitimate purpose for the grand jury investigation predominates . . . the fact that the government may derive an incidental tactical benefit does not render the proceeding improper." Brooks, 448 A.2d at 261; see also United States v. Beasley, 550 F.2d 261, 266 (5th Cir. 1977). In felony cases, District of Columbia grand juries are authorized to issue subpoenas nationwide. See Christian v. United States, 394 A.2d 1, 42-43 (D.C. 1978); Super. Ct. Crim. R. 17(e)(2). "Superior Court grand juries were intended to have powers comparable to federal grand juries." Christian, 394 A.2d at 42. "Everything is identical between both Grand Juries; purpose, standards, functions, powers, qualifications and rules." Atkinson v. United States, 295 A.2d 899, 901 (D.C. 1972).

The grand jury may compel the appearance of the defendant's family, friends or associates, even if they may normally be defense witnesses. See Brooks, 448 A.2d at 260-61. It can also compel the target of an investigation to appear. United States v. Wong, 431 U.S. 174, 179 n.8 (1977). Of course, any "target" of the investigation, or any witness, may assert a Fifth Amendment privilege before the grand jury. Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U.S. 547, 562 (1892). The Supreme Court has declined to decide whether a witness must be warned of the Fifth Amendment privilege against compulsory self-incrimination before the grand jury testimony can be used against the witness. See United States v. Washington, 431 U.S. 181, 188-91 (1977). However, the prosecutor should not mislead a witness on his or her status as a putative defendant by failing to give standard "target warnings." United States v. Jacobs, 531 F.2d 87, 90 (2d Cir. 1976). Notwithstanding the lack of clear constitutional imperative, under Justice Department policy, prosecutors must attach a written "Advice of Rights" form to the subpoena of a "target" or "subject" of investigation. U.S. Attorney's Manual, 9-11.250. Failure to provide such warnings may result in suppression of the witness's testimony. See Brown v. United States, 518 A.2d 415, 418 (D.C. 1986) (issue not reached because not raised below).

Despite its breadth, the grand jury's subpoena power is circumscribed. "A subpoena may be resisted where the grand jury acts without authority, where the subpoena seeks information unrelated to the grand jury's investigation, or where the subpoena endeavors to gather evidence primarily for another purpose." Christian, 394 A.2d at 46. For example, the prosecutor may not use the grand jury's subpoena power to compel witnesses to provide information to the government rather than the grand jury. See United States v. Thomas, 320 F. Supp. 527, 529 (D.D.C. 1970); Durbin v. United States, 221 F.2d 520, 522 (D.C. Cir. 1954)

Even if the grand jury subpoena is properly issued, the prosecutor may not use it as a subterfuge for trial preparation. Once an indictment is returned, the prosecutor may not use a subpoena simply to gather evidence for the trial. See United States v. Doss, 563 F.2d 265, 275 (6th Cir. 1977) (en banc) (improper to question defendant in grand jury about case already indicted);

United States v. Fahey, 510 F.2d 302, 306-07 (2d Cir. 1974) (improper to question witness in grand jury about indicted matter, but the testimony may be used to impeach witness at trial); In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 632 F.2d 1033, 1041 (3d Cir. 1980) (once defendant indicted, grand jury investigation cannot be used to secure more evidence against defendant unless it is good faith inquiry into other charges within its scope).

However, the grand jury may issue a subpoena, even after the return of an indictment, so long as it continues to investigate other charges or other defendants. See United States v. Ruppel, 666 F.2d 261, 268 (5th Cir. 1982); United States v. Zarattini, 552 F.2d 753, 757 (7th Cir. 1977) (proper to call witness to grand jury, post-indictment, to investigate new charge).

If the grand jury issues an arguably improper subpoena, the witness (or the defendant, if the witness is an agent of the defendant) should move to quash the subpoena. Such motions are filed with the Chief Judge and the burden is on the moving party to establish the irregularity and/or the impropriety of the grand jury subpoena.[4]

Although courts have held that it is improper to use subpoenas intended for grand jury witnesses for the purpose of prosecutorial investigation, and it is improper for the government to pay fees to witnesses called to the prosecutor's office solely for prosecutorial interrogation, courts may still reject a defendant's new trial motion when the prosecutor's abuse did not lead to subornation of perjured testimony presented at trial. See Perez v. United States, 968 A.2d 39, 63 (D.C 2009) (denying defendant's motion for new trial, and holding the abuse of the grand jury subpoena process did not taint the appellants' trial because defense counsel was able to present evidence to the jury of the prosecutor's pressure tactics).

2. Subpoenas Directed to Defense Attorneys or Investigators

United States Attorneys in some jurisdictions have attempted to subpoena defense attorneys or their agents to a grand jury. Such a subpoena "automatically" gives rise to concerns of privilege, and "a preliminary showing must be made by the government before the attorney can be forced to appear before the grand jury." In re Special Grand Jury No. 81-1, 676 F.2d 1005, 1010 (4th Cir.), vacated as moot, 697 F.2d 112 (1982) (indictment returned without attorney's testimony). Bringing the attorney before the grand jury raises "a strong possibility that a wedge will be driven between the attorney and the client and the relationship will be destroyed." 676 F.2d at 1009.

> We recognize that normally a subpoena is presumed to be regular, and that the subpoenaed party has the burden of showing that the information sought is privileged or that there has been an abuse of the grand jury process. Where the attorney for the target of an investigation is subpoenaed, however, attorney-client privilege considerations and sixth amendment interests arise automatically and a > preliminary showing must be made by the government before the attorney can be forced to appear before the grand jury.

[4] Rule 17(c) empowers the court to quash a subpoena duces tecum on the grounds that compliance would be "unreasonable and oppressive" in that the materials sought are excessive in number, cover an unreasonably long time period or would be unreasonably difficult to obtain. See Moultrie, 340 A.2d at 831; United States v. Gurule, 437 F.2d 239, 241 (10th Cir. 1970).

Id. at 1009-10 (citation omitted).[5]

The work-product doctrine equally protects the work of a defense investigator called before a grand jury. Appeal of Hughes, 633 F.2d 282, 290-91 (3d Cir. 1980), reversed a contempt citation against a defense investigator who had refused to testify about his investigations before a grand jury:

> Here the trial court was faced with the core of the work-product of an agent of the attorney, the very substance of the interviewer's statements. Though [the investigator] would presumably have been speaking from memory, examination into his recollection of the interview might have indirectly revealed his, and [the attorney's] mental processes . . . Even the question as to the manner in which he introduced himself involved an inquiry into his investigative technique. The same questions as to the methods of preparing materials for use in litigation addressed to any attorney would be an invasion of his work-product protection.

See also In re Sealed Case, 676 F.2d 793, 808-10 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (discovery by the government in grand jury proceedings is subject to the attorney-client privilege . . . as well as the work product rule).

3. Grand Jury Directives

A grand jury directive for a voice exemplar, a handwriting exemplar, or fingerprints requires no showing of reasonableness or justification for enforcement. See United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 19 (1973); United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973).

A directive for a line-up for someone not under arrest, however, may be enforced only upon "a minimal factual showing sufficient to permit the judge to conclude that there is a reason for the line-up which is consistent with the legitimate function of the grand jury." In re Kelley, 433 A.2d 704, 707 (D.C. 1981) (en banc). The subject or target of an investigation must be advised in a timely fashion of the right to contest the line-up on Kelley grounds, even though the right to counsel does not attach at this pre-accusatory stage. Brown v. United States, 518 A.2d 415, 419-22 (D.C. 1986).

The Kelley requirement is activated not when the directive is issued but when the government seeks to enforce it. Counsel should move to quash the directive and force the government to make a proper showing under Kelley. Kelley's rationale may not apply to other directives not mentioned in the decision (e.g., fingerprints, or voice or handwriting exemplars). See Brown, 518 A.2d at 419.

[5] But see generally In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 786 F.2d 3, 5 n.2 (1st Cir. 1986). As stated in In re Grand Jury Matters, 751 F.2d 13, 19 (1st Cir. 1984):

> There can be no absolute rule that frees an attorney, merely because he is such, to refuse to give unprivileged evidence to a grand jury. Even when trials are pending, the grand jury's right to unprivileged evidence may outweigh the right of the defense bar and its clients not to be disturbed. The matter is one that turns on particular facts as evaluated by a district court.

D. Deliberations and Return of the Indictment

The prosecutor instructs the grand jury on the law that it is to apply to each case before it. The prosecutor may not inject himself or herself into the grand jury's deliberations. Additionally, the prosecutor may not give the grand jury erroneous legal advice. However, absent a showing of "actual prejudice to the accused," the indictment will not be dismissed. United States v. McKenzie, 678 F.2d 629, 631 (5th Cir. 1982); United States v. Wright, 667 F.2d 793, 796 (9th Cir. 1982) (prosecutor's conduct did not significantly infringe upon grand jury's ability to exercise independent judgment).

The prosecutor may analyze the evidence, and point out its significance to the grand jury, but must not mislead the grand jury through legal analysis or argument. It is not per se error for the prosecutor to state a personal opinion about the defendant's guilt; "[i]mproper remarks made by a prosecutor can only justify dismissal of the indictment if such remarks so biased the grand jurors that their votes were based upon their bias." United States v. Heffington, 682 F.2d 1075, 1080 (5th Cir. 1982); United States v. Cederquist, 641 F.2d 1347, 1353 (9th Cir. 1981) (isolated use of elliptical expressions did not require dismissal). The essential question is whether the prosecutor's misconduct was "of such extremity that the will of the grand jury was overborne." McKenzie, 678 F.2d at 634.

The grand jury deliberates and votes on each indictment, count by count. At least twelve jurors must concur in each count. The grand jury must also agree on the particular charging language of the indictment. Gaither v. United States, 413 F.2d 1061, 1071 (D.C. Cir. 1969). The indictment must sufficiently apprise the defendant of the nature of the accusations so that the defendant can prepare a defense or enter a plea, and must accurately reflect the intent of the grand jury and facts found by the grand jury. Cain v. United States, 532 A.2d 1001, 1004 (D.C. 1987). The foreperson must record the number of jurors concurring in each finding, but this record may not be made public without a court order. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 6(c). The defendant is not automatically entitled to see such records. United States v. Cronic, 675 F.2d 1126, 1130 (10th Cir. 1982), rev'd on other grounds, 466 U.S. 648 (1984); United States v. Garner, 663 F.2d 834, 840 (9th Cir. 1981).

II. GRAND JURY WORK FOR PRACTITIONERS

Active representation of clients during grand jury consideration is an important though often neglected part of criminal defense practice. Attention to the grand jury proceedings may reveal one or more bases to seek dismissal of the indictment. More important, it may provide an invaluable opportunity to discover the strengths, weaknesses, and general focus of the government's case. Counsel is faced with a conundrum because of the restricted access to grand jury material. Several of the bases for dismissal mentioned previously require detailed knowledge of the grand jury proceedings. Yet access to these proceedings is available only after some showing by the defense. This section provides a checklist of steps that counsel can take, from the beginning of the case through post-trial motions, to discover the content of the grand jury proceedings. Obviously, the earlier such discovery is accomplished, the more helpful it will be in trial preparation.

A. Pre-Indictment Representation

1. Relations with the Prosecutor

Superior Court cases are presented to the grand jury by one of four sections of the United States Attorney's Office. Felony One cases are presented by prosecutors from either the Homicide or Sex Offenses Section, who remain assigned to the case through trial. Felony Two cases involving defendants targeted as violent offenders, defendants held without bond, or defendants in the jurisdiction under the Interstate Agreement on Detainers Act generally are presented to the grand jury by prosecutors in the Violent Crime Section, who also retain the case through trial. Other Felony Two cases are presented by prosecutors in the Grand Jury Section, who usually handle the cases only through indictment.

Discussion with the prosecutor during the grand jury stage is often very productive. The possibility of a pre-indictment plea may make the prosecutor willing to disclose certain information, including a defendant's statements, physical evidence, or certain medical and scientific evidence. Moreover, through these discussions, counsel can track the progress of grand jury investigations.

2. Witness Interviews

Super. Ct. Crim. R. 6(e) imposes no obligation of secrecy on witnesses before the grand jury; they remain free to discuss their testimony with anyone. See In re Investigation before April 1975 Grand Jury, 531 F.2d 600, 606-07 n.11 (D.C. Cir. 1976); In re Grand Jury Summoned October 12, 1970, 321 F. Supp. 238, 240 (N.D. Ohio 1970); Advisory Committee on Rules, Note 2, Fed. R. Crim. P. 6(e). Counsel should make every effort to interview each witness who may have appeared in the grand jury, to learn what the witness said and what the government wanted to know. It is improper for any government agent to instruct witnesses not to discuss their grand jury testimony. See United States v. Radetsky, 535 F.2d 556, 569 (10th Cir. 1976), overruled on other grounds by United States v. Daily, 921 F.2d 994, 1004 (10th Cir. 1990).

Both defense witnesses and government witnesses may be called before the grand jury. Counsel should prepare defense witnesses to take note of and report on specific details, such as the number of grand jurors present and the questions asked. In any witness interview following grand jury testimony, counsel will want to inquire beyond the substance of the testimony to discover exactly which grand jury is hearing the case (there are three or more Superior Court grand juries sitting at any one time, with different expiration dates) as well as the different concerns expressed in questions of the prosecutor and the grand jurors themselves. The jurors' questions are often an excellent indicator of weaknesses in the government's case.

B. Post-Indictment Issues

1. Errors in the Indictment

Immediately after arraignment, counsel should carefully read the indictment for errors. Even minor errors may provide the basis for further discovery of the grand jury proceedings.

Occasionally, indictments will charge the wrong offense (e.g., distribution in a possession with intent to distribute case), the wrong victim (e.g., confusing the names of two victims), or the wrong date or time. These errors can be explained in many cases by the submission of prepared indictments for the grand jury's consideration. But the submission of erroneous indictment forms to the grand jury does not explain why the grand jury would actually approve an erroneous document. One obvious possibility is that the grand jury did not actually read the indictment, suggesting that it was not acting independently of the prosecution. Alternatively, it may have read the indictment but not noticed the error, suggesting that it was not adequately informed of the evidence.

Such errors may entitle counsel to obtain some portions of the grand jury proceedings under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 6(e)(3)(C)(ii), permitting disclosure upon a showing that there may be grounds to dismiss because of events before the grand jury. Suggestions on the face of the indictment that the grand jury either was not independent or was not informed provide just such a basis. See United States v. Serubo, 604 F.2d 807, 816-17 (3d Cir. 1979) (ordering disclosure of grand jury proceedings on motion to dismiss indictment).

2. Multiple Grand Juries or Indictments

Counsel should always note whether the case has been heard by more than one grand jury. The date of the grand jury term appears at the top of each indictment. If the grand jury was sworn in after the date on which counsel knows some witnesses testified, or there is other reason to believe that more than one grand jury was used, there may be some question as to how the indicting grand jury was informed of the evidence taken by the earlier grand jury. Routinely, the prosecutor will simply read some of the transcripts to the indicting grand jury. Although this is not improper on its face, there are reasons to investigate further if there is any indication that the indicting grand jury misunderstood any relevant fact.

Similar problems can arise if the government seeks a second indictment (due to, for example, new facts uncovered, or a mistake in the first indictment). Whenever this occurs, counsel should be alert for signs that the second grand jury did not hear some evidence heard by the first grand jury, or did not consider the evidence at all but simply "corrected" an error at the prosecutor's request[6]. As with other post-indictment issues, a showing that the indicting grand jury may not have been independent or informed should be sufficient to get disclosure of the proceedings under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 6(e)(3)(C)(ii).

[6] Counsel must raise any such issue in order to preserve it. See Teoume-Lessane v. United States, 931 A.2d 478 (D.C. 2007). Not plain error for trial judge to fail to raise sua sponte issue of prosecutorial vindictiveness based upon addition of a charge to a superseding indictment following a hung jury.

3. Pre-trial Disclosure of Grand Jury Transcripts

There is a strong policy of secrecy surrounding the operations of the grand jury. See Super. Crim. R. 6(e)(2). However, a witness may discuss his or her testimony with others without violating Rule 6(e) which prohibits grand jurors, prosecutors and stenographers from disclosing "matters occurring before the grand jury." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 6(e)(1) provides that grand jury transcripts "shall remain in the custody and control of the government unless otherwise ordered by the Court in a particular case." Pre-trial release of a grand jury transcript is only ordered when "the party seeking disclosure has established a particularized need that outweighs time-worn considerations." United States v. Alexander, 428 A.2d 42, 53 (D.C. 1981).[7] A party seeking disclosure must show: (a) the material sought is needed to avoid injustice; (b) the need for disclosure exceeds the need for continued secrecy; and (c) the request is structured to cover only the material needed. Id. at 53-54; see also Davis v. United States, 641 A.2d 484, 493 (D.C. 1994). There is authority in other jurisdictions that a witness may request his own transcript without a showing of particularized need. See In re Sealed Motion, 880 F.2d 1367 (D.C. Cir. 1989); Bursey v. United States, 466 F.2d 1059 (9th Cir. 1972).

A showing of "particularized need" is not impossible, for the court has recognized that witness impeachment and refreshment of recollection are examples of particularized need. See Law v. United States, 488 A.2d 914, 916 (D.C. 1985). However, Davis and Alexander require that defense counsel assert more than a desire to prepare the witness for trial.

Defense counsel may also obtain pre-trial access to grand jury transcripts by making a specific Brady demand for any exculpatory material contained in the grand jury proceedings. Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 87 (1963). "[G]rand jury testimony is subject to the duty to disclose under Brady." Wiggins v. United States, 386 A.2d 1171, 1173 n.3 (D.C. 1978). The government may have presented "defense" witnesses who establish an alibi or some other viable defense. See, e.g., Brooks v. United States, 448 A.2d 253 (D.C. 1982). The government's own witnesses may have provided exculpatory information. The government must disclose the names of the relevant witnesses and at least a summary of the information. See Wiggins, 386 A.2d at 1173 & n.3; United States v. Ruggiero, 472 F.2d 599, 603-05 (2d Cir. 1973).

[7] The discovery rules do not apply to grand jury testimony, unless it is that of the defendant. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 16(a)(3)(a)(1)(A).

Even if the government provides summaries, the defense is entitled to the actual transcripts if they might be admissible, as where the witness is unavailable for trial and the transcript may be admissible as prior recorded testimony. See Johns v. United States, 434 A.2d 463, 472-75 (D.C. 1981); cf. Ready v. United States, 445 A.2d 982, 990 (D.C. 1982) (inadequate showing that witness was unavailable).

Grand Jury Representation:

Pre-Indictment:

- ✓ Discuss case with prosecution
- ✓ Interview government witnesses
- ✓ Prepare defense witnesses that may be called

Post-Indictment:

- ✓ Carefully read indictment for errors
- ✓ Always note if case was presented to more than one grand jury
- ✓ Any showing that the grand jury was not independent/informed raises potential to obtain disclosure of the proceeding

Obtaining Grand Jury Transcripts:

- ✓ Counsel can obtain pretrial access to grand jury transcripts by making a specific Brady request for exculpatory material in the proceeding
- ✓ Defense is entitled to actual transcripts if they might be admissible

III. CHALLENGES TO THE GRAND JURY AND INDICTMENT

A. Challenges to the Composition of the Grand Jury

Challenges may be made to individual jurors or to the entire array.[8] Challenges to individual jurors, however, are quite restricted. Although the Supreme Court has left the question open, the [8] A motion to dismiss the indictment may be based on objections to the array or on the lack of legal qualifications of an individual juror…. Such motion shall be made in the manner prescribed in 28 U.S.C. 1867(e) and shall be granted under the conditions prescribed in that statute. An indictment shall not be dismissed on the ground that one or more members of the grand jury were not legally qualified if it appears from the record kept pursuant to paragraph (c) of this Rule that 12 or more jurors, after deducting the number not qualified, concurred in finding the indictment.

Super. Ct. Crim. R. 6(b)(2).

Court of Appeals has held that grand jurors may not be challenged for bias. Thus, extensive exposure to publicity does not taint a grand juror. Khaalis v. United States, 408 A.2d 313, 333-34 (D.C. 1979). There is a suggestion in Khaalis, however, that a specific showing of individual bias may justify further inquiry by the court. Id. at 333 n.11. The witnesses who testified are normally the best source of information about individual grand jurors. Occasionally, a witness will recognize that a grand juror is from a neighborhood relevant to the case and knows one or more of the involved individuals. If such a juror can be shown, through affidavits, to harbor strong feelings about the people or the case, the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment may provide a basis for a challenge.

Challenges for lack of legal qualification are more often accepted. Grand juries are, like petit juries, impanelled under the Jury Selection and Service Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1861 et seq., made applicable to the Superior Court by D.C. Code §§ 11-1901 et seq. The Act establishes broad criteria for selection of jurors and requires each jurisdiction in the federal system to develop and implement a plan.[9]

Challenges may be made to the grand jury as a whole and to the array from which it was selected. Each defendant has "the right to grand and petit juries selected at random from a fair cross section of the community." See 28 U.S.C. § 1861; Campbell v. Louisiana, 523 U.S. 392 (1998); Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522 (1975). The Act prohibits bias in selection of jurors on the basis of race, ethnicity, sex, national origin, and economic status. 28 U.S.C. § 1862.

To establish a prima facie violation of the fair cross-section requirement, the defense[10] must show that: (1) a "distinctive"[11] group in the community; (2) is substantially under-represented[12] in the list from which grand and petit jurors are summoned; (3) as a result of systematic exclusion of the group in the jury selection process.[13] Duren, 439 U.S. at 364. Once a prima

[9] The district court has adopted a plan and established a three-person jury commission to implement it. The District of Columbia Jury Commission selects jurors in accordance with the plan for grand and petit juries in both federal and local courts. Jurors are randomly selected from a source list compiled every four years by merging the lists of registered voters and driver's licenses. The commissioners establish a qualified juror list by eliminating (on the basis of questionnaires) persons who are disqualified by law, exempted on public interest grounds, or excused for hardship. Persons on the qualified list are summoned for grand jury service by periodic random drawings.

[10] White defendants have third-party standing to raise equal protection claims of discrimination against other racial groups in the selection of grand jurors, and may further claim a due process violation if convicted on an indictment returned by an improperly selected grand jury. Campbell v. Louisiana, 523 U.S. 392 (1998).

[11] Groups found to be "distinctive" include blacks, Smith v. Texas, 311 U.S. 128 (1940); women, Taylor, 419 U.S. 522 (1975); Mexican-Americans, Hernandez v. Texas, 347 U.S. 475 (1954); atheists, State v. Madison, 213 A.2d 880 (Md. 1965); and daily wage earners, Thiel v. Southern Pacific Co., 328 U.S. 217 (1946). But see United States v. Diggs, 522 F.2d 1310, 1317 (D.C. Cir. 1975) (people ages 21 to 29 not cognizable group).

[12] How the degree of under-representation is assessed varies. A group's representation in the jury list may be compared with its representation in the total population, see, e.g., Duren v. Missouri, 439 U.S. 357 (1979), or in the eligible population, see, e.g., Taylor, 419 U.S. 522, 531 (1975). See generally Gerwin, An Analysis of Jury Selection Decisions, appended to Foster v. Sparks, 506 F.2d 805, 832-33 (5th Cir. 1975). As to whether the under-representation is sufficiently "substantial," see, e.g., Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482 (1977); Turner v. Fouche, 396 U.S. 346 (1970); Cassell v. Texas, 339 U.S. 282 (1950).

[13] The question here is whether the cause of the under-representation is inherent in the method of jury selection. For example, a policy of excusing women on request is systemic exclusion. Duren, 439 U.S. at 357. In contrast, Harlee

facie showing is made, the burden shifts to the government to show "that a significant state interest [is] manifestly and primarily advanced" by the mechanism that results in the exclusion or under-representation. Id. at 367. "Merely rational grounds" do not suffice. Taylor, 419 U.S. at 534.[14]

A challenge to the composition of the grand jury requires inspection of the jury selection records of the Jury Commission to develop the necessary database, as authorized by the Act:

> The contents of records or papers used by the jury commission or clerk in connection with the jury selection process shall not be disclosed, except . . . as may be necessary in the preparation or presentation of a motion [challenging selection procedure]. . . .The parties in a case shall be allowed to inspect, reproduce, and copy such records or papers at all reasonable times during the preparation and pendency of such a motion.

28 U.S.C. § 1867(f). This right to inspection is unqualified. Test v. United States, 420 U.S. 28, 30 (1975). The defense need not establish a prima facie case, by affidavit or otherwise, to obtain access to jury selection records. Id. at 29-30 n.2. Counsel may also require expert assistance in compiling and analyzing the statistical data.

Counsel must be careful to comply with the procedural requirements of 28 U.S.C. § 1867. The motion to dismiss the indictment must be made before voir dire of the petit jury begins, or within seven days after the defendant discovered, or could have discovered by the exercise of diligence, the grounds therefore, whichever is earlier. 28 U.S.C. § 1867(a). To obtain an evidentiary hearing, the motion must be accompanied by a sworn statement of facts that, if true, would constitute a substantial failure to comply with the Act's provisions. 28 U.S.C. § 1867(d).

B. Motions to Dismiss the Indictment

While instances of impropriety in the grand jury seem to be rare – no doubt because of the secrecy surrounding the grand jury – defense counsel should be aware that motions to dismiss indictments as violative of due process may sometimes be appropriate. Another theory for dismissal is a trial court's supervisory power over a grand jury's work in its jurisdiction. Some instances of impropriety before the grand jury include the following:

1. Presence of Unauthorized Persons

Super. Ct. Crim. R. 6(d) limits the persons who may appear in front of the grand jury to "attorneys for the government, the witness under examination, interpreters when needed and . . .

v. District of Columbia, 558 A.2d 351 (D.C. 1989), rejected a challenge to the District of Columbia jury selection process predicated on under-representation of Spanish-surnamed persons, because there was no showing that it resulted from systematic exclusion.

[14] The defendant need not be a member of the excluded group. Taylor, 419 U.S. at 526. And the fact that members of the under-represented group were actually on the defendant's jury is irrelevant. See, e.g., Thiel, 328 U.S. at 225, Campbell v. Louisiana, 523 U.S. 392 (1998).

a stenographer or operator of a recording device."[15] The Supreme Court has twice reviewed violations of Rule 6(d). In United States v. Mechanik, 475 U.S. 66 (1986), two FBI agents testified jointly in front of the grand jury in violation of Rule 6(d). The Fourth Circuit applied a per se rule, and reversed the convictions. The Supreme Court, however, reinstated the convictions, ruling that the error was harmless since it did not affect the outcome of the trial:

> the petit jury's verdict of guilty beyond a reasonable doubt demonstrates a fortiori that there was probable cause to charge the defendants with the offenses for which they were convicted. Therefore, the convictions must stand despite the rule violation. Id. at 67; see also Id. at 70.

Similarly, in Bank of Nova Scotia v. United States, 487 U.S. 250 (1988), two IRS agents violated Rules 6(d) and 6(e) by reading inaccurate transcripts to the grand jury in the absence of the prosecutor. Relying on Mechanik, the Supreme Court affirmed the convictions because there was no showing of prejudice to the defendant. Under Mechanik and Bank of Nova Scotia, it is evident that prejudice must be shown before a court will reverse a conviction for violations of Rule 6(d). However courts have supervisory power to dismiss indictments where statutes and rules designed to protect the integrity of the grand jury are violated:

> Thus, Bank of Nova Scotia v. United States, 487 U.S. 250 (1988), makes clear that the supervisory power can be used to dismiss an indictment because of misconduct before the grand jury, at least where that misconduct amounts to a violation of one of these "few, clear rules which are carefully drafted and approved by this Court and by Congress to ensure the integrity of the grand jury's functions," United States v. Mechanik, 475 U.S. 66, 74 (1986) (O'Connor, J., concurring in judgment). United States v. Williams, 504 U.S. 36, 46 (1992).

In Williams v. United States, 757 A.2d 100 (D.C. 2000), the Court of Appeals considered the government's practice of presenting to grand jurors the unsworn testimony of narcotics "experts" who informed the grand jurors of the behavior of typical narcotics users and sellers. The Court of Appeals held that the detective who appeared before the grand jury should have been under oath, but that the error was harmless under Bank of Nova Scotia. Id. at 103.

2. Perjury in the Grand Jury

Hunter v. United States, 590 A.2d 1049, 1051 (D.C. 1991), sets forth the basic principles relating to the validity of indictments where false testimony was presented to the jury (citations omitted, emphasis added):

> [O]rdinarily the court does not review evidence presented to the grand jury to determine whether it was sufficient to support the indictment returned. . . . An indictment returned by a legally constituted and unbiased grand jury that is valid on its face is enough to call for a trial on the merits. . . . However, where false > material testimony is presented to the grand jury, the court may review the evidence presented to the grand jury to determine whether the defendant suffered any prejudice as a result, depending upon the seriousness of the showing.

[15] The Supreme Court has not reached the question of whether the witness under examination has a right to have her counsel present outside the jury room. See, e.g., Conn v. Gabbert, 526 U.S. 286 (1999).

In Hunter, a police officer gave false testimony to the grand jury and the defendant moved to dismiss the indictment. The Court of Appeals affirmed the conviction because another witness before the grand jury, the victim, provided ample untainted testimony to support the indictment:

> Dismissal of the indictment is warranted only where it is established that the false testimony substantially influenced the grand jury's decision to indict or where there exists a "grave doubt" whether the decision to indict was free from the substantial influence of the false testimony. See Sanders v. United States, 550 A.2d 343, 345 (D.C. 1988)] (citing Bank of Nova Scotia v. United States, 487 U.S. 250 (1988). Where no evidence other than deliberately falsified information is presented to the grand jury as to a charge, dismissal of the indictment for that charge would be warranted. See Wright v. United States, [564 A.2d 734, 738 (D.C. 1989)].

Hunter, 590 A.2d at 1051-52; see also Gaffney v. United States, 980 A.2d 1190 (D.C. 2009) (defendant's admission to two key government witnesses could not support perjury conviction where admission merely contradicted the defendant and was not corroborated by other evidence, thus the evidence did not materially contradict the defendant's grand jury testimony); Jones v. United States, 893 A.2d 564, 567 (D.C. 2006) (holding that a witness's inconsistent stories before the grand jury, and later at trial, can be remedied with cautionary jury instructions given that the two witnesses' inconsistent stories in the grand jury and at trial – as well as the details of the immunity letter – were fully aired before the petit jury at trial with a cautionary instruction which asked the jury to scrutinize with care "the testimony of an admitted . . . perjurer" and to consider such inconsistencies in evaluating credibility); Keys v. United States, 767 A.2d 255 (D.C. 2001) (no due process violation where complaining witness told prosecutor mid-trial that she had falsely testified in grand jury, but then testified at trial consistently with her grand jury testimony; United States v. Udziela, 671 F.2d 995 (7th Cir. 1982) (indictment stands despite perjured testimony because another witness gave sufficient untainted evidence).

Williams v. United States*, 75 A.3d 217 (D.C. 2013). Any error for trial court in denying motion to dismiss indictment containing admittedly false testimony of detective was rendered harmless by petit jury's "supervening guilty verdict" and where testimony was presented to grand jury "without willful misconduct or other extenuating circumstances."

3. Vindictive Indictments

Where a defendant has successfully moved to dismiss a complaint or indictment or obtained a new trial after appeal, a subsequent indictment that contains additional charges may be vulnerable to attack as vindictive. The theory is that a defendant may not be penalized for exercising a legal right. See North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711 (1969) (harsher sentence on retrial after successful appeal only allowed if objective, nonvindictive reasons are stated).

In Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21 (1974), the defendant was convicted of a misdemeanor, but appealed and was granted a jury trial de novo in a higher court. The prosecutor then indicted for a felony. The Supreme Court ruled that the increase in charges violated due process because it penalized the defendant for the exercise of his right to appeal, even though there was "no evidence that the prosecutor acted in bad faith or maliciously in seeking a felony indictment." Id. at 28. Due process forbids even the appearance of vindictiveness, which should be presumed from the filing of additional charges after the defendant asserts a right. See United States v. Schiller, 424 A.2d 51, 56-57 (D.C. 1980).

Upon a defense motion to dismiss for prosecutorial vindictiveness, if the court determines that the prosecutor's actions give rise to the realistic likelihood of vindictiveness, then the government must rebut the presumption of vindictiveness by explaining its decision. See United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368, 373 (1982); Schiller, 424 A.2d 51, 56-57. In determining whether the government has met its burden, the court should consider: (1) the nature of the case; (2) the status of the case; (3) the nature of the right asserted by the defendant; (4) the type of vindictiveness alleged; and (5) the nature of the harm involved. Schiller, 424 A.2d at 56; see also United States v. Mahdi, 777 A.2d 814 (D.C. 2001) (clarifying standard and procedures for consideration of claims of prosecutorial vindictiveness). Any time a motion to dismiss a complaint or indictment has been granted, and a new indictment increases the charges, defense counsel should consider filing a motion to dismiss because of prosecutorial vindictiveness.

4. Failure to Present Exculpatory Evidence

ABA Standards relating to the Prosecution Function § 3.6(b) (2d ed. 1980) provides that "[t]he prosecutor should disclose to the grand jury any evidence which he knows will tend to negate guilt." The United States Attorney's Manual sets forth the Department of Justice's view of appropriate conduct by prosecutors appearing before grand juries.[16] The Manual advises a prosecutor who is "personally aware of substantial evidence which directly negates . . . guilt," to notify the grand jury of this evidence. U.S. Attorney's Manual, § 9-11.334.

The Court in United States v. Williams, 504 U.S. 36, 47 (1992), held that federal courts may not exercise their supervisory power to prescribe rules requiring prosecutors to present exculpatory evidence to grand juries. However, the Court did not address whether a failure to present substantial exculpatory evidence could violate due process. Lower courts have recognized due process implications of the government's failure to present exculpatory evidence. See United States v. Short, 777 F. Supp. 40 (D.D.C. 1991) (indictment dismissed where prosecutor withheld evidence from the grand jury); United States v. Reid, 911 F.2d 1456 (10th Cir. 1990) (court recognized that failure to present exculpatory evidence may necessitate dismissal, but did not find so in this case); United States v. Samango, 607 F.2d 877 (9th Cir. 1979) (indictment dismissed for failure to present exculpatory evidence).

[16] The Manual is advisory only, and does not purport to set forth the law or create rights. See United States v. King, 590 F.2d 253, 256-57 (8th Cir. 1978).

Counsel should be alert to government overreaching or unfairness in presenting evidence. Prosecutors should be aware that, because of their influence over grand juries, they have an "ethical obligation strictly to observe the status of the grand jury as an independent legal body." Hogan, 712 F.2d 757, 759 (2nd Cir. 1983) (citing ABA Standards for Criminal Justice at 3.48 and U.S. Attorney's Manual, § 9-11.015).

5. Use of Grand Jury to Prepare an Indicted Case for Trial

It is well-established that a prosecutor may not use a grand jury to prepare for trial of a defendant who has been indicted. United States v. Moss, 756 F.2d 329, 332 (4th Cir. 1984); United States v. Ruppel, 666 F.2d 261, 267-68 (5th Cir. 1982). However, where an indictment has been returned, a prosecutor may issue a grand jury subpoena for a witness to testify about unindicted defendants or other crimes. See Brooks v. United States, 448 A.2d 253, 261 (D.C. 1982). The rationale of this rule is that the grand jury's purpose is to investigate crimes, not provide pre-trial discovery for the prosecutor. See United States v. Zarattini, 552 F.2d 753, 756-57 (7th Cir. 1977).

If defense counsel learns that a witness has been subpoenaed to testify about his already indicted client, he or she may move to quash the subpoena. See In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum dated Jan. 2, 1985 (Robert M. Simels, Esq.), 767 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1985). Or, if a superseding indictment has been returned, defense counsel may move to dismiss the indictment. Doss, 563 F.2d 265; United States v. Thompson, 944 F.2d 1331, 1337-39 (7th Cir. 1991). There are other less drastic remedies, such as disclosure of the grand jury transcripts, United States v. Doe, 455 F.2d 1270, 1275-76 (1st Cir. 1972); or the exclusion of any testimony of the witness, see In re Grand Jury Subpoena (Simels), 767 F.2d at 30 (collecting cases).

The issue is whether the "sole or dominant" purpose in calling the witness before the grand jury was to gather evidence for trial on the already pending indictment. Moss, 756 F.2d at 332 (collecting cases). In deciding this issue, the court should consider all of the circumstances and review a transcript of the grand jury testimony. See In re Grand Jury Proceedings (Fernandez Diamante), 814 F.2d 61, 71 (1st Cir. 1987) ("intent" of prosecutor is not the ultimate issue). Some relevant criteria to "sole or dominant" purpose includes: whether the prosecutor who obtained the original indictment presents the "new" cases; whether the names of other persons and their involvement were known prior to the initial indictment; whether questions asked relate to new crimes or defendants; and whether the questions about the defendant and his crimes are the same as those posed at the first grand jury proceeding.

C. Motions to Dismiss the Complaint

Often, the delay between arrest and indictment is excessive. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 48(c) requires that a held defendant be released after nine months if there is no indictment, unless the court extends the time period after notice to the defendant and upon good cause shown. Counsel need not wait nine months in order to seek dismissal when the government is moving to indict too slowly. Rule 48(b) allows dismissal, without prejudice, when "there is unnecessary delay in presenting the charge to a grand jury . . . against a defendant who has been held to answer to the Court." Judges may be especially inclined to dismiss where defendants have been detained for several months pursuant to § 23-1325(a) or a high money bond.[17] See United States v. Hargrove, 118 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 1493 (D.C. Super. Ct., July 10, 1990) (Greene, J.).

Counsel Should Make the Following Challenges to the Grand Jury or the Indictment, Where Appropriate:

- ✓ Challenge the composition of the grand jury
- ✓ File a Motion to Dismiss the indictment based on the following:
  - Presence of an unauthorized person
  - Perjury in the grand jury
  - Vindictive indictments
  - Failure to present exculpatory evidence
  - The use of the grand jury, by the prosecution, to prepare an indicted case for trial
- ✓ File a Motion to Dismiss the complaint when the government is moving to indict too slowly [17] These motions are not to be confused with motions to dismiss on speedy trial grounds, which require the defendant to meet a higher burden and result in dismissal with prejudice.

CHAPTER 8

THE CHARGING DOCUMENT

The charging document may contain flaws warranting dismissal or further clarification. Such challenges require thorough knowledge of the pertinent law and may be lost if not timely raised. Upon receipt of the charging document, each count should be carefully examined to determine whether it is subject to dismissal or, in the alternative, may be subject to the filing of a bill of particulars in order to learn in greater detail the nature of the prosecution's allegations. Furthermore, some grounds for challenge for dismissal may survive; especially those based on "amendment" or "variance," and may be raised during trial as soon as they appear.

I. NATURE AND PURPOSE OF THE CHARGING DOCUMENT

A. Charging Documents: Indictments, Informations, and Petitions

All felonies must be prosecuted through a grand jury indictment. U.S. Const. amend. V; D.C. Code §§ 16-702, 23-301; Super. Ct. Crim. R. 7(a).[1] A misdemeanor is charged by an "information," signed by an Assistant United States Attorney. A "petition," the charging document in juvenile proceedings, is subject to many of the same challenges as an information. See Super. Ct. Juv. R. 7; In re J.R.G., 305 A.2d 529, 530 (D.C. 1973).

An information may be used even if "repeat" or "release" papers increase the possible imprisonment to more than a year. Smith v. United States, 304 A.2d 28, 31-32 (D.C. 1973). However, if the possible penalty is increased to more than three years – for example, for a second conviction for possessing an unregistered firearm, where repeat and release papers are filed – the prosecution must proceed by indictment. D.C. Code § 23-111(a)(2).

B. Purposes of the Charging Document

The Sixth Amendment confers a right "to be informed of the nature and cause" of a criminal accusation. The charging document must therefore provide notice of the charges, adequate for preparation of the defense. See (Nathaniel) Jones v. United States, 526 U.S. 227 (1999). It must also provide enough detail to permit evaluation of a claim of double jeopardy. See United States v. Miller, 471 U.S. 130, 134-35 (1985); Russell v. United States, 369 U.S. 749, 763-65 (1962); (Oliver W.) Johnson v. United States, 613 A.2d 1381, 1384 (D.C. 1992).

Finally, the indictment secures the Fifth Amendment guarantee "that the accused is to be tried only on such charges as a grand jury has returned." United States v. Bradford, 482 A.2d 430, 433-34 n.3 (D.C. 1984) (citing Russell, 369 U.S. at 771).

> The purpose of this requirement . . . is "to limit [a defendant's] jeopardy to offenses charged by a group of his fellow citizens acting independently of either > prosecuting attorney or judge." To allow the prosecutor or the court to guess what was in the minds of the grand jurors at the time they returned the indictment would deprive the defendant of this "basic protection." "For a defendant could then be convicted on the basis of facts not found by, and perhaps not even presented to, the grand jury which indicted him."

[1] The defendant may waive the right to indictment in open court. D.C. Code § 23-301; Super. Ct. Crim. R. 7(b). When a pre-indictment plea to a felony is being considered, counsel must advise the defendant of the right to indictment and that it will be waived by the plea.

Bradford, 482 A.2d at 434 n.3 (quoting Russell, 369 U.S. at 770-71). These concepts are discussed further in the sections relating to specific challenges to the indictment.

Charging Document:

- ✓ Carefully examine each charge of the charging document to determine if it is subject to dismissal or filing of a bill of particulars

2014 Supplement

Hooker v. United States*, 70 A.3d 1197 (D.C. 2013). Despite minor complainant's inability to specify time period in which charged sexual offenses took place, government's evidence was sufficient to establish that dates of offenses were reasonably close to those alleged in amended information.

Eady v. United States*, 44 A.3d 257 (D.C. 2012). Trial court erred in permitting evidence of defendant's release status and prior conviction to prove sentencing enhancement as charged in the indictment.

Marshall v. United States*, 15 A.3d 699 (D.C. 2011). Trial court did not plainly err in allowing obstruction of justice charge to go to jury on factual theory materially at variance with government's pretrial proffer because defendant made no objection to testimony at issue, including no discussion of a need to investigate or for a continuance, obstruction theory ultimately pursued did not completely diverge from pretrial proffer, and variance was direct result of defendant's trial counsel having elicited pertinent evidence after being made aware of trial court's opinion that evidence already admitted was legally insufficient to support conviction for an obstruction of justice charge.

II. PRE-TRIAL CHALLENGES TO THE CHARGING DOCUMENT

The potential challenges to the charging document derive from the purposes of the document, i.e., notice of the charges, prevention of double jeopardy, and, in felony cases, assurance that the accused is tried only on such charges as the grand jury has returned. Counsel should be prepared to file a motion to dismiss or a bill of particulars if one of these purposes is not achieved.

2014 Supplement

Jones v. United States*, 99 A.3d 679 (2014). The government may obtain a conviction on a charge contained in an original indictment, but omitted from a superseding indictment, because the filing of a superseding indictment does not automatically mean the original indictment has been dismissed. Practice tip: When the government files a superseding indictment that leaves out a charge from the original indictment, you should seek dismissal of any charges left out of the superseding indictment or, at minimum, make the government put on the record which charges it intends to press at trial.

Jordan v. United States*, 18 A.3d 703 (D.C. 2011). Trial court did not err in refusing to strike nickname from indictment because, although irrelevant, inclusion of nickname was neither inflammatory not prejudicial where prosecutor referred to nickname in passing during opening statement and one witness testified that he knew defendant by nickname.

A. Timing of the Motion to Dismiss

A motion to dismiss must be filed within twenty days after the status hearing or, in non-jury cases, ten days after arraignment or entry of counsel's appearance. With court permission, it may be filed later. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 12(b)(2), 47-I(c). Many judges have courtroom procedures that govern the filing of such a motion, and counsel should obtain the judge's procedures as soon as the case has been assigned to a calendar. Failure to file a timely motion constitutes a waiver of the defect, which cannot then be raised on appeal unless the charging document failed to give fair notice of the charges, thereby causing "substantial prejudice" to the defendant or an "apparent miscarriage of justice." Clemons v. United States, 400 A.2d 1048, 1051 (D.C. 1979); accord Patterson v. United States, 575 A.2d 305, 306 (D.C. 1990). Given the stringent appellate test, all possible defects should be raised in a pre-trial motion to dismiss. See Persall v. United States, 812 A.2d 953 (D.C. 2002) (without deciding that appellant did not waive his challenge to the poor drafting of the conspiracy count in the indictment for failure to raise it pre-trial, the court found no prejudice where the count contained the elements of the offense and adequately protected appellant's interest in notice and avoidance of future prosecutions).

Failure of the charging document to set out the essential elements of the offense or to confer jurisdiction on the trial court may be raised at any time. Fed. R. Crim. P. 12(b)(2); Bradford, 482 A.2d at 433. However, a late challenge based on failure to set out the essential elements will permit liberal construction "in favor of validity" – that is, the document will be found sufficient if the necessary facts "appear in any form" or can be found by "fair construction." Bradford, 482 A.2d at 433 (citing Hagner v. United States, 285 U.S. 427, 433 (1932)); cf. Porter v. United States, 769 A.2d 143 (D.C. 2001) (statute of limitations is tolled while an indictment is pending; therefore, the prosecution was not time-barred when a new indictment was returned after the case was dismissed for want of prosecution).

If a motion to dismiss is granted with prejudice, failure of the government to appeal within thirty days terminates the prosecution. Dismissal without prejudice, however, permits the government to resubmit the matter to a grand jury or file another information or petition. Washington v. United States, 366 A.2d 457, 459 (D.C. 1976).

Practice tip: When the government files a superseding indictment that leaves out a charge from the original indictment, you should seek dismissal of any charges left out of the superseding indictment or, at minimum, make the government put on the record which charges it intends to press at trial.

B. Insufficient Notice of the Charges

"As a constitutional matter, an indictment must contain all the elements of the offenses charged and sufficiently apprise the defendant of the charges so that he or she can prepare to meet them." Hsu v. United States, 392 A.2d 972, 976 (D.C. 1978) (quoting Russell, 369 U.S. at 763). For example, the burglary indictment in United States v. Thomas, 444 F.2d 919 (D.C. Cir. 1971), failed to allege the crime that the defendant intended to commit when he entered the building. Because it was impossible to discern what crime the grand jury had in mind, the indictment failed to state the offense of burglary. Id. at 922-23. This requirement applies to all charging documents because notice is a Sixth Amendment requirement in all criminal prosecutions.

The indictment may track the language of the statute defining the offense, but may not stop with a narration of the "generic" terms of the statute.

> "[I]t must state the species, – it must descend to particulars." . . . [The statutory language] "must be accompanied with such a statement of the facts and circumstances as will inform the accused of the specific offense, coming under the general description, with which he is charged."

United States v. Nance, 533 F.2d 699, 701 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (per curiam) (false pretenses indictment alleging names and dates insufficient for failure to state particular misrepresentations allegedly made) (quoting Russell, 369 U.S. at 764-66) (emphasis added); see also Thomas, 444 F.2d at 922 (statutory language insufficient to charge first-degree burglary where case law requires proof of entry with intent to commit a specific crime). But see Bolanos v. United States, 938 A.2d 672, 686-87 (D.C. 2007) (no miscarriage of justice under plain error standard when charge for aggravated assault while armed (AAWA) omitted language for both subsections of the aggravated assault statute; defendant was on notice since indictment referenced citations for both subsections and trial court instructed jury on both subsections).

The charging document must also provide sufficient details to allow the defendant to prepare the defense and meet the government's case. Hsu, 392 A.2d at 976; Thomas, 444 F.2d at 926. When the particulars are necessary to the statement of an offense, they must be included in the charging document. Nance, 533 F.2d at 701; Thomas, 444 F.2d at 923. If a motion to dismiss is denied, omitted information should be sought via a motion for a bill of particulars. But See Jackson v. United States, 503 A.2d 1225, 1226-27 (D.C. 1986) (indictment for sex crimes with minors provided adequate notice, though it did not specify date and time that child-complainants were unable to provide; for the same reasons, the government was unable to provide bill of particulars). If the indictment states an offense, but lacks particularity, failure to object at trial precludes reversal on appeal unless the defendant can demonstrate "substantial prejudice." Williams v. United States, 404 A.2d 189, 192 (D.C. 1979).

Likewise, late objection will lead to a liberal construction of the document in favor of validity. Hsu, 392 A.2d at 979. Thus, Bradford upheld an armed robbery indictment even though it did not allege force, violence, or fear. The allegation that the defendant "stole" property from the immediate possession of the complainant while armed with a pistol, combined with the "armed robbery" caption, gave adequate notice. 482 A.2d at 433-34. The court stressed that this liberal construction was required by the defendant's failure to raise the challenge before the verdict. Id. at 433.

Finally, the indictment must allege any "fact in aggravation" – a fact that relates to the offense charged and increases the penalty (for example, that the crime was committed while the defendant was armed with a dangerous weapon, that a pistol was operable, or that the recipient of a controlled substance was a minor). United States v. Moore, 540 F.2d 1088, 1089-90 (D.C. Cir. 1976); Jordan v. United States District Court, 233 F.2d 362, 367 (D.C. Cir.), vacated on other grounds, 352 U.S. 904 (1956). Although the Supreme Court decision in Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), does not address the indictment issue directly, id. at 477 n.3, it is clear from the decision that any fact, other than that of a prior conviction, which increases the penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum, must be alleged in the indictment. Id. at 490. The defendant must be given notice of prior convictions used to enhance a sentence by way of information. D.C. Code § 23-111(a)(1); Lucas v. United States, 602 A.2d 1107, 1111 (D.C. 1992).

When confronted with an indictment that lacks sufficient notice, counsel should consider filing a motion for a bill of particulars before filing a motion to dismiss.

2014 Supplement

Collins v. United States*, 73 A.3d 974 (D.C. 2013). Trial court did not err by instructing jury on vicarious liability where indictment failed to allege conspiracy because proof of conspiracy is not an element of a crime (distinguishing Apprendi and Cotton).

Sandwick v. District of Columbia*, 21 A.3d 997 (D.C. 2011). Defendant's rights not violated by charging document that failed to allege that he knew of accident and resulting injury before leaving scene where information stated that he had operated a vehicle and failed to stop and provide assistance and his information after having injured someone.

1. Bill of Particulars

A motion for a bill of particulars is a useful but largely neglected device for obtaining information omitted from the charging document and discovery process. It may be filed before arraignment, and must be filed within ten days after arraignment unless the court permits a later filing. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 7(f), 47-I(c). Counsel must certify in the motion that the prosecutor has refused to disclose the information sought.[2] Rule 16-II. Courts generally give permission to file outside the ten-day limit when the delay is due to attempts to gain the information through discovery. The defendant is entitled to sufficient details of the charge to allow preparation of the defense and to avoid surprise at trial. United States v. Baker, 262 F. Supp. 657, 673 (D.D.C. 1966).

Because the presumption of innocence implies that the defendant is ignorant of the facts on which the charges are based, the defendant is entitled to seek particulars that assist in understanding the factual allegations. United States v. Tucker, 262 F. Supp. 305, 307 (S.D.N.Y. 1966). Thus, the defendant is entitled at the very least to specification of locations, times, dates, the name of the victim, and how the offense was allegedly committed. See, e.g., Will v. United States, 389 U.S. 90, 101 (1967). Vague terms in the document may be clarified through a bill of particulars. See, e.g., (George) Jones v. United States, 669 A.2d 724, 728 (D.C. 1995).

The court has broad discretion in granting the motion. Will, 389 U.S. at 98-99. Denial is an abuse of discretion if the defendant was surprised at trial or unprepared to meet the allegations, or if the defendant's "substantial rights" were prejudiced. Wong Tai v. United States, 273 U.S. 77, 82 (1927); United States v. Pollack, 534 F.2d 964, 970 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

The government cannot rely on details contained in a bill of particulars to cure an indictment that does not set out the essential elements of the offense. A rule to the contrary would, in effect, allow the prosecution to amend the indictment, which is impermissible. Russell, 369 U.S. at 770.

C. Failure to Protect from Double Jeopardy

The charging document must allege sufficient detail to allow a plea of former jeopardy in the event of a later prosecution. Russell, 369 U.S. at 764. In addition to the essential elements, dates, names, and places are required. A challenge alleging insufficient detail to support a plea of former jeopardy is less likely to prevail if raised after the trial, when the crime charged may be determined by reference to the entire record. Craig v. United States, 490 A.2d 1173, 1177(1985). But see Jackson v. United States, 503 A.2d 1225, 1226-27 (D.C. 1986) (indictment for sex crimes with minors provided adequate notice, even though it did not specify date and time which child-complainants were unable to provide; for the same reasons, the government was unable to provide bill of particulars).

D. Inadequate Articulation of the Essential Elements

The "indictment must accurately reflect the intent of the grand jury and the facts found by the grand jury." Cain v. United States, 532 A.2d 1001, 1004 (D.C. 1987). A defendant may not "be convicted on the basis of facts not found by, and perhaps not even presented to, the grand jury which indicted him." Russell, 369 U.S. at 770. But see Bolanos, 938 A.2d at 683-85 (indictments charging defendants with assault with intent to murder while armed (AWIMWA) were not defective based on the indictments' failure to allege that grand jury had found probable cause to believe there were no mitigating circumstances because the government did not submit evidence of provocation or mitigating circumstances to the grand jury).[3]

The indictments in Russell alleged that in congressional hearings, the defendants refused to answer questions "pertinent to the subject under inquiry." The element of "pertinence" required the grand jury to agree on what subject was "under inquiry." Failure of the indictment to specify the subject made it possible for the prosecutor or the court to make that determination, thereby leaving room for prosecution based on questions pertinent to a subject different from the one the grand jury considered. The indictments' failure to "descend into particulars" violated the defendants' right to be tried only on the specific charges found by a grand jury. Id. at 765.

In Cain, however, a sodomy indictment alleged in "two facially identical counts" that the defendant "committed a certain unnatural and perverted sexual practice" with the named complainant. At trial, the prosecutor was allowed to "explicate the text" by alleging that one count related to the defendant's act of oral sodomy as a principal, while the other related to his aiding and abetting another's acts of both rectal and oral sodomy. The court found no error, holding that these were merely alternative methods to commit the crime, not essential elements of the offense. Cain, 532 A.2d at 1005.

Again, any ambiguities or omissions should be the subjects of a bill of particulars. But see Russell, 369 U.S. at 770 ("a bill of particulars cannot save an invalid indictment").

E. Duplicity and Multiplicity

1. Duplicity

Inclusion of two or more offenses in a single count is called "duplicity" and is prohibited by Rule 8(a). Upon objection, the government must elect one offense on which to proceed. Murray v. United States, 358 A.2d 314, 317 (D.C. 1976). Should it refuse to elect, the remedy is dismissal. United States v. Bradford, 344 A.2d 208, 210 (D.C. 1975).

Duplicitous charging documents threaten the defendant's right to notice of the charges, freedom from double jeopardy, and a unanimous jury verdict. Id. at 211-12.

> [T]he jury deliberations would not only be confused by a duplicitous count but a verdict of guilty would be improper, since a unanimous finding of guilt is required by Super. Ct. Cr. R. 31(a). A general verdict of guilty . . . would not reveal whether the defendant was unanimously found guilty of one crime and innocent of the others or unanimously found guilty of all.

Id. at 212. The Bradford indictment charged both voluntary and involuntary manslaughter in one count. Because these are separate crimes, the court affirmed an order dismissing the indictment. Id. at 218.

[3] The case in Bean v. United States, 606 A.2d 770 (D.C. 1992), had been remanded for vacation of one merging count and resentencing on the other. In redesignating the surviving count, the trial court invaded the authority of the grand jury; the conviction on the redesignated count was again remanded.

Alleging in the conjunctive ("and") different methods by which a single crime may have been committed is not duplicitous. Indeed, to charge the methods in the disjunctive ("or") would render the indictment deficient because it would not reveal what method the grand jury determined was used. Marcus v. United States, 476 A.2d 1134, 1137 (D.C. 1984) (receiving stolen property indictment properly alleged that defendant knew and had cause to believe property was stolen, and jury was properly instructed that government must prove either defendant's knowledge or cause to believe it was stolen); United States v. Miqueli, 349 A.2d 472, 475 (D.C. 1975) (government did not have to elect between conjunctively charged solicitation for prostitution and for lewd and immoral purposes); see also Carr v. United States, 585 A.2d 158, 161 (D.C. 1991) ("[i]t is well-settled that the elements of a charge in an information may be set forth in the conjunctive yet proven in the disjunctive, if that is the extent of the statutory requirement"). Likewise, prosecution under two theories of liability – as a principal or as an aider and abettor – does not render a count duplicitous; either theory, if proven, would show commission of a single crime. Barker v. United States, 373 A.2d 1215, 1219 n.5 (D.C. 1977).

The right to a unanimous verdict does, however, require that the jurors reach a "consensus as to the defendant's course of action," agreeing on "just what a defendant did as a preliminary step to determining whether the defendant is guilty of the crime charged." United States v. Gipson, 553 F.2d 453, 457-58 (5th Cir. 1977); see also Ruth v. United States, 438 A.2d 1256, 1262 (D.C. 1981) (reference to two robberies as predicate of single felony murder count was not duplicitous because language required unanimous finding of both robberies, and separate convictions of both robberies demonstrated that finding).

Other cases addressing duplicity include United States v. Watt, 911 F. Supp. 538, 549-53 (D.D.C. 1995) (no duplicity in perjury and false concealment counts where each count alleged two or more false statements); United States v. Shorter, 809 F.2d 54, 56-58 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (single count alleging tax evasion covering several years not duplicitous where theory is long-term pattern); United States v. Conlon, 661 F.2d 235, 239 (D.C. Cir. 1981) (where indictment treated unlawful conflict of interest as ongoing offense, instruction "narrowing" time period to eight separate dates, one or all of which could serve as basis of conviction, did not render the count duplicitous); United States v. Bolden, 514 F.2d 1301, 1304 n.2 (D.C. Cir. 1975) (single count alleging robbery of two items from one person is not duplicitous).

2. Multiplicity

Charging a single offense in more than one count is multiplicitous; charging two separate offenses arising from a single act is not. Multiplicity poses a threat of dual sentencing for a single offense, Smith v. United States, 295 A.2d 60 (D.C. 1972), as well as increased likelihood of conviction due to the psychological impact of having the jury think the defendant committed several crimes as opposed to only one. United States v. Alexander, 471 F.2d 923, 933 (D.C. Cir. 1972); United States v. Ketchum, 320 F.2d 3, 8 (2d Cir. 1963)

On objection to multiplicitous charging, the trial court may require the government to elect a count on which to proceed, and dismiss the others. United States v. Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp., 344 U.S. 218, 220 (1952);

Legislative intent determines whether an act creates multiple offenses that can be charged in multiple counts: the "unit of prosecution" depends on whether the legislature intended to proscribe an act, a course of conduct, or the result of an act. See also United States v. Anderson, 59 F.3d 1323, 1328 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (single predicate drug trafficking offense does not allow multiple convictions for using or carrying firearm "during and in relation to" offense); United States v. Watt, 911 F. Supp. 538, 547-49 (D.D.C. 1995) (no multiplicity in counts of both perjury and false concealment based on same alleged false statements). Compare Murray, 358 A.2d at 321 n.23 (because negligent homicide statute focuses on consequences – "caus[ing] death" – single auto collision causing multiple deaths generates multiple offenses and allows multiple punishments), with Smith, 295 A.2d at 61 (one threat directed at more than one person is a "single unit of prosecution"), and Alexander, 471 F.2d at 923 (assault is not multiplied by number of people put in fear; focus is on defendant's act). If the legislative intent is unclear, the rule of lenity requires that the statute be construed to create a single unit of prosecution. Ladner v. United States, 358 U.S. 169, 177-178 (1958).

This type of multiplicity is not the same as alleging in separate counts that a single act creates liability under more than one theory. For example, the indictment may allege in separate counts felony and premeditated murder, or voluntary and involuntary manslaughter, based on a single act. Byrd v. United States, 510 A.2d 1035, 1036 (D.C. 1986) (en banc); Bradford, 344 A.2d at 213 n.11. If the defendant is ultimately convicted on more than one count, vacation of all but one of the convictions is required. See Ball v. United States, 470 U.S. 856, 864 (1985). A lesser-included offense may likewise be charged in a separate count. Salim v. United States, 480 A.2d 710, 717 (D.C. 1984).

F. Selective and Vindictive Prosecution

Selective prosecution is a ground for dismissal if the accused "was singled out for prosecution among others similarly situated and . . . the decision to prosecute was improperly motivated." United States v. Mangieri, 694 F.2d 1270, 1273 (D.C. Cir. 1982). Improper motivation is a selection deliberately based on "'an unjustifiable standard, such as race, religion or other arbitrary classification.'" United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 464 (1996) (quoting Oyler v. Boyles, 368 U.S. 448, 456 (1962)). Federov v. United States, 600 A.2d 370 (D.C. 1991) (en banc), discusses in detail the requirements for showing selective prosecution, including the showing necessary to obtain discovery and an evidentiary hearing.

Vindictiveness is any "situation in which the government acts against a defendant in response to the defendant's prior exercise of constitutional or statutory rights." United States v. Meyer, 810 F.2d 1242, 1245 (D.C. Cir. 1987). It may involve institution or reinstitution of a prosecution, or filing of additional charges, usually after the defendant has exercised the right to appeal or to go to trial. Due process forbids even the appearance of vindictiveness, which should be presumed from the filing of additional charges after the defendant asserts a right. United States v. Schiller, 424 A.2d 51, 56-57 (D.C. 1980); Meyer, 810 F.2d at 1245-48. Upon a motion, if the court determines that the prosecutor's actions give rise to a realistic likelihood of vindictiveness, then the government must rebut the presumption with an explanation of its decision. In determining whether the government has met its burden, the court should consider: (1) the nature of the case;

(2) the status of the case; (3) the nature of the right asserted by the defendant; (4) the type of vindictiveness alleged; and (5) the nature of the harm involved. Schiller, 424 A.2d at 56.[4]

In Wynn v. United States, 386 A.2d 695 (D.C. 1978), the trial court dismissed an information for want of prosecution. Several months later, the government filed a new information, charging additional offenses arising from the same incident, but offered no explanation for adding the previously uncharged offenses.

> Because such tactics suggest an improper motive, we think the added charge of which he was convicted . . . should be vacated. . . . The setting lent itself to be viewed as a manifestation of vindictiveness. An actual retaliatory motive need not exist. It is sufficient if the state of the record is such that it might create apprehension on the part of defendants that if they assert their right to a speedy trial there may be retaliation if the occasion presents itself.

Id. at 697-98; cf. Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978) (no impropriety in threat to indict on additional charges if defendant did not accept plea offer); Washington v. United States, 434 A.2d 394 (D.C. 1980) (en banc) (no impropriety in addition of charges due to reevaluation of case, which only coincidentally occurred after plea negotiations broke off).

The remedy may extend to dismissal of the charge originally prosecuted. For example, in Meyer, 200 defendants were originally charged with one offense; an extra charge was added for the 36 defendants who asserted their right to trial. The trial court's finding of vindictiveness was not clearly erroneous, and its decision to dismiss not only the added charges but the entire prosecution was not an abuse of discretion. 810 F.2d at 1248-49. First Amendment and equal protection principles barred the prosecution in Dixon v. District of Columbia, 394 F.2d 966, 970 (D.C. Cir. 1968), where the government filed charges after the defendant filed a misconduct complaint against the police officers involved.

Finally, the conduct of law enforcement officials may be so outrageous that due process principles would bar the government from invoking judicial process to obtain a conviction. United States v. Kelly, 707 F.2d 1460, 1468-69 (D.C. Cir. 1983). Counsel should move for dismissal when, for example, "investigating" officers were overly involved in the defendant's allegedly criminal conduct, or the prosecution has engaged in unethical conduct or has manifested bad faith by suppressing exculpatory material. But see id; United States v. (John) Williams, 504 U.S. 36 (1992) (dismissal of indictment not available remedy where government failed to disclose substantial exculpatory evidence to grand jury).

[4] In Schiller, seventeen defendants were charged in two indictments on allegations arising from a political demonstration. When the trial court granted the defendants' motion to consolidate the indictments, the government returned a superseding indictment of all defendants. The court held that additional charges against each defendant in the new indictment were justified because joinder made possible more allegations based on actions in concert.

2014 Supplement

Simms v. United States*, 41 A.3d 482 (D.C. 2012). Defendant entitled to rebuttable presumption of vindictiveness when the government subsequently decided to add APO charge after it announced that it was ready to try the defendant on the scheduled trial date.

G. Motion to Strike Surplusage

The defendant may move to strike as "surplusage" any unnecessary allegation in the charging document. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 7(d). For example, any names previously used by the defendant will probably appear in the indictment. Usually, the government will agree that the "alias" should not be revealed to the jury. Any oral agreement to that effect should be placed on the record because indictments may be read by the court during jury selection, or by the prosecutor in the opening statement. If the prosecutor does not agree to delete the alias, a motion to strike it should be filed.[5] Counsel should carefully review the charging document for other prejudicial and unnecessary allegations which may be the subject of a Rule 7(d) motion. See, e.g., United States v. Watt, 911 F. Supp. 538, 553-56 (D.D.C. 1995) (denying motion to dismiss four alleged categories of surplusage in lengthy indictment).

File a Motion to Dismiss or for a Bill of Particulars when Charging Document:

- ✓ Does not sufficiently notify the accused of the charges
- ✓ Fails to articulate the elements of each offense
- ✓ Does not protect client from double jeopardy
- ✓ Is duplicitous or multiplicitous
- ✓ Is a product of vindictive prosecution
  - Make a due process challenge when there is evidence that law enforcement action was outrageous (e.g., investigating officers were overly involved in alleged criminal conduct, behaved unethically, or in bad faith suppressed exculpatory evidence)
- ✓ Contains unnecessary allegations

All possible defects should go into the motion to dismiss before going to trial. Obtain judge's procedures for filing a motion as soon as case has been assigned to the calendar.

[5] The alias allegation is not surplusage if it is relevant – for example, to identity. Bailey v. United States, 544 A.2d 289 (D.C. 1988). If the alias is ruled relevant, but the government fails to offer proof of it, counsel should renew the motion to strike and seek an immediate cautionary instruction. United States v. Addonizio, 313 F. Supp. 486, 490-91 (D.N.J. 1970), aff'd, 451 F.2d 49 (3d Cir. 1971). A mistrial is warranted if the unproved alias is sufficiently prejudicial. Owens v. United States, 688 A.2d 399, 405 (D.C. 1996).

III. CHALLENGES DURING TRIAL – AMENDMENT AND VARIANCE

The requirement of indictment in felony cases "precludes the possibility that the defendant could be convicted on the basis of facts not found by, or presented to, the grand jury which indicted him." Scutchings v. United States, 509 A.2d 634, 636 (D.C. 1986); see Wright v. United States, 564 A.2d 734, 738 (D.C. 1989) (convictions reversed because defendant convicted on facts crucially different from facts presented to grand jury). This rule, discussed above in the context of challenges to the facial validity of the indictment, may be violated in one of two related ways during trial – amendment of, or variance from, the indictment.

> An amendment of the indictment occurs when the charging terms of the indictment are altered, either literally or in effect, by prosecutor or court after the grand jury has last passed upon them. A variance occurs when the charging terms of the indictment are left unaltered, but the evidence offered at trial proves facts materially different from those alleged in the indictment.

Gaither v. United States, 413 F.2d 1061, 1071 (D.C. Cir. 1969) (footnotes omitted). Amendment is thus a change in the indictment itself, while variance is a difference between proof at trial and proof at the grand jury stage. A constructive amendment is said to occur when variance is substantial.

There are two types of constructive amendment cases – one is where the trial jury is presented with a factually different offense from that presented to the grand jury (most common), and the other is where the trial jury is presented with a different offense legally understood (rare). Pace v. United States, 705 A.2d 673, 676 (D.C. 1998). "In the case where different facts are alleged to have been presented to the grand jury, the test for constructive amendment is whether the prosecution was relying at trial on a complex of facts distinctly different from that which the grand jury set forth in the indictment, rather than a single set of facts common to both." Id. (quotations omitted); see also Robinson v. United States, 697 A.2d. 787 (D.C. 1997) (convictions reversed where the indictment charged possession of heroin and the trial evidence was of unlawful possession of cocaine); Wooley v. United States, 697 A.2d 777 (D.C. 1997) (same).[6] "In the case where a different offense, legally understood, is alleged to have been presented to the grand jury, the test for constructive amendment is whether the structure of the statute defining the crime and the legal consequences the legislature has attached to different acts indicate that the crime charged in the indictment differs in a legally significant way from the crime of conviction." Id. (quotations omitted).

[6] Other constructive amendment cases include: Stirone v. United States, 361 U.S. 212 (1960) (indictment alleged interference with interstate movement of sand, but the proof at trial showed only interference with the movement of steel); (Oliver W.) Johnson v. United States, 613 A.2d 1381, 1386-87 (D.C. 1992) (constructive amendment was per se reversible where the indictment spelled out one particular manner of forgery ("a falsely made signature") while the evidence at trial showed another (the writing of any part of a check without a signatory's authority)); Joseph v. United States, 597 A.2d 14, 17 (D.C. 1991) (indictment constructively amended where it alleged that Joseph "assaulted another with intent to kill him," but the government presented evidence of assault on one person with intent to kill another). But see, Peay v. United States, 924 A.2d 1023, 1028 (D.C. 2007) (despite single charge of destruction of property in which prosecution presented evidence of two factual scenarios supporting conviction, no constructive amendment occurred because trial court addressed both scenarios in a special unanimity instruction and the government did not rely on a set of facts at odds with express language of indictment).

Objection should be raised to amendment or variance as soon as it appears that the government will attempt to alter the terms of the indictment, or proceed with proof different from that presented to the grand jury. Amendment may become apparent either before or during trial. Variance is most likely to appear after at least some of the witnesses have testified, because only then will the defense have access to witness statements and grand jury transcripts. If it appears that variance exists, counsel immediately should object to further proceedings based on material facts not presented to the grand jury. But see Carter v. United States, 826 A.2d 300 (D.C. 2003) (An inconsistency between indictment and proof does not constitute a constructive amendment because both relied on the same complex of facts. The trial court did not err where variance between indictment and evidence presented at trial was not proven to be prejudicial or damaging to the defense.).

Counsel Should Raise Objections to:

- ✓ Any changes in the indictment (amendment)
- ✓ Proceeds with proof different from that presented to a grand jury (variance)

A. Amendment

An information may be amended, with leave of court, "at any time before verdict or finding if no additional or different offense is charged and if substantial rights of the defendant are not prejudiced." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 7(e); District of Columbia v. Van Nuys, 282 A.2d 550, 551 (D.C. 1971). Eve-of-trial or mid-trial amendments are permissible so long as they do not deprive the defendant of adequate notice, or result in the charging of a different offense. Dyson v. United States, 485 A.2d 194, 197 (D.C. 1984). The "narrowing" of an indictment through substitution of a lesser-included offense just before trial is permissible and does not amount to an amendment or variance. (Frederick) Williams v. United States, 641 A.2d 479, 482 (D.C. 1994).

The substance of an indictment, on the other hand, may not be amended without the grand jury returning a superseding indictment. Russell, 369 U.S. at 770-71; see also Hayward v. United States, 612 A.2d 224, 226-27 (D.C. 1992); Ingram v. United States, 592 A.2d 992, 1005 (D.C. 1991). "If there has been a constructive amendment to an indictment, and the issue has been properly preserved for appeal, per se reversal is required." Peay v. United States, 924 A.2d 1023, 1027 (D.C. 2007) (citing Carter, 826 A.2d at 303 & n.7). However, according to Smith v. United States, 801 A.2d 958 (2002), where no objection made at trial to constructive amendment of indictment, plain error standard of review applies on appeal. Therefore, even assuming that there was a constructive amendment of the defendant's indictment when the jury was instructed on a statutory means of committing aggravated assault different from the one described in the indictment, there was no plain error. The court held that there was no risk that the "fairness, integrity, or public reputation" of the proceedings would be affected where the indictment included a citation that encompassed both subsections of the aggravated assault statute (and therefore both means of committing the crime). Id. at 961; see also (Danny) Johnson v. United States, 812 A.2d 234 (D.C. 2002) (held "plain" error where indictment constructively amended to accept a plea of guilty to robbery rather than the indicted offense of assault with intent to rob, but that error did not affect substantial rights in that the penalty for the two offenses was the same. The court further rejected all claims, including that there was a constructive amendment in the indictment in allowing the defendant to plead guilty as an aider and abettor rather than as a principal to a burglary count). Minor amendments to the form of the indictment, which do not prejudice the defendant, are permissible. The test is "whether a defense under an indictment as it originally stood would be equally available after the amendment is made, and whether any evidence the defendant might have would be equally applicable to the indictment in the one form as in the other." (Oliver R.) Johnson v. United States, 364 A.2d 1198, 1204 (D.C. 1976) (no prejudice from amendment to reflect defendant's true name); see also Hall v. United States, 697 A.2d 1225, 1226-27 (D.C. 1997) (prosecution allowed to amend date after opening argument where defense on notice through discovery of actual date and date on indictment was clerical error); Giles v. United States, 472 A.2d 881, 884 (D.C. 1984) (trial court properly corrected reference in felony murder count to robbery alleged in Count 5, actually set out in Count 4; no prejudice because defense knew throughout pre-trial proceedings that felony murder was based on Count 4 robbery, yet failed to object before appeal).[7]

B. Variance

A variance occurs when the facts proved at trial "materially differ from the facts contained in the indictment, but the essential elements of the offense are the same." (Oliver W.) Johnson, 613 A.2d at 1384-85 (citation omitted); see also Barker v. United States, 373 A.2d 1215, 1219 (D.C. 1977) (variance is "proof at trial . . . based on a different set of factual circumstances than was presented to the grand jury"). Variance can violate the right to notice, implicate double jeopardy guarantees, or surprise the defense at trial. Prejudicial variance is reversible error. Pace, 705 A.2d at 677.

Variance becomes a constructive amendment – and inherently prejudicial – "when 'facts introduced at trial go to an essential element of the offense charged, and the facts are different from the facts that would support the offense charged in the indictment.'" Scutchings, 509 A.2d at 637 (citation omitted). Variance that does not amount to a constructive amendment will not require reversal without a showing of prejudice. Pace, 705 A.2d at 677. Thus, Berger v. District of Columbia, 597 A.2d 407, 410 (D.C. 1991), found no need to reverse where the variance consisted of the prosecutor checking the wrong box on a preprinted information form and the defense failed to show that it was adversely affected. See also Carr v. United States, 585 A.2d 158, 160 (D.C. 1991) (same); Byrd v. United States, 579 A2d 725, 728-29 (D.C. 1990) (citation of wrong statute in indictment did not require reversal where it was clear, based on defense presented, that defendant understood nature of charge).

Conjunctive allegations in a single count do not create a variance when the proof at trial shows the commission of some, but not all, of the alleged acts. United States v. Miller, 471 U.S. 130

[7] Giles, citing Goto v. Lane, 265 U.S. 393 (1924), held that the indictment was not "amended," but changed "to show that the parties construed and understood the indictment in a similar way," 472 A.2d at 884; see also Bolanos v. United States, 718 A.2d 532, 540 (D.C. 1998) (no constructive amendment where indictment charged rape "while armed with a stick and a firearm" and judge instructed jury that appellants could be "armed with" weapons or have had them "readily available").

(1985) (indictment for defrauding insurance company by consenting in advance to purported burglary, then lying to insurer about value of loss, but trial proof related only to false statements about value; no variance because indictment clearly set out offense for which Miller was convicted).

Similarly, an allegation of a particular offense will permit proof at trial of more than one theory of liability (as a principal or aider and abettor) if the same evidence is presented to the grand and petit juries. Barker, 373 A.2d at 1219; see also Ingram v. United States, 592 A.2d 992, 1006-07 (D.C. 1991) (no variance in this case; constructive amendment, however, would occur if government presented a different theory of aiding and abetting to grand jury than to petit jury). Variance occurs, however, between alleged acts as an accessory after the fact and proof of liability as a principal, because the distinction in liability has been legislatively preserved. (McClinton) Williams v. United States, 478 A.2d 1101, 1196 (D.C. 1984); cf. D.C. Code §§ 22-1806 and 22-1805.

If variance occurs, the defense must be prepared to demonstrate the precise nature of the prejudice – that is, the way the defendant was surprised by the trial proof, and the reasons why the defense, prepared on the basis of the allegations in the indictment or matters disclosed through a bill of particulars, cannot meet the new allegations. Byrd, 579 A.2d at 728-29; accord Berger, 597 A.2d at 409-10; Carr, 585 A.2d at 160. A variance is also prejudicial if the defendant is exposed to the risk of another prosecution in contravention of the Double Jeopardy Clause. Peay, 924 A.2d at 1028 (citing Zacarias v. United States, 884 A.2d 83, 87 (D.C. 2005).

Eady v. United States*, 44 A.3d 257 (D.C. 2012). Trial court erred in permitting evidence of defendant's release status and prior conviction to prove sentencing enhancement as charged in the indictment.

Marshall v. United States*, 15 A.3d 699 (D.C. 2011). Trial court did not plainly err in allowing obstruction of justice charge to go to jury on factual theory materially at variance with government's pretrial proffer because defendant made no objection to testimony at issue, including no discussion of a need to investigate or for a continuance, obstruction theory ultimately pursued did not completely diverge from pretrial proffer, and variance was direct result of defendant's trial counsel having elicited pertinent evidence after being made aware of trial court's opinion that evidence already admitted was legally insufficient to support conviction for an obstruction of justice charge.

DOUBLE JEOPARDY

No person "shall . . . be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." U.S. Const. amend. V. This provision creates separate protections against: (1) a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal; (2) a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction; and (3) multiple punishments for the same offense. North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 717 (1969); see also Gary v. United States, 955 A.2d 152, 155 (D.C. 2007) (sentence to both imprisonment and a fine violates Double Jeopardy Clause where statute authorized only imprisonment or fine as alternatives). In some instances, it protects against a second prosecution for the same offense after mistrial. United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978). The Double Jeopardy Clause guarantees only a limited right against multiple punishments and prosecutions for the same offense. Successive prosecutions and multiple punishments are permitted under many circumstances. See generally United States v. DiFrancesco, 449 U.S. 117, 130-39 (1980).

Double Jeopardy Protects Against a Second Prosecution for the Same Offense:

- ✓ After acquittal
- ✓ After conviction
- ✓ Multiple punishments
- ✓ In some instances, after mistrial

I. APPLICATION TO TRIALS

Proceedings that are "essentially criminal": Double jeopardy may bar further prosecution if jeopardy has attached in a previous prosecution for the "same offense." If so, the inquiry focuses on the reason for the new prosecution. The Double Jeopardy Clause applies only to proceedings that are "essentially criminal." Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U.S. 391, 398-99 (1938). It applies to juvenile proceedings, which are indistinguishable from criminal proceedings in terms of "the risk that is traditionally associated with a criminal prosecution." Breed v. Jones, 421 U.S. 519, 528, 531 (1975). Generally, it does not apply to parole, probation, supervised release, or bond revocation hearings, Jones v. United States, 669 A.2d 724, 727 (D.C. 1995); disbarment proceedings, In re Sharp, 674 A.2d 899 (D.C. 1996); but see Johnson v. S.E.C., 87 F.3d 484 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (license suspension constituted punishment for Double Jeopardy purposes); civil commitment proceedings, In re Katz, 638 A.2d 684 (D.C. 1994); civil forfeiture proceedings; United States v. Ursery, 518 U.S. 267 (1996); or actions resulting in civil sanctions, Purcell v. United States, 594 A.2d 527 (D.C. 1991) (Bureau of Traffic Adjudication hearings). But see Dept. of Revenue of Mont. v. Kurth Ranch, 511 U.S. 767, 784 (1994) (a state tax imposed on possession and storage of marijuana, assessed after the state had imposed a criminal penalty for the same conduct, violated the Double Jeopardy Clause).

Test to determine if Civil Statute is "Essentially Criminal": The test for determining whether a nominally civil statute is essentially criminal is two-fold. First, the court examines whether the legislature intended the statute to be civil or criminal. Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 99-100 (1997); United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354, 362 (1994). Second, if the legislative intent was to establish a civil penalty, the court then determines whether the statutory scheme is so punitive either in purpose or effect to negate that intention. Hudson, 522 U.S. at 99. In making this determination, the factors to be considered include: "(1) whether the sanction involves an affirmative disability or restraint; (2) whether it has historically been regarded as a punishment; (3) whether it comes into play only on a finding of scienter; (4) whether its operation will promote the traditional aims of punishment – retribution and deterrence; (5) whether the behavior to which it applies is already a crime; (6) whether an alternative purpose to which it may rationally be connected is assignable for it; and (7) whether it appears excessive in relation to the alternative purpose assigned." Hudson, 522 U.S. at 99-100 (citation and internal quotations omitted).[1]

The Double Jeopardy Clause does not bar prosecutions by different sovereigns, even for the "same offense." See Heath v. Alabama, 474 U.S. 82 (1985) (two states); Abbate v. United States, 359 U.S. 187 (1959) (state and federal courts); Bartkus v. Illinois, 359 U.S. 121 (1959) (same). A person cannot, however, be tried in two jurisdictions of the same sovereign. See Waller v. Florida, 397 U.S. 387 (1970) (municipal court and state court). However, trial in the Superior Court on charges brought by the United States bars a subsequent trial for the same offense in district court, and vice versa. See United States v. Shepard, 515 F.2d 1324 (D.C. Cir. 1975).

A ruling on a pretrial motion to dismiss on double jeopardy grounds is an appealable final order. See Abney v. United States, 431 U.S. 651 (1977); Green v. United States, 584 A.2d 599, 600 (D.C. 1991); Gant v. United States, 467 A.2d 968 (D.C. 1983). If not raised at the appropriate time before trial, the claim may be waived. Towles v. United States, 521 A.2d 651, 655 (D.C. 1987).[2]

Joya v. United States*, 53 A.3d 309 (D.C. 2012). A defendant's waiver of Double Jeopardy protection through successful motion for severance does not amount to waiver of principle that government may not re-litigate an issue resolved in a prior (or simultaneous) trial. See also Jeffers v. United States, 432 U.S. 137 (1977).

[1] Hudson disavowed United States v. Halper, 490 U.S. 435, 448 (1989), which focused on whether the sanction, regardless of whether it was civil or criminal, was so grossly disproportionate to the harm caused as to constitute punishment. Hudson noted that some of the ills at which Halper was directed are addressed by other constitutional protections. For example, the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses protect from sanctions and the Eighth Amendment protects against excessive fines, including forfeitures. Id. at 101.

[2] Waiver may be found in other circumstances. For example, the defendant in Jeffers v. United States, 432 U.S. 137, 152-54 (1977) (plurality opinion), waived a double jeopardy claim by opposing the government's motion to consolidate two indictments.

A. "Attachment" of Jeopardy

The Double Jeopardy Clause applies only when a defendant has previously been placed in jeopardy. Jeopardy does not attach until the defendant is "put to trial before the trier of the facts." Serfass v. United States, 420 U.S. 377, 388 (1975) (citation omitted). In a bench trial, "jeopardy attaches when the court begins to hear evidence." Id.; District of Columbia v. Whitley, 640 A.2d 710, 712-13 (D.C. 1994) (in bench trial, jeopardy does not attach until the first witness has been sworn and has begun testifying); see also Lyles v. United States, 920 A.2d 446, 450-51 (D.C. 2007) (where case is orally dismissed for want of prosecution due to complainant's failure to appear, trial court retained power to rescind oral dismissal that had not yet been formally entered on the docket, as long as there was an absence of undue prejudice to the defendant, when the witness appeared one hour later). In a jury trial, jeopardy attaches when the jury is empanelled and sworn. Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28 (1978); Routh v. United States, 483 A.2d 638, 642 (D.C. 1984).

Prior attachment of jeopardy, however, does not automatically bar a second trial. It means only that "the constitutional policies underpinning the Fifth Amendment's guarantee are implicated at that point in the proceedings." United States v. Jorn, 400 U.S. 470, 480 (1971) (plurality opinion). "[T]he conclusion that jeopardy has attached begins, rather than ends, the inquiry as to whether the Double Jeopardy Clause bars retrial." Illinois v. Somerville, 410 U.S. 458, 467 (1973).

Attachment of Jeopardy:

- ✓ Bench trial: jeopardy attaches when the first witness has been sworn in and begins testifying
- ✓ Jury trial: jeopardy attaches when the jury is empanelled and sworn

B. The "Same Offense"

Blockburger Test: The Double Jeopardy Clause protects only against retrial for the "same offense." Whether offenses are separate or the "same" requires a strict analysis of the statutory elements of each offense and what the government intends to prove in support of each charge.

> [W]here the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not.

Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299, 304 (1932). The Blockburger test "emphasizes the elements of the two crimes." Brown v. Ohio, 432 U.S. 161, 166 (1977). "'[N]otwithstanding a substantial overlap in the proof offered to establish the crimes,'" id. (citation omitted), offenses are not "separate" unless each necessarily includes an element not included in the other.[3]

Lesser Included Offenses: The Blockburger test applies where prosecution for a greater offense follows or precedes prosecution for an included offense. Because the greater offense contains every element of the included offense, prosecution for the lesser offense is barred.[4] In Brown, the defendant was wrongly prosecuted for stealing an automobile after having been convicted of operating the same automobile without the owner's consent (essentially joyriding, a lesser included offense). The elements of the two offenses were identical, except that stealing had an added element of intent to permanently deprive the owner of possession. Therefore, the greater offense was barred by double jeopardy. 432 U.S. at 162-64; see also Harris v. Oklahoma, 433 U.S. 682 (1977) (per curiam) (felony-murder prosecution precluded subsequent prosecution for predicate felony); Payne v. Virginia, 468 U.S. 1062 (1984) (same).[5] But see

[3] Where there are multiple victims as a result of a single act, there may also be an issue as to whether a single offense or multiple offenses have been committed. Ladner v. United States, 358 U.S. 169, 178 (1958), held that a single assaultive act directed at two federal officers is a single offense, finding no evidence that Congress intended "to create multiple offenses from a single act affecting more than one federal officer." See also Bell v. United States, 349 U.S. 81 (1955) (transporting two women in violation of Mann Act was single offense); United States v. Alexander, 471 F.2d 923, 933 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (single act of putting in fear a group of people is single offense because it was collectively directed). Compare Joiner v. United States, 585 A.2d 176 (D.C. 1991) (firing single shot toward group of seven people was one criminal act, not seven), with Speaks v. United States, 959 A.2d 712, 716-17 (D.C. 2008) (single act of operating car in a manner that caused a grave risk of bodily injury to three children in same car warranted three separate convictions for second degree cruelty to children), Gray v. United States, 585 A.2d 164 (D.C. 1991) (firing three shots in direction of three children was three separate crimes), and Williams v. United States, 569 A.2d 97, 104 (D.C. 1989) (offense of manslaughter is determined by number of victims who die as result of defendant's actions, not number of acts causing death). The same question arises when the facts show the commission of one offense rather than two or more. See, e.g., Lennon v. United States, 736 A.2d 208 (D.C. 1999) (defendant who fails to appear for single court proceeding may be convicted of only one Bail Reform Act violations, not one violation for each underlying charge); Nixon v. United States, 730 A.2d 145, 153 (D.C. 1999) (possession of single weapon during single violent act results in single conviction); Morris v. United States, 622 A.2d 1116 (D.C. 1993) (where conviction for assault with deadly weapon merged with attempted armed robbery to become one "crime of violence or dangerous crime," associated crimes of possessing firearm during crime of violence merge to single offense); Bean v. United States, 576 A.2d 187 (D.C. 1990) (carrying knife and sawed-off shotgun is single violation of § 22-3204); Cormier v. United States, 137 A.2d 212 (D.C. 1957) (simultaneously carrying two unlicensed pistols is single offense).

[4] There are exceptions to this rule. Prosecution on the greater offense is not barred where all the events necessary to prove the greater offense have not occurred, or the facts necessary to prove the greater crime are not discovered – despite the exercise of due diligence – before prosecution on the lesser offense. See Diaz v. United States, 223 U.S. 442 (1912) (prosecution for murder not barred despite prior prosecution for assault, where victim did not die until after first prosecution); see also United States v. Jackson, 528 A.2d 1211 (D.C. 1987) (same where defendant had been acquitted of assault with intent to kill complainant who later died).

[5] The Double Jeopardy Clause prohibits dividing a single conspiracy into multiple conspiracies. Braverman v. United States, 317 U.S. 49, 52-54 (1942). Recognizing that the Blockburger test is of "limited value in deciding double jeopardy claims raised with respect to successive conspiracy prosecutions," United States v. MacDougall, 790 F.2d 1135, 1144 (4th Cir. 1986), a number of jurisdictions, including the District of Columbia, have concluded that a "totality of the circumstances" test is preferable. United States v. Gatling, 96 F.3d 1511 (D.C. Cir. 1996); United States v. Liotard, 817 F.2d 1074 (3d Cir. 1987); United States v. Thomas, 759 F.2d 659 (8th Cir. 1985); United States v. Sinito, 723 F.2d 1250 (6th Cir. 1983); United States v. Arbelaez, 719 F.2d 1453 (9th Cir. 1983); United States v. Castro, 629 F.2d 456 (7th Cir. 1980); United States v. Mallah, 503 F.2d 971 (2d Cir. 1974). The test requires consideration of five factors:

Childs v. United States, 760 A.2d 614 (D.C. 2000) (in case where jury hangs on felony murder but convicts on lesser-included offense of armed robbery, retrial on felony murder not barred by Double Jeopardy Clause).

The Blockburger test establishes the exclusive means for determining whether two offenses are "the same offense" for double jeopardy purposes. United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 696 (1993).[6] Dixon's application of the Blockburger test, however, was expansive. Two defendants had been held in criminal contempt for failing to obey court orders requiring them not to commit criminal offenses. When the government sought to prosecute them for the underlying criminal offenses, the defendants moved to dismiss on double jeopardy grounds. A sharply divided Supreme Court held that the protections of the Double Jeopardy Clause applied to non-summary criminal contempt prosecutions, just as in other criminal prosecutions, and looked beyond the statutory definition of contempt to examine the terms of the court orders forming the basis of the contempt convictions. Id. at 697-703.

The Court then applied the Blockburger analysis to the two defendants, with different results. As to Dixon, who was ordered not to commit any criminal offense while on pretrial release, the Court concluded that the underlying offense was "'a species of lesser-included offense.'" Id. at 698 (citation omitted). The second defendant, Foster, had been held in contempt for failing to obey a civil protection order (CPO) directing him not to "assault . . . or in any manner threaten" his estranged wife. The Court held that prosecution for simple assault was jeopardy-barred, but that prosecution for assault with intent to kill (based on an incident for which he had been held in contempt) and for three counts of threats (based on incidents for which he had been acquitted at the contempt trial) were not. As to the charges for which Foster had been acquitted, the Court remanded for resolution of the collateral estoppel issue not previously addressed by the courts below. Id. at 700-703. Counsel should pay careful attention to contempt cases if brought with an underlying case, particularly when deciding whether the government has offered a reasonable plea.

Davidson v. United States*, 48 A.3d 194 (D.C. 2012). Though involuntary manslaughter and negligent homicide are presumptively different offenses under Blockburger elements test, negligent homicide intended to be lesser-included offense of every manslaughter committed in operation of a vehicle. See D.C. Code § 50-2203.02.

> 1) [the] time periods in which the alleged activities of the conspiracy occurred; 2) the statutory offenses charged in the indictments; 3) the places where the alleged activities occurred; 4) the persons acting as coconspirators; and 5) the overt acts or any other descriptions of the offenses charged which indicate the nature and scope of the activities to be prosecuted.

MacDougall, 790 F.2d at 1144.

[6]Dixon overruled Grady v. Corbin, 495 U.S. 508 (1990), which had led that a broader, conduct-based standard should apply to cases involving successive prosecutions.

Haney v. United States*, 999 A.2d 48 (D.C. 2010). Administrative discipline administered by the District of Columbia Department of Corrections does not bar subsequent prosecution for the same offense under the Double Jeopardy Clause because disciplinary regulations are remedial rather than punitive in nature.

Contempt Cases:

- ✓ Double jeopardy applies to non-summary criminal contempt prosecutions
- ✓ Consider the double jeopardy implications when deciding whether the government has offered a reasonable plea

C. Acquittal

Does Double Jeopardy Apply to Acquittals? An acquittal absolutely bars retrial for the same offense and prohibits a government appeal.[7] Ball v. United States, 163 U.S. 662, 671 (1896). The government has had "one fair opportunity" to prove guilt, Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 16 (1978), and the defendant has undergone the ordeal of trial, including the ultimate risk of conviction. "Perhaps the most fundamental rule in the history of double jeopardy jurisprudence has been that '[a] verdict of acquittal . . . could not be reviewed, on error or otherwise, without putting [a defendant] twice in jeopardy, and thereby violating the Constitution.'" United States v. Martin Linen Supply Co., 430 U.S. 564, 571 (1977) (quoting Ball, 163 U.S. at 671). The finality of an acquittal is so basic that retrial is prohibited even if the verdict is based on an erroneous evidentiary ruling that prevents the government from introducing sufficient evidence, Sanabria v. United States, 437 U.S. 54, 68-69 (1978), or some other "egregiously erroneous foundation." Fong Foo v. United States, 369 U.S. 141, 143 (1962);[8] accord Towles v. United States, 521 A.2d 651, 654 (D.C. 1987) (en banc).[9] [7] Of course, whether the subsequent prosecution is for the "same offense" is determined through application of the Blockburger test, discussed above.

[8] The trial court in Fong Foo entered a judgment of acquittal mid-trial because of improper conduct by the district attorney and because it found the government witness incredible. The court of appeals reversed and ordered a retrial, holding that the district court had erred in its rulings and lacked the power to enter their verdict of acquittal. The Supreme Court held that the Double Jeopardy Clause barred appellate review because the district court, however wrongly, had entered a verdict of acquittal.

[9] The defendant in Towles was charged with first-degree felony murder, second-degree murder, and other charges. The jury convicted him of first-degree murder and, upon the judge's direction to enter a verdict on each count, found him not guilty of second-degree murder. At a second trial, an amended indictment charged the offenses of which Towles was convicted, including the first-degree and not the second-degree murder. Without defense objection, the court instructed the jury on the "lesser-included offense" of second-degree murder. The jury could not reach a verdict until after a third trial, in which Towles was acquitted of first-degree murder but convicted of second-degree murder. The Court of Appeals ultimately agreed that the "not guilty" verdict rendered by the first jury would provide a double jeopardy bar to a subsequent prosecution or conviction for second-degree murder, even though the first trial court should have instructed the jury not to return any verdict on the lesser-included offenses once it had convicted of the greater offense. However, the court concluded that counsel's failure to raise the issue until after the verdict was a tactical decision, designed to provide a safety valve against a first-degree murder conviction, and waived the claim. 521 A.2d at 655-56.

Generally, the timing of an acquittal is of no consequence. Thus, retrial is prohibited after a trial court has entered a verdict of acquittal mid-trial, see Fong Foo, 369 U.S. 141, or after discharge of a deadlocked jury, see Martin Linen, 430 U.S. at 573-75.[10] Similarly, the defendant is protected from further jeopardy if denial of a judgment of acquittal for insufficiency of the evidence is reversed on appeal. Burks, 437 U.S. at 16; see Kelly v. United States, 639 A.2d 86, 89 (D.C. 1994) (failure to seek rehearing after division order remanding case did not waive issue of insufficient evidence precluding retrial on double jeopardy grounds). This is true even if the court erroneously removes the decision from the jury. United States v. Tyler, 392 A.2d 511, 514 (D.C. 1978).

Not every acquittal provides a double jeopardy defense to further proceedings. First, jeopardy must have attached. Thus, a pretrial dismissal that would have amounted to an acquittal if entered after trial had begun does not bar retrial. See Serfass, 420 U.S. at 391-92. Furthermore, a judgment of acquittal (or other ruling on a matter of law) entered after a jury returns a verdict of guilty does not preclude a government appeal. If the government prevails on appeal, a retrial is not required; the jury's verdict of guilty is merely reinstated. Carlisle v. United States, 517 U.S. 416, 433 (1996) (holding that a judgment of acquittal entered after the jury's verdict on an untimely motion was beyond the scope of the trial court's power); United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332, 352-53 (1975); United States v. Hubbard, 429 A.2d 1334, 1337 (D.C 1981).[11]

A jury's verdict of "not guilty" is clearly an acquittal.[12] But a trial court's termination of the proceedings in favor of the defendant may not be so easily characterized. "[T]he trial judge's characterization of his own action cannot control the classification of the action." Jorn, 400 U.S. at 478 n.7. Instead, the appellate courts look at the essence of the ruling and consider a defendant acquitted only when > "the ruling of the judge, whatever its label, actually represents a resolution [in the defendant's favor], correct or not, of some or all of the factual elements of the offense charged." Where the court, before the jury returns a verdict, enters a judgment of acquittal pursuant to Fed. Rule Crim. Proc. 29, appeal will be barred only when "it is plain that the District Court . . . evaluated the Government's evidence and determined that it was legally insufficient to sustain a conviction."

Scott, 437 U.S. at 97 (footnote and citations omitted); accord Hudson v. Louisiana, 450 U.S. 40 (1981).

[10] The court may enter a judgment of acquittal before a case is submitted to a jury, after submission but before a verdict, or after a jury is discharged, regardless of whether it has reached a verdict. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 29.

[11] United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82, 100 n.13 (1978), suggested that a trial court could serve both the government's interest in appealing and the defendant's interest in avoiding retrial by waiting until after the jury's verdict to enter a judgment of acquittal. See United States v. Singleton, 702 F.2d 1159 (D.C. Cir. 1983).

[12] When a jury convicts on a lesser-included offense, its silence on the greater offense is regarded as an acquittal. Green v. United States, 355 U.S. 184, 190 (1957); Price v. Georgia, 398 U.S. 323, 326-30 (1970). But see United States v. Allen, 755 A.2d 402 (D.C. 2000) (where jury expressly indicates inability to reach verdict on greater offense, but convicts on lesser included, double jeopardy does not bar retrial on greater offense); Johnson v. United States, 434 A.2d 415 (D.C. 1981) (partial verdict, pending further deliberations, did not trigger double jeopardy because jury not yet discharged).

Acquittals that bar retrial include those based on such affirmative defenses as insanity and entrapment, which, if successful, "necessarily establish the criminal defendant's lack of criminal culpability." Id. at 98 (citation omitted). See, e.g., Tyler, 392 A.2d 511. On the other hand, a judgment of acquittal based on impairment of the defense from pretrial delay is not a resolution of any of the factual elements of the charged offense and does not bar an appeal. Scott, 437 U.S. at 98-99.

Scott also appears to have adopted the rule that the government may appeal any mid-trial termination of a case in favor of the defendant at the defendant's behest, unless that termination is an acquittal. Id. at 101. The Court reasoned that when the defendant asks for termination of the trial, there is no danger that the government, which is "quite willing to continue with its production of evidence to show the defendant [is] guilty," is oppressing the defendant by making repeated attempts to convict. Id. at 96. Rather, said the Court, the defendant's choice deprives the public of its "valued right" to a full chance to convict. Id. at 100 (citing Arizona v. Washington, 434 U.S. 497, 509 (1978)). The Court thus analogized the defendant's request for a dismissal on grounds unrelated to guilt or innocence to a defendant's motion for a mistrial. Id. at 99-100. The defense must therefore consider, just as in mistrial situations, whether to forgo the right to a verdict by seeking a mid-trial dismissal, with possible retrial.

Evans v. Michigan*, 133 S. Ct. 1069 (2013). A mid-trial MJOA granted in error because judge misconstrued the elements of the offense is an acquittal barring retrial under the Double Jeopardy Clause.

Evans v. United States*, 987 A.2d 1138 (D.C. 2010). No double jeopardy violation to retry defendant for felony murder while armed, even though defendant had been found not guilty of predicate felony at first trial but guilty of felony murder while armed, despite inconsistent verdicts, because new trial ordered after parties discovered exhibit excluded from evidence had been submitted to jury.

D. Collateral Estoppel/Issue Preclusion

The double jeopardy bar may also preclude subsequent prosecution for a second offense arising out of the same transaction, if the verdict in the first case resolved an issue of fact that arises in the second. This doctrine of collateral estoppel[13] is set forth in Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436 (1970). In Ashe, several armed men broke into a basement and robbed six poker players. After the defendant was acquitted of robbing one of the players, the state charged him with robbing another. In the second case, the state's evidence was stronger; having been "refined" in light of inadequacies exposed at the first trial, and the defendant was convicted. The Supreme Court adopted the rule of collateral estoppel that where "an issue of ultimate fact has once been determined by a valid and final judgment, that issue cannot again be litigated between the same parties in any future lawsuit." Id. at 443. The only issue in dispute at either trial – whether the defendant was one of the robbers – was determined in his favor at the first trial, and could not be relitigated. The Double Jeopardy Clause was violated when the government had the opportunity to use the first trial as a "dry run" for the second, thus subjecting the defendant to the precise ordeal against which the Clause was intended to prevent. Id. at 447.

In contrast, an acquittal does not preclude introduction of the same complainant's testimony at a subsequent trial based on a separate incident, where the prior acquittal did not determine an ultimate issue present in the subsequent case. Dowling v. United States, 493 U.S. 342, 348 (1990). Dowling declined to extend Ashe "to exclude in all circumstances . . . relevant and probative evidence that is otherwise admissible under the Rules of Evidence simply because it relates to alleged criminal conduct for which a defendant has been acquitted." Id; accord Halicki v. United States, 614 A.2d 499, 505 (D.C. 1992) (jury hung on various armed offenses that defendant was alleged to have aided and abetted, but acquitted on CPWL; evidence of pistol was admissible on retrial). Neither does an acquittal bar consideration of acquitted conduct in determining sentencing. United States v. Watts, 519 U.S. 148, 156 (1997). The reasoning behind this deviation from the collateral estoppel rule is the disparity in the required burden of proof between evidence admissibility at sentencing (preponderance) and evidence required to establish guilt at trial (beyond a reasonable doubt). Id. at 156. Therefore, a jury finding that the government did not establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed a specific act does not conclusively resolve the question of whether the government established that fact by a preponderance of the evidence.

Furthermore, the doctrine of collateral estoppel does not preclude the government from relitigating a suppression motion it lost in a prior suppression hearing in a different case even though the parties and facts underlying the suppression motion were the same. McMillian v. United States, 898 A.2d 922, 936 (D.C. 2006). In McMillian, the government attempted to have admitted a McMillian's statement to detectives where he confessed to two separate sets of homicides. In a previous homicide case involving the same confession, the trial court suppressed the evidence, and the government failed to appeal the ruling. Because the prior suppression of evidence was not a "final judgment," i.e. a verdict, collateral estoppel did not apply, and the government was free to relitigate the suppression motion. Id. at 933-34.

> [A]pplication of the collateral estoppel doctrine requires the concurrence in different proceedings of the three circumstances of (1) a common factual issue necessary to both adjudications, (2) a prior determination of that issue in litigation between the same parties, and (3) a showing that the determination was in favor of the party seeking to raise the estoppel bar.

Copening v. United States, 353 A.2d 305, 309 (D.C. 1976). The party asserting collateral estoppel bears the burden of proof. Id.[14]

[14] Collateral estoppel is grounds for an immediate appeal only if a defendant claims that at a prior jeopardy-attaching proceeding, a fact was determined in such a manner that, if the determination were adopted in the instant proceeding, the double jeopardy clause would foreclose the prosecution. Jones v. United States, 669 A.2d 724, 729 (D.C. 1995).

A general verdict or a partial verdict in a multi-count indictment often leaves unclear the extent to which an issue has been resolved in the defendant's favor.[15] While recognizing that this situation makes a reviewing court's task difficult, the D.C. Court of Appeals stressed in United States v. Felder that, > we must be mindful that Ashe v. Swenson requires us to examine the record, taking into account the pleadings, evidence, instructions, closing argument and the like and conclude whether a "rational jury" could have acquitted based on an issue other than the one the defendant seeks to bar from reconsideration. . . . Likewise, we must not make the defendant's task even more formidable by straining to postulate "hypertechnical and unrealistic grounds on which the . . . [jury could] conceivably have rested" its conclusions.

548 A.2d 57, 67 (D.C. 1988) (citation omitted).

In Felder, the defendant was charged with felony murder while armed, attempted robbery while armed and CPWL. At the first trial, the jury acquitted on the third count, but could not reach a verdict on the first two. The government's theory was that Felder had the pistol in his possession when he committed the other offenses. Felder denied possession of the pistol at any time. He did not contest the government's evidence that the pistol was operable or that he did not have a license for it. Applying a de novo standard of review, the court concluded:

> The single rationally conceivable issue in dispute before the jury was whether [Felder possessed (carried) the pistol at the relevant time]. And the jury by its verdict found that he had not." . . . The collateral estoppel component of the Double Jeopardy Clause prevents the government from relitigating these facts.

Id. at 69 (quoting Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. at 445).

In contrast, Halicki held that an acquittal on a CPWL count did not preclude retrial on other counts, because "the jury's verdict is susceptible to a range of reasonable explanations. This necessarily means that appellant has failed to establish that the verdict constituted a conclusive resolution of a factual question presented at a retrial." 614 A.2d at 502. Similarly in Martin v. United States, 647 A.2d 1135 (D.C. 1994), the court held that a defendant's acquittal for carrying a pistol without a license did not conclusively determine in his favor his intent to aid an assault as required for the collateral estoppel doctrine to apply. Unlike Felder – where the defendant was the alleged gunman – in both Halicki and Martin, the government relied on accomplice liability. In neither Halicki nor Martin did the government argue that either defendant actually possessed a gun, permitting the possible conclusion that the defendants aided and abetted in the underlying crimes without aiding and abetting in the commission of the CPWL offenses.

[15] In Yeager v. United States, supra n. 13, at 2367, the United States Supreme Court held that the fact that the jury failed to reach a verdict on some counts was irrelevant to the issue preclusion/collateral estoppel equation. In other words, "[t]o identify what a jury necessarily determined at trial, courts should scrutinize a jury's decision, not its failures to decide." Id. at 2368.

E. Conviction

Retrial after an unappealed conviction is barred because a conviction is a final judgment. See North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 717 (1969). As a general rule, retrial is permissible only after reversal on an appeal taken by the defendant. Ball, 163 U.S. at 672; Justices of Boston Municipal Court v. Lydon, 466 U.S. 294, 308 (1984); see In re Evans, 450 A.2d 443 (D.C. 1982) (retrial permitted where reversal was due to trial judge's bias). The reasons behind this rule have varied. Some courts have stated that the defendant waives double jeopardy rights by appealing. See cases cited in United States v. Green, 355 U.S. 184, 189 n.8 (1957). Others state that the first jeopardy continues until the conviction becomes final, which occurs after appeal, if there is one. See id. at 189 n.9.

United States v. Tateo, 377 U.S. 463, 466 (1964), expressed a practical rationale considering both the defendant's and society's interests:

> Corresponding to the right of an accused to be given a fair trial is the societal interest in punishing one whose guilt is clear after he has obtained such a trial. It would be a high price indeed for society to pay were every accused granted immunity from punishment because of any defect sufficient to constitute reversible error in the proceedings leading to conviction. From the standpoint of a defendant, it is at least doubtful that appellate courts would be as zealous as they now are in protecting against the effects of improprieties at the trial or pretrial stage if they knew that reversal of a conviction would put the accused irrevocably beyond the reach of further prosecution. In reality, therefore, the practice of retrial serves defendants' rights as well as society's interest. The underlying purpose of permitting retrial is as much furthered by application of the rule to this case as it has been in cases previously decided.

Accord Burks, 437 U.S. at 15; United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332, 343-44 n.11 (1975). Thus, retrial after appeal is permissible even if the sentence has been served. Fitzgerald v. United States, 472 A.2d 52, 54 (D.C. 1984) (the government and society have an interest in entering convictions against those guilty of criminal activity in light of the collateral consequences of a conviction).

No retrial is permitted, however, if the "reviewing court has found the evidence legally insufficient," Burks, 437 U.S. at 18, such that the case "should not have even been submitted to the jury." Id. at 16. In considering whether the evidence is sufficient, an appellate court considers all evidence admitted at trial, including evidence that was erroneously admitted. Lockhart v. Nelson, 488 U.S. 33, 40-42 (1988); Thomas v. United States, 557 A.2d 599 (D.C.

1989) (per curiam). Retrial is also precluded where the trial court grants a motion for a new trial on the ground of insufficient evidence. Hudson v. Louisiana, 450 U.S. 40 (1981).

However, a defendant may be retried if the evidence was sufficient to survive a motion for judgment of acquittal, but a new trial is granted "in the interest of justice." Cf. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 33. See Tibbs v. Florida, 457 U.S. 31, 46-47 (1982).

Guilty pleas have particular implications for double jeopardy issues. For example, Ohio v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 493 (1984), held that a defendant could not, on his own initiative, plead guilty only to lesser included offenses listed separately in an indictment and thereby prevent prosecution on the greater offenses listed in the same indictment. The Court reasoned that, at the time the defendant entered his pleas, he had not been placed in jeopardy regarding the greater offenses, the state had not had more than one opportunity to present its evidence against him, and there had been no implicit acquittal on the greater charges (as when a jury renders a guilty verdict on lesser included offenses after consideration of both the lesser and greater charges). Id. at 501-02.

In addition, a defendant's breach of a plea agreement may result in trial on the charge to which the plea was entered, as well as any charges dismissed as part of the bargain. See Ricketts v. Adamson, 483 U.S. 1 (1987). Finally, entering a guilty plea may bar the double jeopardy claim. See United States v. Broce, 488 U.S. 563 (1989) (by pleading guilty to two conspiracy indictments, defendants conceded separate nature of the conspiracies and relinquished right to a hearing).

2014 Supplement

Evans v. United States*, 987 A.2d 1138 (D.C. 2010). No double jeopardy violation to retry defendant for felony murder while armed, even though defendant had been found not guilty of predicate felony at first trial but guilty of felony murder while armed, despite inconsistent verdicts, because new trial ordered after parties discovered exhibit excluded from evidence had been submitted to jury.

F. Mistrial

In certain circumstances, the Double Jeopardy Clause protects against retrial after a mistrial. See United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978). It preserves "a defendant's 'valued right to have his trial completed by a particular tribunal.'" Crist v. Bretz, 437 U.S. 28, 36 (1978) (quoting Wade v. Hunter, 336 U.S. 684, 689 (1949)). This notion stems from the historical rule "that once banded together a jury should not be discharged until it had completed its solemn task of announcing a verdict." Crist, 437 U.S. at 36. In this context, the Double Jeopardy Clause protects against government overreaching:

> [A] defendant is placed in jeopardy once he is put to trial before a jury so that if the jury is discharged without his consent he cannot be tried again . . . .This prevents a prosecutor or judge from subjecting a defendant to a second > prosecution by discontinuing the trial when it appears that the jury might not convict.

Green, 355 U.S. at 188 (citations omitted). Even apart from deliberately oppressive tactics of a judge or prosecutor, termination of the first trial before verdict can substantially burden a defendant:

> Even if the first trial is not completed, a second prosecution may be grossly unfair. It increases the financial and emotional burden on the accused, prolongs the period in which he is stigmatized by an unresolved accusation of wrongdoing, and may even enhance the risk that an innocent defendant may be convicted. The danger of such unfairness to the defendant exists whenever a trial is aborted before it is completed. Consequently, as a general rule, the prosecutor is entitled to one, and only one, opportunity to require an accused to stand trial.

Nevertheless, while the defendant is entitled to only one trial, society is entitled to "one complete opportunity to convict those who have violated its laws." Scott, 437 U.S. at 100 (quoting Washington, 434 U.S. at 509). Therefore, under limited circumstances, "a defendant's valued right to have his trial completed by a particular tribunal must . . . be subordinated to the public's interest in fair trials designed to end in just judgments." Wade v. Hunter, 336 U.S. at 689. Furthermore, before a defendant can invoke the protection of the Double Jeopardy Clause to bar retrial after a declaration of a mistrial, there must be some event terminating the original jeopardy. Richardson v. United States, 468 U.S. 317, 325 (1984); accord Lydon, 466 U.S. 294; Price v. Georgia, 398 U.S. 323, 329 (1970). The failure of a jury to reach a verdict is not such an event; thus, a mistrial declared sua sponte because of a hung jury does not preclude retrial. Richardson, 468 U.S. at 325. Due to this rationale in the double jeopardy jurisprudence, in cases where the jury hangs on a greater offense but convicts on a lesser-included, the court has declared that the government may retry the defendant on the greater count. United States v. Allen, 755 A.2d 402 (D.C. 2000). The retrial on the greater charge is not considered a successive prosecution for purposes of the Double Jeopardy Clause, but is deemed to be a continuation of the jeopardy that attached in the first trial. Holt v. United States, 805 A.2d 949 (D.C. 2002). Ostensibly, a defendant would have to waive his double jeopardy rights with respect to the lesser-included or risk going to trial solely on the greater charge. Thus, counsel should seriously consider requesting the "acquittal first" jury instruction instead of "reasonable efforts."

A mistrial declared upon defense motion ordinarily will not bar retrial. See Scott, 437 U.S. at 93; see also Nero v. District of Columbia, 936 A.2d 310, 315-16 (D.C. 2007) (retrial not precluded where defense counsel moves for mistrial over objection of defendant since decision to move for mistrial is "within the sound discretion of [defense] counsel"). "[A] motion by the defendant for mistrial is ordinarily assumed to remove any barrier to reprosecution, even if the defendant's motion is necessitated by prosecutorial or judicial error." Jorn, 400 U.S. at 485 (plurality opinion); accord United States v. Dinitz, 424 U.S. 600, 607-10 (1976); Speaks v. United States, 617 A.2d 942, 953 (D.C. 1992); United States v. Harvey, 392 A.2d 1049, 1051 (D.C. 1978); Sedgwick v. Superior Court, 584 F.2d 1044, 1050 (D.C. Cir. 1978). The motion "is deemed to be a deliberate election on [the defendant's] part to forgo his valued right to have his guilt or innocence determined before the first trier of fact." Scott, 437 U.S. at 93.

Implied consent to a mistrial may also remove the double jeopardy bar. The defense in Anderson v. United States, 481 A.2d 1299 (D.C. 1984), made a pretrial request that the defendant be referred to by one name; the government agreed to instruct its witnesses as such. When a prosecution witness used the defendant's alias, counsel did not explicitly request a mistrial and also neither opposed it nor offered alternatives. The trial court declared a mistrial. The court looked at the "totality of the circumstances [and concluded] that the defense [had] acquiesced in the declaration of a mistrial." Id. at 1301.

Double jeopardy bars retrial when the prosecutor intentionally provokes a defense-requested mistrial.

> Prosecutorial conduct that might be viewed as harassment or overreaching, even if sufficient to justify a mistrial on defendant's motion . . . does not bar retrial absent intent on the part of the prosecutor to subvert the protections afforded by the Double Jeopardy Clause. . . . Only where the governmental conduct in question is intended to "goad" the defendant into moving for a mistrial may a defendant raise the bar of double jeopardy to a second trial after having succeeded in aborting the first on his own motion.

Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. 667, 675-76 (1982); see also Coreas v. United States, 585 A.2d 1376 (D.C 1991); Fletcher v. United States, 569 A.2d 597 (D.C. 1990); Pennington v. United States, 471 A.2d 250 (D.C. 1983); Gant v. United States, 467 A.2d 968 (D.C. 1983); Merriweather v. United States, 466 A.2d 853 (D.C. 1983).[16]

Retrial is permissible when, "taking all the circumstances into consideration, there is a manifest necessity for the [mistrial], or the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated." United States v. Perez, 22 U.S. 579, 580 (1824). If the defense objects to a mistrial, the burden is on the prosecution to demonstrate that the mistrial was compelled by "manifest necessity." This is true even where the government also opposes the mistrial. Bailey v. United States, 676 A.2d 461, 465 (D.C. 1996). This burden is a "heavy one," and a "high degree" of necessity is required before the defendant's right to timely resolution of the case is outweighed. Washington, 434 U.S. at 505-06; see Davis v. United States, 629 A.2d 570 (D.C. 1993) (manifest necessity where defense counsel, not government, was responsible for complainant's non-appearance at trial).

If the defense objects to a mistrial, the court must conduct a two-step inquiry. First, it must determine that there is a high degree of necessity to terminate the trial, which overrides the defendant's double jeopardy interests. Douglas v. United States, 488 A.2d 121, 132 (D.C. 1985). Second, the trial judge must then determine whether any alternative measure can alleviate the problem and permit continuation of the trial. Id. In Douglas, the trial court was informed during trial that the defendant had filed a complaint with bar counsel against his attorney for failure to pursue pretrial release. The trial court concluded that bar counsel's inquiry was an adversary proceeding that created a conflict of interest for the attorney. Although the defendant and his attorney stated that they wished to proceed with the trial, the trial court sua sponte declared a mistrial. The Court of Appeals concluded that there was necessity to discontinue the trial, but that the trial court failed to consider the less drastic alternative of a waiver of the right to conflict-free counsel, after the defendant indicated a desire to continue the trial. Because the record did not show that the mistrial was "manifestly necessary," the defendant could not be prosecuted a second time. Id. at 145; see also Sanchez v. United States, 919 A.2d 1148 (D.C. 2007) (where juvenile defendant was improperly charged as adult, trial court declared mistrial despite objection by defense and statute requiring trial court to proceed to verdict; thus, mistrial not supported by manifest necessity and retrial barred by double jeopardy).[17]

[16] Several states have applied a more liberal alternative. See, e.g., State v. Kennedy, 666 P.2d 1316 (Or. 1983) (retrial barred when prosecutor intends, or is indifferent to, resulting mistrial or reversal); Pool v. Superior Court, 677 P.2d 261 (Ariz. 1984) (retrial barred when conduct is intentional, prosecution knows it to be prejudicial, and prosecutor pursues it for an improper purpose, with indifference to significant resulting danger of mistrial or reversal); Commonwealth v. Murchison, 465 N.E.2d 256 (Mass. 1984) (retrial barred where conduct is intended to goad defendant into moving for mistrial or results in such irremediable harm that a fair trial is no longer possible).

Declaring a mistrial over defense objection is to be avoided whenever possible. United States v. Anderson, 509 F.2d 312, 325 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (citations omitted). The trial court "must always temper the decision whether or not to abort the trial by considering the importance to the defendant of being able, once and for all, to conclude his confrontation with society through the verdict of a tribunal he might believe to be favorably disposed to his fate." Washington, 434 U.S. at 514 (quoting Jorn, 400 U.S. at 486). Otherwise, the decision to terminate a trial is discretionary, and is accorded great deference on appeal. See Washington, 434 U.S. at 510-16; Hammond v. United States, 345 A.2d 140 (D.C. 1975); United States v. Mackin, 502 F.2d 429, 437 (D.C. Cir. 1974); United States v. James, 466 F.2d 475, 477 (D.C. Cir. 1972). However, "review is not of the trial judge's stated reasons, however elaborated, for those reasons are but conclusions drawn from the events at trial; rather [the court's] review must proceed from the events at trial." Braxton v. United States, 395 A.2d 759, 769 (D.C. 1978).

Defense consequences of a mistrial: The consequences of a mistrial may or may not be favorable to the defense, depending upon the stage at which the trial is terminated. The defense is perhaps best served by mistrial before presenting its own case because it has had the opportunity to see the prosecution's case-in-chief and to cross-examine the government witnesses under oath. On the other hand, the defense might not seek a mistrial where it appears that weaknesses in the government's case could be cured before retrial or where the defense trial strategy has been revealed. Usually, however, the defense will benefit from a mistrial. Should counsel determine that a mistrial is not advantageous, the objection to a mistrial should be stated clearly on the record. Silence may be interpreted as acquiescence. See Anderson, 481 A.2d at 1301; Sedgwick, 584 F.2d at 1046. Counsel should include the reasons for the objection and why the defense wishes to proceed to verdict. For example, if counsel believes the evidence has gone in well and delay will prejudice the defense and the defendant (due to ongoing stigma, problems with witnesses, and other specified problems), counsel should object and propose alternative remedies (e.g., curative instruction, striking of testimony).

[17] Several cases have found that there was no manifest necessity to declare a mistrial: Vega v. United States, 709 A.2d 1168, 1169 (D.C. 1998) (retrial of defendants was barred because the judge, without first consulting defendants, declared a mistrial when defense counsel failed to appear for closing argument); Routh v. United States, 483 A.2d 638 (D.C. 1984) (trial court failed to explore adequately the degree of necessity for a mistrial after the crime scene evidence technician became ill and unable to testify). By failing to offer persuasive reasons why the witness's testimony was essential, the government failed to demonstrate the requisite manifest necessity); Coleman v. United States, 449 A.2d 327 (D.C. 1982) (no manifest necessity for mistrial as to Coleman merely because Bruton problem resulted in mistrial as to his co-defendants).

If the court grants a mistrial due to prosecutorial bad faith or misconduct, counsel should make that reason clear on the record and file a motion to dismiss the indictment or information on double jeopardy grounds. An evidentiary hearing on the motion may be appropriate. Similarly, counsel should make sure that any judicially imposed acquittal or dismissal reflects a finding that the prosecution's evidence was insufficient as to one or more elements.

A double jeopardy objection to retrial may be waived if not raised before trial under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 12(b). See Towles, 521 A.2d at 655-56. Wesley v. United States, 449 A.2d 282 (D.C. 1982), held that a double jeopardy claim was waived when appellant had not raised the issue at trial or in his appellate brief. (The issue surfaced during oral argument.) But see Ball v. United States, 429 A.2d 1353, 1357 (D.C. 1981) (claim first asserted on appeal); Wesley, 449 A.2d at 285 (Belson, J. concurring). Once denied, a motion to dismiss on double jeopardy grounds is a final order for purposes of interlocutory appeal. Abney v. United States, 431 U.S. 651 (1977).

2014 Supplement

Davidson v. United States*, 48 A.3d 194 (D.C. 2012). Retrial for voluntary manslaughter not barred for defendant convicted of lesser-included offense of negligent homicide after jury could not reach verdict under "reasonable efforts" instruction on original charge of voluntary manslaughter where jury had been instructed at defendant's request to expend only "reasonable efforts" to reach verdict on voluntary manslaughter before moving on to negligent homicide, and where defendant had opportunity to object but remained silent when judge and government failed to make mistrial record.

Should Counsel Determine that a Mistrial is Not Advantageous:

- ✓ Objections should be clearly stated on the record
- ✓ Include reasons for the objection and why defense wishes to proceed to verdict

II. APPLICATION TO SENTENCING

A. Initial Imposition of Sentence – Merger Issues

The Double Jeopardy Clause bars cumulative punishment for a single offense. North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. at 717; Wilson v. United States, 528 A.2d 876, 879 (D.C. 1987). Sentencing courts may "not exceed, by the device of multiple punishments, the limits prescribed by the legislative branch of government, in which lies the substantive power to define crimes and prescribe punishments." Jones v. Thomas, 491 U.S. 376, 381 (1989). The issue arises most often when a single trial results in multiple convictions.

Whether different counts may support separate sentences is a question of legislative intent. See, e.g., Missouri v. Hunter, 459 U.S. 359, 366 (1983); Albernaz v. United States, 450 U.S. 333, 344 (1981). One may be convicted of and sentenced for multiple offenses if the legislature so intended. Peoples v. United States, 640 A.2d 1047, 1059 (D.C. 1994). An explicit legislative pronouncement is controlling. See, e.g., Hunter, 459 U.S. at 368-69 (multiple punishments in single trial for single course of conduct permissible where legislature had made "crystal clear" that it intended multiple punishments). Where explicit legislative guidance is lacking, courts apply the rule of statutory construction set forth in Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. at 304. See, e.g., United States v. Woodward, 469 U.S. 105, 107-08 (1985) (per curiam); Albernaz, 450 U.S. at 336-37.

Under Blockburger, "where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not." 284 U.S. at 304.[18] If the offenses are the "same" under Blockburger, there is a presumption that the legislature does not intend to punish the "same offense" under two different statutes. Whalen v. United States, 445 U.S. 684, 692 (1980). In determining merger issues, the court has adopted the "elements-based" analysis of Blockburger over the "pure fact-based" test. (Lindbergh) Byrd v. United States, 598 A.2d 386 (D.C. 1991) (en banc) (although not technically a lesser-included offense of theft, receiving stolen property is the "functional equivalent" of a lesser-included of theft; therefore, a defendant should not receive consecutive sentences for RSP and UUV convictions).

The clearest example of the Blockburger rule is where a lesser-included offense merges into a greater offense. A "lesser-included" offense is one that consists entirely of some, but not all, of the elements of the greater offense. Sansone v. United States, 380 U.S. 343, 350 (1965). Because the lesser offense does not require proof of any facts not also required to prove the greater, it cannot be the subject of a separate conviction. Blockburger, 284 U.S. at 304. Thus, because second-degree murder is a lesser-included offense of felony murder, Towles v. United States, 521 A.2d 651, 657-58 (D.C. 1987) (en banc), one cannot stand convicted of both for the death of a single victim. Thacker v. United States, 599 A.2d 52, 63 (D.C. 1991).

Likewise, felony murder requires proof of all the elements of the predicate felony; the underlying felony merges with the felony murder. Whalen, 445 U.S. at 693-94; Leasure v. United States, 458 A.2d 726, 730-31 (D.C. 1983); Garris v. United States, 465 A.2d 817, 823 (D.C. 1983) (Garris I). This result occurs even where the underlying felonies were committed against persons other than the decedent. Harling v. United States, 460 A.2d 571, 573 (D.C. 1983). There is no prohibition against multiple convictions or consecutive sentences for premeditated murder and the felony charge that served as the predicate for felony murder, so long as the felony-murder conviction is vacated. Garris v. United States, 491 A.2d 511, 514 (D.C. 1985) (Garris II); Harling, 460 A.2d at 573-74.

[18] Blockburger upheld consecutive sentences arising out of a single sale of narcotics in violation of two separate statutory provisions: one proscribing any sale except in or from the original stamped package and the other proscribing any sale not pursuant to a written order.

Unless the charged crimes "are distinct statutory offenses," the Blockburger test does not apply. (Samuel) Byrd v. United States, 500 A.2d 1376, 1384 (D.C. 1985), as amended and adopted, 510 A.2d 1035 (1986) (en banc). Thus, convictions for both statutory rape and forcible rape cannot stand because "D.C. Code § 22-2801 defines two different means of committing the same offense, [rape,] it is improper to sentence the defendant, either concurrently or consecutively, for both." Brown v. United States, 576 A.2d 731, 733 (D.C. 1990) (convictions for statutory rape and assault with intent to commit forcible rape, a lesser-included offense, cannot stand). Likewise, premeditated and felony murder actually constitute the same offense and merge with respect to a single killing: "deliberate and premeditated malice and . . . killing in the course of the enumerated felonies are but alternate modes of proof" of a single element. (Samuel) Byrd, 500 A.2d at 1384. Under the same analysis, one may not be convicted of two counts of felony murder arising out of a single killing, even though each is predicated on a different underlying felony. Garris I, 465 A.2d at 823; Wright v. United States, 513 A.2d 804, 805 n.1 (D.C. 1986); (David) Johnson v. United States, 883 A.2d 135 (D.C. 2005); see also Morris v. United States, 622 A.2d 1116 (D.C. 1993) (convictions for two counts of PFCV merge if based on same actions).

Examples of Merger: For other examples of application of the merger doctrine, compare Appleton v. United States, 983 A.2d 970 (D.C. 2009) (multiple PFCV charges merge where they arose out of defendant's uninterrupted possession of a single weapon during a single act of violence); Davis v. United States, 641 A.2d 484 (D.C. 1994) (rape while armed merges with carnal knowledge of minor where both stemmed from single assault on single minor); Simms v. United States, 634 A.2d 442 (D.C. 1993) (assault with dangerous weapon merges with armed robbery when assault is committed to effect robbery); and Norris v. United States, 585 A.2d 1372 (D.C. 1991) (same); with McCullough v. United States, 827 A.2d 48 (D.C. 2003) (first-degree murder, obstruction of justice, and conspiracy do not merge); Ginyard v. United States, 816 A.2d 21 (D.C. 2003) (aggravated assault does not merge with assault with intent to murder); Malloy v. United States, 797 A.2d 687 (D.C. 2002); Mack v. United States, 772 A.2d 813 (D.C. 2001) (escape is not a lesser-included offense of APO); Nixon v. United States, 730 A.2d 145, 152 (D.C. 1999) (aggravated assault while armed does not merge with assault with intent to kill while armed); Turner v. United States, 684 A.2d 313 (D.C. 1996) (possession of a prohibited weapon does not merge with possession of a firearm during a crime of violence); Tyree v. United States, 629 A.2d 20 (D.C. 1993) (possession of an unregistered firearm does not merge with CPWL); Thomas v. United States, 602 A.2d 647 (D.C. 1992) (an armed offense does not merge with possession of a firearm during that offense); Robinson v. United States, 608 A.2d 115 (D.C. 1992) (attempted robbery does not merge with conspiracy to commit robbery); Monroe v. United States, 600 A.2d 98 (D.C. 1991) (kidnapping and armed robbery do not merge); and Pounds v. United States, 529 A.2d 791 (D.C. 1987) (rape, carnal knowledge, and incest do not merge). When multiple principal participators are each convicted on multiple counts, the counts will not merge when the count was a separate act committed by a different principal perpetrator with a separate purpose impulse. Brown v. United States, 795 A.2d 56 (D.C. 2002) (defendant's convictions for three counts of rape and three counts of sodomy based on his participation in a "gang rape" do not merge). In Pearsall v. United States, 812 A.2d 953 (D.C. 2002), the court rejected an appeal from a conspiracy conviction on the grounds that it violated Wharton's Rule. Wharton's Rule is an exception to the general principle that both a conspiracy and the substantive offense that is its object are discrete crimes. It applies to offenses like bigamy, adultery, and dueling where the substantive offense is of such a nature as to require necessarily the participation of two people for its commission. The court held that the Rule does not apply to conspiracy to commit armed robbery and attempted armed robbery.

Two Separate Criminal Acts or One? Convictions that arise out of separate incidents do not merge. The test for determining whether there are two separate criminal acts or one single act is the "fork in the road" test:

> If at the scene of the crime the defendant can be said to have realized that he has come to a fork in the road, and nevertheless decides to invade a different interest, then his successive intentions make him subject to cumulative punishment. . . .

Irby v. United States, 390 F.2d 432, 437-38 (D.C. Cir. 1967) (en banc), cited with approval in Owens v. United States, 497 A.2d 1086, 1095 (D.C. 1985); see also Cullen v. United States, 886 A.2d 870, 874-75 (D.C. 2005) (two counts of misdemeanor sexual abuse merge into one where defendant's actions of touching inner thigh and breast of complainant, separated only by a brief interval, were the results of defendant's original intent to engage in sexual contact without consent). Thus, the Court of Appeals has upheld multiple convictions in Hunter v. United States, 980 A.2d 1158, 1163 (D.C. 2009) (two felony threat convictions do not merge where defendant directed one threat to one victim and a second threat to both victims collectively); Jenkins v. United States, 980 A.2d 421, 426-27 (D.C. 2009) (no merger of two counts of misdemeanor sexual abuse when defendant engaged in two acts—penetrating the complainant vaginally with his penis, then with his finger—"different in nature and character" under the statute); Wages v. United States, 952 A.2d 952 (D.C. 2008) (two PFCV convictions do not merge even though shooting of the two victims occurred with the same gun during the same violent episode because the assaults against each victim were distinct and successive, leading the defendant to a "fork in the road" at which he could have desisted form the violence before shooting the second victim); Ellison v. United States, 919 A.2d 612 (D.C. 2007) (two convictions for misdemeanor sexual abuse do not merge where break between completion of vaginal intercourse and repositioning of victim for attempted anal penetration constituted a "fresh impulse," even though duration of sexual encounter was fifteen minutes); Reeves v. United States, 902 A.2d 88 (D.C. 2006) (three PFCV convictions do not merge because each count related to a separate, successive assault stemming from a "fresh impulse"); Baker v. United States, 867 A.2d 988 (D.C. 2005) (two PFCV convictions do not merge under Nixon because the evidence showed a sufficient fork in the road for a fresh impulse under Stevenson); Bailey v. United States, 831 A.2d 973 (D.C. 2003) (two felony murder convictions merge with their respective premeditated murder convictions; however, two convictions of possession of a firearm during a crime of violence do not merge when not predicated on "single violent act"); Sanchez-Rengifo v. United States, 815 A.2d 351 (D.C. 2002) (conviction for three counts of first-degree child sexual abuse while armed and second-degree child sexual abuse while armed did not merge because the offenses were not considered to be part of one continuous course of action); Stevenson v. United States, 760 A.2d 1034 (D.C. 2000) (convictions of armed burglary and armed robbery do not merge because the defendant had an opportunity to reflect – reach a fork in the road – between the commission of the burglary, which was complete upon entry into the store, and the robbery of the clerk); Gardner v. United States, 698 A.2d 990, 1003 (D.C. 1997) (two rape convictions, where evidence showed brief but appreciable period of time and intervening events between separate acts); Spain v. United States, 665 A.2d 658, 660 (D.C. 1995) (no merger of assault with intent to commit carnal knowledge and taking indecent liberties with a minor child where, between offenses, defendant "lured" complainant back after she got off bed and indicated she did not want to play anymore); Allen v. United States, 580 A.2d 653, 657-58 (D.C. 1990) (upholding two drug convictions for acts separated by interval long enough for police car to circle block); Owens, 497 A.2d at 1097 (upholding convictions for assault with intent to rob while armed and ADW where defendant attempted to rob complainant at gunpoint and then shot complainant as complainant tried to flee).

Convictions for crimes involving distinct, identifiable victims do not merge. See Hanna v. United States, 666 A.2d 845, 855 (D.C. 1995) (upholding multiple convictions for kidnapping, robbery, and ADW of separate, named victims); cf. Joiner, 585 A.2d at 178 (only one offense where assaultive act is directed, collectively, at more than one victim).

Counsel should address merger issues at the initial sentencing. To avoid the complications that can arise if some of the convictions are reversed on appeal, however, the Court of Appeals has indicated that trial courts should initially sentence the defendant on all counts and wait to resolve the issue of merger until the appeal is resolved or the time for appeal has passed. Warrick v. United States, 528 A.2d 438, 443 n.6 (D.C. 1987); (Samuel) Byrd, 500 A.2d at 1388-89; Garris II, 491 A.2d 511 (D.C. 1985). Even concurrent sentences are prohibited for merging offenses, because "even a concurrent sentence is an element of punishment because of potential collateral consequences." Doepel v. United States, 434 A.2d 449, 459 (D.C. 1981) (remanding for resentencing where trial court had imposed concurrent sentences for felony murder and underlying rape).

> The separate conviction . . . has potential adverse collateral consequences that may not be ignored. For example, the presence of two convictions on the record may delay the defendant's eligibility for parole or result in an increased sentence under a recidivist statute for a future offense. Moreover, the second conviction may be used to impeach the defendant's credibility and certainly carries the societal stigma accompanying any criminal conviction. Thus, the second conviction, even if it results in no greater sentence, is an impermissible punishment.

Ball v. United States, 470 U.S. 856, 865 (1985) (citations omitted).

If one or more convictions must be vacated on merger grounds, the Court of Appeals will remand the case for resentencing in order to enable the trial court to give effect to its intended sentencing scheme, because "vacating one of the convictions could 'upset an interdependent sentencing structure.'" Malloy v. United States, 483 A.2d 678, 681 (D.C. 1984) (quoting Thorne v. United States, 471 A.2d 247, 249 (D.C. 1983) (per curiam)); see also Catlett v. United States, 545 A.2d 1202, 1218-19 (D.C. 1988); (Samuel) Byrd, 500 A.2d at 1389; Garris, 465 A.2d at 823.

Whether or not an appeal is anticipated, counsel should bring merger issues to the attention of the trial court, which may agree to impose concurrent sentences. After sentencing, merger issues may be raised through a motion to correct an illegal sentence under Rule 35(a), or a motion to vacate under D.C. Code § 23-110. (Samuel) Byrd, 500 A.2d at 1378 n.5.

Where a double jeopardy violation has occurred, counsel should seek an appropriate remedy. If a violation is not rectified until after the defendant has served some or all of an unlawful sentence, principles of double jeopardy may limit any subsequent sentence that might be imposed. The defendant in Ex parte Lange, 85 U.S. 163 (1874), for example, was illegally sentenced to a fine and imprisonment under a statute authorizing a fine or imprisonment; he paid the fine and served part of the prison term before seeking a writ of habeas corpus. The trial court vacated the original sentence and resentenced the defendant to imprisonment. The defendant appealed and the Supreme Court held that he was entitled to release. Because the fine had been paid, imposition of the revised sentence would require the defendant both to pay the fine and to serve a term of incarceration, a result inconsistent with the sentencing statute and the Double Jeopardy Clause. Id. at 168; accord In re Bradley, 318 U.S. 50, 52 (1943) (same result although sentencing court ordered fine returned).

In Jones v. Thomas, 491 U.S. 376 (1989), the defendant received consecutive sentences for felony murder and the underlying attempted robbery, with the sentence for robbery to be served first. The defendant sought post-conviction relief in state court, arguing that the offenses merged. While his petition was pending, the robbery sentence was commuted and fully served. The state court then ruled that the two offenses merged, but rejected Jones' contention that, because he had fully served his robbery sentence and could lawfully have been convicted and sentenced for only one offense, he was entitled to release. The Supreme Court agreed with the state court. It rejected the general proposition suggested in Bradley, that a defendant who is given multiple sentences, only one of which could lawfully have been imposed, and has completed one of the sentences, cannot be further punished. Id. at 386. It held that further punishment is not prohibited as long as one of the sentences is vacated and the defendant receives full credit for time served. Id. at 387. It distinguished Bradley and Lange in that they involved alternative punishments prescribed in a single statute rather than alternative punishments arising from different statutes. Id. at 384.

2014 Supplement

Bailey v. United States*, 10 A.3d 637 (D.C. 2010). Convictions for second-, third- and fourth-degree sexual abuse merge with first-degree sexual abuse.

Two convictions for first-degree sexual abuse do not merge where defendant penetrated victim with both finger and penis because he acted on "fresh impulse" and engaged in two different types of sexual acts.

Ball v. United States*, 26 A.3d 764 (D.C. 2011). Felony APO merges with ADW.

PFCV and felony APO do not merge because PFCV requires use of firearm while felony APO does not, and felony APO requires that defendant knew or should have known victim was police officer.

Blaize v. United States*, 21 A.3d 78 (D.C. 2011). Two PFCV convictions do not merge where initial confrontation between defendant and decedent in which defendant pointed gun at decedent and told him to "stop playing" ended when witness talked with defendant to diffuse situation and defendant put weapon away and then, rather than walking away, defendant turned to decedent, removed gun from waistband, and fired.

Brannon v. United States*, 43 A.3d 936 (D.C. 2012). Period of at least five minutes between defendant's first swing at officer and subsequent kick of officer while in custody constituted an appreciable amount of time for defendant to form a fresh impulse to engage in a separate APO offense.

Bryant v. United States*, 93 A.3d 210 (D.C. 2014). Two PFCV convictions predicated on attempted burglary while armed and ADW merge where there was no more than "a momentary interruption" between first defendant's armed attempt to enter apartment and immediate firing of handgun through door and "no appreciable point" at which second defendant could have reconsidered his actions in providing armed support for first defendant.

Clark v. United States*, 28 A.3d 514 (D.C. 2011). Conviction for both violation of CPO and simple assault did not violate Double Jeopardy Clause where defendant prosecuted for violation of CPO for conduct other than assault (here, returning to complainant's residence when he should have known he was in violation of court order).

Ewing v. United States*, 36 A.3d 839 (D.C. 2012). Two arson convictions for two separate fires do not merge where fires were started at separate times and locations within apartment and where jury could infer that two fires served separate purposes, one to obliterate evidence on the decedent and the other to destroy the apartment.

Fadero v. United States*, 59 A.3d 1239 (D.C. 2013). ADW merges with APOWA (assault on a police officer while armed).

Fox v. United States*, 11 A.3d 1282 (D.C. 2011). Convictions for reckless driving and fleeing from law enforcement officer do not merge as greater and lesser-included offenses where basis for fleeing charge was both reckless driving and property damage.

Graure v. United States*, 18 A.3d 743 (D.C. 2011). Four convictions of ADW do not merge where convictions reflect jury finding that single fire set by defendant in club constituted attempted-battery assault where victims were in path of physical injury by fire set close to front of club and within 15 to 18 feet of victims who had to retreat both from threat of fire and actual flames.

Aggravated assault while armed merges with mayhem while armed.

Hailstock v. United States*, 85 A.3d 1277 (D.C. 2014). Simple assault merges with attempted misdemeanor sexual abuse.

Hammond v. United States*, 77 A.3d 964 (D.C. 2013). Trial court did not err in convicting defendant of two counts of UF because unit of prosecution under the statute is each individual unregistered firearm.

Haney v. United States*, 41 A.3d 1227 (D.C. 2012). Possession of a single weapon during a single violent act may not give rise to multiple PFCV convictions.

Harris v. District of Columbia*, 991 A.2d 1199 (D.C. 2010). One of four convictions for welfare fraud vacated where conviction based on continuing offense of failing to disclose change of address over period of nearly two years and two others based on individual incidents of providing a false address during the same time period.

A person who makes multiple attempts to fraudulently obtain welfare benefits may be convicted on multiple counts.

Conviction for unlawful use of food stamps and welfare fraud do not merge because welfare fraud requires elements of "false statement" or "failure to disclose information," which unlawful use of food stamps does not, and unlawful use of food stamps requires use of either "food stamp coupons or access devices," which welfare fraud does not.

Harrison v. United States*, 76 A.3d 826 (D.C. 2013). Two PFCV convictions do not merge when they arise from two separate crimes against two different victims.

Haye v. United States*, 67 A.3d 1025 (D.C. 2013). Where criminal contempt charge required defendant to stay away from exact same location from which he was barred, convictions for both unlawful entry and criminal contempt violated his double jeopardy rights.

Kaliku v. United States*, 994 A.2d 765 (D.C. 2010). ADW and PFCV merge with armed robbery.

Convictions for threats and kidnapping do not merge because kidnapping does not require proof of the utterance of words, as threats does, and threats does not require some form of seizure or detention, as kidnapping does.

Convictions for kidnapping and sexual assault do not merge, regardless of the purpose of the kidnapping, because kidnapping requires detention or an intent to detain, an element not required for sexual abuse.

King v. United States*, 74 A.3d 678 (D.C. 2013). Two PFCV convictions based on underlying carjacking and armed robbery merge because "effectuated by the same violent act at the same moment" where defendant exited vehicle, pointed gun at victim and said "give that shit up," and then took both victim's money and car keys and immediately drove off with both.

Lester v. United States*, 25 A.3d 867 (D.C. 2011). Armed first-degree premeditated murder and armed first-degree felony murder merge.

Mobley v. United States*, 101 A.3d 406 (D.C. 2014). ADW convictions relating to two officers merge with APOWA convictions relating to same two officers.

Seven PFCV convictions of each co-defendant merge into one for each co-defendant because each possessed single weapon during violent act.

Evidence sufficient to sustain multiple ADW convictions as to multiple officers where defendants fired twenty to thirty shots from Dodge Charger towards front of club where police vehicles were stationed and where reasonable for jurors to infer that defendants knew officers were in vehicles in line of fire.

Trial court's dismissal of APOWA counts because he did not think reasonable fact-finder could conclude that any defendants would be aware of whereabouts of certain officers during transaction did not mandate dismissal of ADW counts involving same officers because officers might still have been in "zone of danger" for purposes of ADW.

Nero v. United States*, 73 A.3d 153 (D.C. 2013). AAWA and ADW merge. See Gathy v. United States, 754 A.2d 912, 919-20 (D.C. 2000).

Mayhem while armed merges with AAWA when against the same victim. See Graure v. United States, 18 A.3d 743, 765 (D.C. 2011).

Felony assault and AAWA merge.

Three convictions for PFCV merge where predicate offenses (ADW, mayhem while armed and AAWA) merge into one and where PFCV convictions arise from defendant's "uninterrupted possession of a single weapon during a single act of violence." Matthews v. United States, 892 A.2d 1100, 1106 (D.C. 2006).

Pelote v. United States*, 21 A.3d 599 (D.C. 2011). Convictions for fleeing from law enforcement officer and reckless driving merge.

Plummer v. United States*, 43 A.3d 260 (D.C. 2012). Deceptive labeling statute, D.C. Code § 22-3214.01, permits multiple convictions and punishments for possession of two kinds of deceptively labeled media at the same time and place.

Robinson v. United States*, 50 A.3d 508 (D.C. 2012).
ADW merges with AAWA.

AWIKWA and AAWA do not merge because aggravated assault requires a showing of serious bodily injury and AWIK requires a showing of specific intent.

Snell v. United States*, 68 A.3d 689 (D.C. 2013). CPWL does not merge with UF.

UA does not merge with unlawful discharge.

Snowden v. United States*, 52 A.3d 858 (D.C. 2012). Double Jeopardy Clause does not prohibit convictions for both PFCV and two predicate armed offenses because armed robbery and AAWA require proof that defendant was "armed with" or had "readily available" a dangerous weapon which need not be a firearm and PFCV requires proof of "possession of a "firearm."

Four convictions for AWIRWA do not merge even though defendant robbed only one individual in group because defendant vicariously liable for actions of second gunman who stood behind the group and moved his gun between "different people."

Sutton v. United States*, 988 A.2d 478 (D.C. 2010). Convictions for RSP and UUV do not merge because UUV requires proof that defendant "[took], use[d], operate[d], or remove[d] or cause[d] to be taken, used, operated, or removed, a motor vehicle," where RSP does not, and RSP requires proof that defendant "b[ought], receive[d], possess[ed], or obtain[ed] control" of stolen property "with [the] intent to deprive another of the right to use the property or a benefit of the property," where UUV does not.

Timms v. United States*, 25 A.3d 29 (D.C. 2011). Two PFCV convictions merge in case where, although defendant fired 12 shots directly at victim during their encounter, defendant did not have "opportunity to reflect" or to "reach a fork in the road" during commission of offense.

Tornero v. United States*, 94 A.3d 1 (D.C. 2014). ADW merges with AAWA.

Vines v. United States*, 70 A.3d 1170 (D.C. 2013) (amended). Two convictions for malicious destruction of property do not merge because each conviction was the result of a separate criminal act against a separate victim.

Walden v. United States*, 19 A.3d 346 (D.C. 2011). Two convictions for PFCV do not merge where defendant made separate "decision" to shoot one victim after forcing two individuals into stairwell of apartment building at gunpoint.

Convictions for conspiracy and first-degree murder not inconsistent where evidence allowed jury to find that defendant conspired with two individuals to assault victim and separately formed intent to kill that victim.

Ward v. United States*, 55 A.3d 840 (D.C. 2012). Multiple PFCV convictions do not merge where defendant separately aimed at and shot victims in different locations.

West v. United States*, 100 A.3d 1076 (D.C. 2014). Convictions for possession of PCP and possession of liquid PCP based on same vial of PCP recovered during search of vehicle merge.

Whylie v. United States*, 98 A.3d 156 (D.C. 2014). Two convictions for felony stalking based on more than 1500 calls made after a no-contact order was issued and during two different periods merge where all calls were made to complainant at her work place and no facts were established that "distinguished in any legally significant way" the calls that were made during those two periods.

B. Subsequent Increases in Sentence[19]

As a general matter, the Double Jeopardy Clause does not limit the court's power to impose a greater sentence after a successful appeal, so long as the defendant is given credit for time served under the original sentence. See Bullington v. Missouri, 451 U.S. 430, 442 (1981); see also North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. at 718-19.[20] The rationale is that when a defendant obtains a reversal on appeal, "the original conviction has been nullified and 'the slate wiped clean.'" Bullington, 451 U.S. at 442 (quoting Pearce, 395 U.S. at 721).[21]

Principles of double jeopardy bar government appeals of sentences unless clearly authorized by statute. See United States v. DiFrancesco, 449 U.S. 117, 132-39 (1980). There is no such statute in this jurisdiction. See D.C. Code § 23-104.

An initial sentence can be increased if necessary to ensure that it is lawful. Bozza v. United States, 330 U.S. 160, 166-67 (1947) (where statute required sentence of imprisonment and fine, double jeopardy did not preclude subsequent addition of fine to initial sentence of imprisonment); cf. Phenis v. United States, 909 A.2d 138 (D.C. 2006) (sentence inconsistent with controlling sentencing scheme is illegal and may be corrected, even if such correction imposes a stiffer sentence than originally imposed); David v. United States, 579 A.2d 1172 (D.C. 1990) (same). Whether a lawful sentence can be increased upon reconsideration is less clear, however. In general, "once a defendant begins serving a sentence, the sentence may not lawfully be increased." Smith v. United States, 687 A.2d 581, 583 (D.C. 1996) (citations omitted). Of course, the court may not impose a new sentence that exceeds the maximum sentence authorized by statute. In determining what is authorized by statute, the judge must take into account whatever punishment the defendant has already received. See, e.g., Ex parte Lange, 85 U.S. 163 (defendant already paid fine, judge could not vacate original sentence and impose term of imprisonment, because statute permitted imposition of fine or imprisonment, but not both).

Sentence enhancement statutes have presented interesting Double Jeopardy claims in cases involving multiple convictions. The Double Jeopardy prohibition does not bar subsequent prosecution for conduct that served as the basis for sentence enhancement for an earlier conviction. Witte v. United States, 515 U.S. 389 (1995). The argument supporting this rule is that "sentencing enhancements do not punish a defendant for crimes of which he was not convicted, but rather increases his sentence because of the manner in which he committed the [19] The Double Jeopardy Clause does not prohibit subsequent reductions in sentence. See United States v. Benz, 282 U.S. 304, 307 (1931).

[20] There is an exception to this rule for sentencing schemes that use a fact-finder, as in some capital sentencing schemes. Principles of double jeopardy bar a subsequent increase, where the initial sentence rests on a determination that the government has failed to prove its entitlement to the greater sentence. See, e.g., Poland v. Arizona, 476 U.S. 147, 155-57 (1986) (Double Jeopardy Clause prohibits imposition of death sentence after jury at original proceeding imposed life sentence); Bullington, 451 U.S. at 442 (same); cf. Boswell v. United States, 511 A.2d 29, 34-35 (D.C. 1986) (Double Jeopardy Clause not violated where trial court abruptly terminates sentencing proceeding without providing government an opportunity to offer evidence).

crime of conviction." Watts, 519 U.S. at 154 (citing Witte, 515 U.S. at 403). Nor does the Double Jeopardy Clause preclude retrial on a prior conviction allegation in a noncapital sentencing proceeding. Monge v. California, 524 U.S. 721 (1998).

As a general rule, an initial sentence in which a defendant has a legitimate expectation of finality cannot be increased. The defendant in United States v. Fogel, 829 F.2d 77 (D.C. Cir. 1987), for example, was originally sentenced to twelve months house arrest, a $5000 fine, $350 in restitution, and voluntary disbarment. After the defendant began serving his sentence, the judge realized that he had made a technical error. The court resentenced the defendant to three to nine years of imprisonment, suspended execution of that sentence, and placed the defendant on three years probation, with one year to be served under the Residential Intensive Probation Program. Id. at 80. The circuit court reversed on double jeopardy grounds, holding that the defendant had a legitimate expectation of finality in the original sentence. The court emphasized that the defendant had already begun serving the initial sentence, that there was no express statutory authorization for increasing the sentence, and that the increase was neither the result of any action on the defendant's part nor necessary to correct the technical defect in the original sentence. (The district court failed to announce that it was suspending imposition of the sentence before sentencing the defendant to probation, a defect that could have been corrected without increasing the severity of the sentence. Id. at 88.) Smith v. United States, 687 A.2d 581 (D.C. 1996), held that the defendant had a legitimate expectation of finality in his sentence despite the fact that it was the product of a mistake of fact. Unless the mistake goes to a court's very authority to order the original sentence, the trial court's mistaken belief about facts surrounding sentencing cannot serve as the basis for increasing a defendant's sentence. Id. On the other hand, the trial court may increase a sentence that has not begun to be served, where it is clear that there has been a mistake or oversight and to conform to the expressed original intent. Francis v. United States, 715 A.2d 894, 902 (D.C. 1998) (affirming upward modification of sentence to take into account presentence credit for time spent in halfway house where court expressly intended appellant to serve a term of imprisonment).

No legitimate finality expectation exists when a sentence is overturned based on a defendant's appeal. See Pearce, 395 U.S. at 720. Nor can there be any such expectation as to sentences imposed under statutory schemes that allow government appeals of sentences, see DiFrancesco, 449 U.S. at 139, in sentences that are unlawful, see Bozza, 330 U.S. at 165-67, or where the sentencing court lacks the authority to issue the sentence, see Smith, 687 A.2d 581. Finally, there is no legitimate expectation in the finality of a sentence of probation. After revocation of probation, a sentencing judge can execute a previously suspended sentence or, where imposition of sentence was suspended, impose any lawful sentence. See Roberts v. United States, 320 U.S. 264, 272-73 (1943).

CHAPTER 10

SENTENCING

"[S]entencing is a critical stage of a criminal trial; to a criminal defendant, perhaps the most important." United States v. Hamid, 531 A.2d 628, 643 (D.C. 1987). It "is the time at which for many defendants the most important service of the entire proceeding can be performed."[1]

> Effective legal representation at sentencing is critical to meeting society's urgent interest in reaching determinations that accurately and fairly build upon the past and honestly attempt to create hope for the future…
>
> The first essential element of effective assistance of counsel is counsel able and willing to advocate fearlessly and effectively…

United States v. Hurt, 543 F.2d 162, 167-68 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Critical decisions such as whether to accept a plea offer depend heavily on potential exposure. Thus, advising clients throughout the case requires a thorough understanding of the potential sentence for each offense, including the statutory limits and all relevant enhancement, mandatory minimum, and credit provisions.

2014 Supplement

Brocksmith v. United States*, 99 A.3d 690 (D.C. 2014). Regardless of whether legislative intent of D.C. Code § 22-1804a(a)(2) envisioned fifteen-year prison term, defendant not entitled to relief from fifteen-year sentence because he did not give court "one reason" to give him a more lenient sentence and suspend a portion of fifteen-year sentence where defendant was already on probation on three other cases at time crime was committed.

Moten v. United States*, 81 A.3d 1274 (D.C. 2013). Trial judge did not err in sentencing defendant for solicitation of prostitution pursuant to D.C. Code § 22-2701 (2009 Supp.), despite the amendment not specifying a penalty for solicitation, where "unambiguous and explicit intent" expressed in legislative history was that penalties for solicitation of prostitution were to remain identical to penalties for engaging in prostitution in 2009 statute.

James v. United States*, 59 A.3d 1233 (D.C. 2013). A mandatory minimum sentence of 30 years imposed upon a juvenile for a premeditated firstdegree execution-style murder of a twelve-year-old rival gang member does not violate the cruel and unusual punishment clause of the Eighth Amendment because the sentencing statute already takes the mitigating qualities of youth into account, limiting the minimum sentence to thirty years for offenders under the age of 18 at the time of their offense, as compared to life imprisonment without opportunity for release for adults.

Ruffin v. United States*, 25 A.3d 1 (D.C. 2011). Exception clause of D.C. Code § 48-904.01(a)(2)(B), which limits sentence for marijuana distribution to 180 days in absence of prior conviction, inapplicable regardless of whether prior conviction classified as felony or misdemeanor.

I. THE SENTENCING PROCESS

A. Judicial Discretion in Sentencing

For most offenses, the sentencing court has broad discretion. As a fundamental sentencing principle, "a judge may appropriately conduct an inquiry broad in scope, largely unlimited either as to the kind of information he may consider, or the source from which it may come." United States v. Tucker, 404 U.S. 443, 446 (1972); Fed. Rule Crim. Proc. 32; see also Coles v. United States, 682 A.2d 167 (D.C. 1996) (sentencing judge has discretion to limit leniency to defendant who refused probation interview and had record of prior convictions). However, the sentencing decision must rest on "reliable information and appropriate considerations." Grant v. United States, 509 A.2d 1147, 1155 (D.C. 1986). A sentence that rests on "improper or inaccurate" information or allegations that are "materially untrue" violates due process. Dorszynski v. United States, 418 U.S. 424, 431 n.7 (1974); Townsend v. Burke, 334 U.S. 736, 741 (1948); see United States v. Campbell, 684 F.2d 141, 152-53 (D.C. Cir. 1982).

So long as the information is sufficiently reliable, it need not have been the subject of a charged offense. See Powers v. United States, 588 A.2d 1166 (D.C. 1991) (uncharged robbery to which evidence sufficiently linked defendant, where uncharged incident was small part of totality of circumstances considered). The information need not have been introduced at trial nor even be admissible at trial. See Williams v. United States, 427 A.2d 901, 904 (D.C. 1980); Caldwell v. United States, 595 A.2d 961, 966 (D.C. 1991). Similarly, the defense can make affirmative use of the latitude allowed at sentencing when investigation uncovers mitigating information that could not be used at trial.

The sentencing court may consider hearsay information; however, the court need not consider all hearsay information provided to it. United States v. Bass, 535 F.2d 110, 120 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (citing Williams v. New York, 337 U.S. 241 (1949)). Due process requires that the judge "may not rely on mistaken information or baseless assumptions and must instead rely only on reliable evidence." Wallace v. United States, 936 A.2d 757, 780 (D.C. 2007) (emphasis in original) (internal quotations omitted); see also Scott v. United States, 419 F.2d 264, 266 (D.C. Cir. 1969). While the court should not place on the defendant the burden of bringing forth evidence or information to rebut hearsay, particularly hearsay from anonymous sources, the court can rely on hearsay that has indicia of reliability and can consider the absence of a denial of the hearsay by the defendant as indicia of reliability. United States v. Weston, 448 F.2d 626 (9th Cir. 1971) (remanding for resentencing where sentencing judge had relied on information of serious criminal conduct alleged by unidentified law enforcement officer and an anonymous informant but defendant had denied the allegations); see also Caldwell v. United States, 595 A.2d 961 (D.C. 1991) (sentence affirmed where judge relied on hearsay about criminal conduct but defendant did not rebut or even deny the conduct); United States v. Bass, 535 F.2d 110 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

PRACTICE TIP:

Defense counsel should prepare to show the unreliability or falsity of harmful hearsay in written submissions, including the presentence report. If the government presents information of questionable reliability during oral allocution, counsel should consider whether to risk highlighting any support for the claim by calling on the government to disclose whether and how the claim has been verified. See, e.g., United States v. Needles, 472 F.2d 652, 658 (2d Cir. 1973); United States ex rel. Brown v. Rundle, 417 F.2d 282, 285 (3d Cir. 1969) (favoring requirement of in-court substantiation of disputed allegations made by prosecutor or probation officer). The defense may request a continuance for investigation, but this course runs the risk of revealing no information to rebut the government's claim. See Caldwell, 595 A.2d at 967.

The court may consider information that may not be used in other contexts – for example, Youth Act convictions that have been set aside. In Barnes v. United States, 529 A.2d 284, 287-89 (D.C. 1987), the court held that rehabilitative purpose of set-aside provision seemed "somewhat hollow" once defendant has acquired new conviction and that one "legitimate" official purpose for which Youth Act records remain viable is to give subsequent sentencing court an accurate account of criminal history. The changes to the Youth Act statute, D.C. Code § 24-906, effective August 5, 2000, explicitly allow the use of set-aside convictions for "determining an appropriate sentence if the person is subsequently convicted of another crime" and for determining second or subsequent convictions for purposes of enhancement. Statements to the presentence report writer, which would be inadmissible on guilt at a retrial, may be considered at sentencing. Butler v. United States, 379 A.2d 948, 950-51 (D.C. 1977) (defendant admitted having been intermediary in drug transactions).

The sentencing court may consider conduct for which the defendant was acquitted at trial; however, the court "may not base the sentence on misinformation of a constitutional magnitude." Greene v. United States, 571 A.2d 218, 220-21 (D.C. 1990) (affirming sentence based on evidence that sentencing court had "attempted to view the evidence from the jury's perspective, giving effect to the entire jury verdict"). Courts have reasoned that an acquittal does not prove the defendant's innocence, merely the absence of proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt. See United States v. Watts, 519 U.S. 148, 155 (1997); United States v. Campbell, 684 F.2d 141, 152 (D.C. Cir. 1982); United States v. Boney, 977 F.2d 624, 636 (D.C. Cir. 1992). However, due process requires that the conduct have been proved at least by a preponderance of the evidence. Watts, 519 U.S. at 157; Boney, 977 F.2d at 636. In Watts, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the circuits diverge on the question of whether clear and convincing evidence of acquitted conduct, as opposed to just a preponderance, is required before the judge can "dramatically increase the sentence." Watts, 519 U.S. at 156. However, Watts is in the federal context interpreting federal statutes and the federal sentencing guidelines system. If faced with a court that is relying on acquitted conduct, counsel may still want to argue that clear and convincing evidence of the conduct is appropriate but counsel should research and be aware of the limitations on the analogy to Watts and the federal system.

The court may consider its conclusion that the defendant lied while testifying at trial. United States v. Grayson, 438 U.S. 41, 55 (1978) (testimony included "willful and material falsehoods"). Counsel should remain alert to possible burdens such sentencing considerations place on the defendant's constitutional right to testify. The fact that a defendant testified but was nevertheless convicted is not enough. Cf. United States v. Montague, 40 F.3d 1251, 1254 (D.C. Cir. 1994) (in the federal system, the court must find the applicability of the guideline perjury enhancement by clear and convincing evidence).

The defendant retains his Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination at sentencing regardless of whether the conviction resulted from a guilty plea or a trial. See Mitchell v. United States, 526 U.S. 314 (1999) (defendant did not waive right to remain silent at sentencing by pleading guilty; error for trial judge to hold silence at sentencing against defendant); Williams v. United States, 293 A.2d 484, 486-87 (D.C. 1972) ("egregious" error for sentencing judge to ask the defendant, who had been convicted after trial, to disclose the source of his narcotics; privilege still applied because defendant, who still had the options of a motion for a new trial, appeal, certiorari and collateral attack, "had not been finally and irrevocably adjudged guilty"). See also, Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981) (privilege violated when statements made during a pretrial psychological examination were used against the defendant at a death penalty hearing; the defendant had not been warned before the interview of his right to remain silent or that any statement he made could be used against him at sentencing); White v. United States, 451 A.2d 848, 851 (D.C. 1982) (absent such warning, statements at pretrial psychiatric examination cannot be used at sentencing hearing); Boswell v. United States, 511 A.2d 29, 32 (D.C. 1986) (the defendant cannot be compelled to make statements that could be used to determine whether prior convictions exist that would trigger enhanced penalties, or penalized for refusing to provide information about prior convictions).
In very unusual circumstances, however, the court may consider refusal to cooperate in the continuing investigation of a crime to which the defendant is linked. Roberts v. United States, 445 U.S. 552 (1980). Roberts, however, was "careful to note the absence of any reason for the defendant's refusal to cooperate" and that the defendant never claimed that he was "unable" to assist the government. United States v. Lemon, 723 F.2d 922, 936 (D.C. Cir. 1983). Roberts also cautioned that "legitimate fears of physical retaliation and self-incrimination" merit "serious consideration" if timely asserted before the sentencing court. 445 U.S. at 559.

United States v. Lemon demonstrates the need to watch for constitutional issues beyond due process. Lemon vacated a sentence and remanded for resentencing because the sentencing judge relied on allegations that the defendant belonged to a religious group connected to illegal activities. The appellate court found insufficient reliable evidence to support the assumption that the defendant intended to assist in the group's illegal activities. Furthermore, reliance on the defendant's alleged religious affiliation infringed his First Amendment rights. 723 F.2d at 942.

It is also imperative that the sentencing judge adhere to the Code for Judicial Conduct which provides that a "judge should not allow family, social, or other relationships to influence judicial conduct or judgment." In Gibson v. United States, 792 A.2d 1059 (D.C. 2002), the Court of Appeals held that the trial judge's remarks at sentencing created an appearance of bias and vacated the sentence. Before imposing the maximum sentence on Gibson, the judge referred to the murder of his grandfather, the lifetime of pain it caused his mother, and the fact that "the life of a black man was thought to be not worth anything, and therefore, nobody was ever punished." Id. at 1065. Similarly, the Code of Judicial Conduct provides that a "judge shall perform judicial duties without bias or prejudice …[and] shall not, in the performance of judicial duties, by words or conduct manifest bias or prejudice, including but not limited to bias or prejudice based upon . . . national origin . . . ." Mejia v. United States, 916 A.2d 900, 902 (D.C. 2007) (reversing conviction and remanding for new trial where judge, after a bench trial, made pre-sentencing comments relating to the defendant's national origin and the practice of marriage of young teenaged girls which could lead an objective observer to doubt the judge's impartiality).

Counsel should also be alert to any indication that the court has considered an ex parte communication. See Belton v. United States, 581 A.2d 1205, 1211-15 (D.C. 1990) (trial court violated ethical obligations by appearing to rely on ex parte communications in sentencing determination). Applying Canon 3(A)(4) and 3(C)(1) of the Code of Judicial Conduct, Foster v. United States, 615 A.2d 213 (D.C. 1992), found error in a sentencing judge initiating ex parte communications with the Parole Board concerning its recommendation on Youth Act sentencing, but found no prejudice because the record did not suggest that the judge's initiation of the communication either biased the judge's opinion or caused the judge to receive information that appellant had no opportunity to challenge. Cf. In re W.T.L., 656 A.2d 1123, 1128-30 (D.C. 1995) (court learned of information inadvertently, appellant was not denied opportunity to challenge it, and it did not appear to have affected court's decision).

Finally, in extreme situations, a sentence may implicate the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277 (1983), concluded that a sentence of life without parole under a recidivist statute was significantly disproportionate to the minor offenses in question, contrary to the Eighth Amendment. In One 1995 Toyota Pick-Up Truck v. District of Columbia, 718 A.2d 558 (D.C. 1998), civil forfeiture of a truck valued at $15,500, under the Safe Streets Forfeiture Act following a guilty plea to sexual solicitation, violated the excessive fines clause of the Eight Amendment. See also Greene v. United States, 571 A.2d 218, 222 (D.C. 1990). Cf. Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957 (1991) (upholding life without parole for possession of large amount of cocaine); Johnson v. United States, 611 A.2d 41, 43 (D.C. 1992) (four-year mandatory minimum sentence for distribution of controlled substance is not cruel and unusual punishment). But see Caldwell, 595 A.2d at 968-72 (remanding for resentencing on contempt charge, where sentence exceeded sentence for criminal conduct underlying finding of contempt); Moore v. United States, 608 A.2d 144, 146-47 (D.C. 1992) (Schwelb, J., concurring, expressing "grave reservations" about constitutionality of 48-year minimum sentence had it rested only on episodes of consensual sex with 15-year-old girl, but not where sentencing court also relied on "indefensible conduct with several other girls").

2014 Supplement

Graure v. United States*, 18 A.3d 743 (D.C. 2011). Sentence of 368 months for multiple convictions of AWIKWA, ADW, mayhem while armed, second-degree burglary, arson and felony destruction of property did not constitute penalty against defendant for exercising his right to trial where sentence was reflection of trial judge's determination that defendant continued at sentencing to blame others for his setting fire to club and to fail to acknowledge grave injuries club employee had sustained in fire.

Johnson v. United States,* 26 A.3d 758 (D.C. 2011). No abuse of discretion to balance rather than accommodate all three subsections of D.C. Code § 24-403.01(a) in sending defendant to adult prison rather than treatment facility where defendant's severe emotional and intellectual disabilities were outweighed by the dangerousness, brutality and number of his offenses.

Lindsey v. United States,* 84 A.3d 50 (D.C. 2014). See, supra, Chapter 6.II.A.

Peterson v. United States,* 997 A.2d 682 (D.C. 2010). No error to impose mandatory minimum sentence of seven years for unarmed carjacking instead of lesser sentence under Youth Act where defendant explicitly agreed as part of plea deal not to seek the Youth Act and where carjacking statute provided no alternative sentencing options to the mandatory minimum.

Thorne v. United States,* 46 A.3d 1085 (D.C. 2012). Pearce violation where trial judge sentenced defendant more severely because he exercised his Sixth Amendment right to confront the government chemist at trial.

Williams v. United States,* 33 A.3d 358 (D.C. 2011). Under the plain meaning of the gun offender statute, D.C. Code §§ 7-2508.04(a) and (c), the entry of an order certifying a defendant as a gun offender is mandatory and not discretionary, and trial court's failure to apprise defendant at sentencing of his duties as a gun offender did not change mandatory nature of requirement.

United States v. Jones,* 744 F.3d 1362 (D.C. Cir. 2014). Sentencing based on facts found by the judge, as opposed to the jury, does not violate the Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury provided the acquitted conduct relied upon is established by a preponderance of the evidence and the sentence imposed does not exceed the statutory maximum for the resulting jury conviction. The sentencing practice is permissible even when consideration of the acquitted conduct multiplies a defendant's sentence severalfold. See Rita v. United States, 551 U.S. 338, 352 (2007) ("This Court's Sixth Amendment cases do not automatically forbid a sentencing court to take account of factual matters not determined by a jury and to increase the sentence in consequence.").

B. The Presentence Investigation

The Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency (CSOSA) gathers information in a presentence investigation (PSI), and submits its report to the court. A PSI must be ordered in every case (except traffic cases) unless the court finds, on the record, that it has enough information to sentence without a report. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(b); Wilson v. United States, 278 A.2d 461 (D.C. 1971); see also Williams, 293 A.2d at 487 (trial court erroneously refused to order report). Because guideline calculations have to be done in every felony case, a judge is likely to order CSOSA to complete at least that part of the PSI report. If a PSI report was done in connection with another case recently enough that pertinent information on the client's background and current community ties would still be current, the judge might choose not to order the rest of the PSI report. Because the guidelines are voluntary, it is possible for the judge to forego ordering even the guidelines calculations section of the PSI report. Counsel might advise a client to waive the investigation and report pursuant to Super. Ct. R. 32(b)(1) if the defendant is charged with a misdemeanor offense, has no record, and stands a very good chance of being placed on probation. A waiver saves the defendant an extra meeting with the probation officer and another trip to court, and allows probation to begin immediately. On the other hand, the client assumes the risk that the court will not act as predicted. Thus counsel should not advise a client to waive the report unless a sentence of probation or "time served" is virtually assured. In any case, the court can order an investigation and report despite the defendant's request to waive that part of the process.

The PSI must include any prior criminal record, and information about the defendant's "characteristics, financial condition[,] and the circumstances affecting the defendant's behavior." Rule 32(b)(2). The reports follow a standard format, covering criminal history (arrests and convictions), family background, employment and military history, substance abuse, and the facts of the current offense.

If a PSI is ordered and the client is on release, the client will be asked to sign a form giving notice of his next court date – the sentencing hearing. This form will also instruct the client where he is to report immediately upon leaving court in order to begin the PSI process. Counsel should accompany the client to this first meeting. It is imperative that the client appears promptly for all appointments. If the defendant is held pending sentencing, CSOSA will conduct the interview at the jail, either in person or over a closed-circuit television system.

Counsel can call CSOSA to find out which officer from the "diagnostic" unit is the PSI writer for the case. The writers generally begin with a review of the probation department's own records, including previous PSIs and supervision files, and court records on pending and previous cases. The writer then interviews the defendant, and seeks verifying sources, such as family and employer telephone numbers. The PSI writer may contact family members, and will contact the prosecutor or review prosecution files.

PRACTICE TIP:

Defense counsel should take the initiative and contact the PSI writer. Most PSI writers will either not contact defense counsel at all or will make only one effort to speak with defense counsel. Defense counsel can offer to assist in connecting the report writer with the client. Particularly in situations where defense counsel knows that the contact information in the bail sheet is inaccurate or out-of-date, assisting the report writer will put defense counsel and the client on better footing with the writer and will make the writer's job easier.

The report writers work under tight deadlines and will likely appreciate any real assistance offered. In addition to offering updated contact information, defense counsel can offer mitigating or sympathetic information about the client that will aid in the report writer's understanding of the client and/or the case. It will be more persuasive to the judge to read any mitigating facts about the client in the PSI report than merely to hear them from defense counsel at the sentencing hearing. Getting the PSI writer to include some mitigating or favorable information in the report could accomplish more at the sentencing than great advocacy from defense counsel alone. Finally, counsel will want to speak with the PSI report writer about the client's criminal history score if the client is to be sentenced on a felony (under DC's voluntary sentencing guidelines), particularly if counsel has information that previous criminal history, either in the bail sheet or in a previous PSI report, was reported inaccurately.

It is particularly important for defense counsel to contact the PSI report writer if the client has pled guilty as a result of a plea offer and the government's proffer was modified as part of the plea agreement. The PSI writer will likely use the narrative of the crime as reported in the PD 163. If your client has pled guilty to a different or modified set of events, then make every effort to have that version of events be the only version reported in the PSI report. Not only do you want the judge to read the same event facts in the PSI report that the judge heard at the plea hearing, but the event described in the PSI report is the only version of the event that the Bureau of Prisons, who will decide your client's security classification, and the U.S. Parole Commission, who might have to decide in the future whether to revoke your client's supervised release, will ever see. In addition, if your client is convicted of another charge in the future, his criminal history score (under DC's voluntary sentencing guidelines) may depend on how the events for which he was convicted were described in the PSI report. For all of these reasons, it is important to be mindful of how the crime is described in the PSI report and it is defense counsel's responsibility to ensure that the event reported is consistent with the guilty plea.

PRACTICE TIP:

One way to provide the PSI writer with the narrative is to email the proffer to the writer while cc-ing the prosecutor assigned to the case.

Counsel must alert the client to the details of the PSI process, and prepare the client to avoid common mistakes. While seemingly trivial, clients should be reminded to appear promptly for all appointments. Defense counsel should explain to the client that the report writer is unlikely to recommend probation for an individual who gives the appearance of being unable to keep appointments. Speaking with the PSI writer is tantamount to speaking directly with the judge. Information provided by the client will be verified through any available source, including court records. The report writer will ask questions about the "defendant's version" of the case, and report it either verbatim or with editorial comment. A defendant who pled guilty, but reports to the probation officer a version inconsistent with the account at the plea hearing, risks a challenge from the court and possible vacation of the plea.[2] To avoid these problems, the

[2] This course may be based on a concern that the plea was not completely voluntary. At the very least, the court will be unimpressed by the defendant's unwillingness to acknowledge guilt after electing to plead. Some judges place the defendant under oath at the time of the plea, which may lead to a perjury charge if the versions offered to the judge and the probation officer are inconsistent. A conflict between the plea version and the PSI account may also client should understand the importance of being as candid with the PSI report writer as the client was with the judge at the plea proceeding.

If the conviction follows a trial, counsel and the client must make a tactical decision about whether to discuss the case with the PSI report writer. Upon any retrial, admission of the defendant's statements to CSOSA during the presentence investigation would constitute "error of the clearest kind." Gregg v. United States, 394 U.S. 489, 492 (1969), quoted in Warren v. United States, 436 A.2d 821, 841 (D.C. 1981). However, a court may one day conceivably find such statements admissible to impeach or rebut the defendant's testimony at a retrial. If the possibility of retrial is minimal, the client may choose to seek whatever sentencing benefits can be gained from acknowledging guilt as a step toward rehabilitation. Of course, statements contradicting the client's own testimony at trial may carry the further implication of perjury.

Because the PSI plays a critical role in both the immediate sentencing decision and later decisions by the USPC, counsel should contact the PSI report writer promptly to offer information balancing the point of view represented by the court files and the prosecutor. Counsel can provide much needed assistance by supplying background information about the client or the case, suggesting further contacts for verification, and relating any referrals counsel has made for the client. Such information may help the report writer see the client as a good candidate for community supervision. Counsel can also alert the report writer to errors in the court records or previous reports, and correct factual inaccuracies before they appear in the current report. Counsel should pay particular attention to the accuracy of prior convictions and their corresponding dispositions from other jurisdictions as such information will matter greatly to the guidelines calculations (for felonies) and will likely matter to the sentencing judge in all cases – reports of such conviction information from other jurisdictions are notoriously unreliable.

The court may disclose the PSI (in whole or in part) to the defense and the government, but cannot disclose it to one and not the other. D.C. Code § 23-103(a); Rule 32(b)(3)(B), (c). Most judges give each party a copy. If a copy is not provided, the court must permit the defendant or counsel to review the report on request, unless disclosure of information in the report would result in harm to the defendant (e.g., a diagnostic opinion that would disrupt rehabilitation) or others (e.g., confidential sources). Rule 32(b)(3)(A). The court must provide a summary of any factual information it has withheld and on which it relies, and give the defense an opportunity to comment thereon. Rule 32(b)(3)(B).

PRACTICE TIP:

Counsel should ask that the court order production of the report several days before the sentencing date so that counsel can review it, discuss it with the client, and prepare a responsive allocution. Counsel should contact chambers to request a copy of the report, which will not be placed in the court jacket but will be sent to the chambers of the sentencing judge. If the report arrives in chambers late, counsel should not hesitate to seek a brief continuance rather than proceed on a cursory reading of the report.

When the court believes a report is inadequate, it can conduct an evidentiary hearing to develop additional relevant information. Warren v. United States, 310 A.2d 228 (D.C. 1973); cf. Holt v. United States, 486 A.2d 705, 708 (D.C. 1985) (PSI prepared for misdemeanor case, two months before felony sentencing, not inadequate where it complied with Rule 32 and sentencing judge presided at trial). The court may also permit the defendant to introduce evidence ''relating to any alleged factual inaccuracy'' in the PSI. Rule 32(c)(1).

Indeed, counsel must seek to correct any errors in the report – on the record – before sentence is imposed, to ensure that the sentence rests on accurate information. Counsel should also ensure that the report itself is corrected and that corrected copies are forwarded to CSOSA, which will rely on this report in the event it must prepare other reports for this client in the future, and the DOC and BOP, which will calculate the security classification of the client based on the information in the report. Uncorrected errors will reappear in subsequent reports, which often merely restate background information. Furthermore, the USPC relies on the presentence report for information about the client and the crime for which he was convicted when determining whether to revoke supervised release and how much revocation time to impose. It may be very difficult to prove and correct the error years later when the defendant might face revocation or sentencing on a new charge.

C. The Defense

Counsel's understanding of sentencing practices informs the handling of the case from the day of appointment. While initiating the attorney-client relationship by detailing the likely sentencing options may be counter-productive, even the client who steadfastly maintains innocence and an intention to go to trial must be kept informed about the "exposure" that is risked. A full explanation of sentencing alternatives should be a major part of any discussion of a plea offer. Although it is possible in this jurisdiction to bargain for a specific sentence, binding on the court, this is rarely an option[3]; thus, the primary purpose of most plea bargains is to reduce exposure to incarceration. After a conviction, whether by plea or trial, counsel must continue to advise the client about sentencing alternatives. See Gaston v. United States, 535 A.2d 893, 898-99 (D.C. 1988) (ineffective assistance in failing to advise defendant of mandatory minimum sentence).

The ABA prescribes minimum duties for counsel in preparing for sentencing. Defense counsel must:

- become familiar with all available sentencing alternatives, including the practical consequences of each, and with community or other facilities that may be of assistance in devising an appropriate sentencing plan;

- investigate the particular judge's sentencing practices;

[3] See Super. Ct. Crim. R. 11(e)(1)(C). The Superior Court Criminal Rules have been modified to allow for sentencing bargaining binding on the court. The United States Attorney's Office rarely offers this type of plea, however.

- fully explain to the client the "consequences of the various dispositions available," as well as "the nature of the presentence investigation process, [] in particular the significance of statements made by the accused" during that investigation;

- seek to verify all information contained in the presentence report, and "be prepared to supplement or challenge it if necessary";

- "present to the court any ground which will assist in reaching a proper disposition favorable to the accused," including any favorable information not contained in the presentence report;

- "in an appropriate case be prepared to suggest a program of rehabilitation based on the lawyer's exploration of employment, educational and other opportunities made available by community services"; and

- "alert the accused to the right of allocution . . . and to the possible dangers of making a statement that might tend to prejudice an appeal."

ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, 4-8.1 (The Defense Function) (3d ed. 1993). Useful discussions of counsel's responsibilities at sentencing (including discussion of the ABA Standards) may be found in Oesby v. United States, 398 A.2d 1, 6-7 (D.C. 1979); United States v. Green, 680 F.2d 183 at 191-205 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (Bazelon, J., dissenting); and United States v. Pinkney, 551 F.2d 1241, 1248-51 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

Counsel should begin preparing for allocution well before the sentencing hearing. Indeed, counsel can often initiate therapeutic or diagnostic referrals before the case has even been resolved by plea or trial.[4] A client with an established record of success in a drug treatment program, for instance, stands out from the crowd of defendants who promise to abstain from drug use as a good prospect for probation.

In devising an individually tailored rehabilitative program, counsel may consult with the Offender Rehabilitation Division of PDS (ORD). Through "Duty Day" staffing, ORD provides daily weekday consultations to PDS and CJA attorneys. Counsel should call the main PDS phone number (202-628-1200) and request the ORD staff person on duty. Typical consultations include sentencing recommendation assessments and referrals to substance abuse and other mental health treatment, employment and vocational training, medical care, and community service placements and referrals to contract mental health experts (e.g. psychologists, psychiatrists). ORD also provides Youth Rehabilitation Act Studies in lieu of the client's detention or confinement by the court for such evaluative purposes; ORD Youth Act Studies are the options for those in halfway houses and in the community. Assigned counsel is responsible to ensure all payments to contract experts through the courts. ORD may work with assigned counsel to prepare an individualized sentencing plan. For further information, visit the Offender Rehabilitation tab on the www.pdsdc.org website or call ORD (202) 628-1200. Except for a Duty Day call ORD services are only provided in cases that are not in conflict with PDS representation. Counsel, of course, remains responsible for written and oral allocution, and should not delegate legal obligations to ORD or any other assistant. If the CJA case is a conflict with a PDS case, ORD will not be able to provide a report at sentencing nor prepare a Youth Act Study. However, the CJA attorney may still contact the Chief of ORD, who may be able to provide a referral for these services.

[4] When making pre-conviction referrals for treatment or evaluation, counsel should be aware of limitations on, and waivers of, the physician-patient privilege, particularly in instances such as therapy for certain sex offenders which require detailed accounts of the offender's history.

Counsel may also seek other court resources for expert assistance at sentencing. Judges and probation officers can use psychologists and psychiatrists "to assist them in carrying out their duties." D.C. Code § 24-306. With a court order, a mental examination to provide information for sentencing can be performed by Forensic Legal Services (879-1032). Failure to grant a requested psychiatric exam may be an abuse of discretion, particularly if there is a question about competence. See Leach v. United States, 334 F.2d 945, 948-51 (D.C. Cir. 1964) (mental examinations can be ordered under § 24-306 or § 24-501(a), relating to competence determinations).

Both counsel and the defendant must be permitted to speak, or "allocute," before sentencing:

> The court also prior to imposing sentence shall afford counsel an opportunity to speak on behalf of the defendant and shall address the defendant personally and ask him if he wishes to make a statement in his own behalf and to present any information in mitigation of punishment.

D.C. Code § 23-103(a); see Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(c)(1); Warrick v. United States, 551 A.2d 1332 (D.C. 1988); Fletcher v. United States, 524 A.2d 40, 41 n.1 (D.C. 1987); Grant, 509 A.2d at 1156 n.16.

In virtually every case, counsel's allocution should begin before the hearing, in the form of a letter or memorandum in aid of sentencing.[5] At a minimum, the written allocution should include relevant social information to support the requested sentence. A letter can address important sentencing issues thoughtfully and comprehensively, meet specific issues directly, anticipate and defuse the government's likely arguments, address the basic purposes of sentencing – punishment and rehabilitation of the offender, protection of the community, and general and specific deterrence – and suggest and analyze sentencing alternatives. It can respond, clarify or correct information presented in the PSI, which should be reviewed before final preparation of the written allocution. Finally, the written allocution can present the client's most sympathetic personal traits and distinguish this client from the many who appear before the court with similar charges.

[5] Whether counsel delivers a letter to chambers or files a memorandum with the Clerk's office and delivers a courtesy copy, counsel must be sure to serve copies on the prosecution so as to avoid ex parte contacts with the court. "Such information as [either party] may present shall at all times be subject to the applicable rules of mutual discovery." D.C. Code § 23-103(a); see Grant, 509 A.2d at 1155 n.12; Quarles v. United States, 349 A.2d 690, 693-94 (D.C. 1975).

Family and community members – teachers, clergy, and employers – can assist the court in arriving at a more complete picture of the client. Because the court is not required to allow such testimony, counsel should anticipate presenting it through a proffer or letters. Letters may be submitted directly to the court or through counsel. Having the letters submitted to counsel may be more helpful, as counsel can glean useful information that may be buried and go unnoticed by the court, and tie together any common themes. The letters should reveal that the writer is aware of the conviction and is nonetheless willing to vouch for the defendant. Even if family and supporters do not allocute orally, their presence in court may be helpful.

The defendant must be present at the hearing and have the opportunity to speak, customarily after counsel.[6] Counsel and the client should prepare carefully to make succinct, realistic statements. Both should avoid clichés and minimization of the offense. Counsel should inform the client of his opportunity to speak so that the client can prepare. Because the client may be very nervous about addressing the court and particularly about speaking extemporaneously, counsel might suggest that client write a statement that client could read to the judge. (If client has literacy problems, counsel should offer to "take dictation" and/or read the client's statement if necessary and desired.) Counsel, of course, bears the responsibility of presenting the client in the most favorable light; the client's own statement should be used as a brief chance to connect directly with the court. "[C]ounsel 'is often better able than defendant himself to bring before the court statements concerning defendant, his prior record, his family, his environment, and facts germane to the mitigation of his punishment.'" O'Dell v. United States, 221 A.2d 443, 444 (D.C. 1966) (citation omitted).[7]

Elhalaby v. United States*, 999 A.2d 912 (D.C. 2010). Rule 32(c)(1) requiring court to provide defendant an opportunity to allocute at original sentencing did not apply to defendant's probation revocation hearing where sentence imposed was a modification of original sentence and not a new sentence entirely, and thus trial court did not plainly err in failing to invite defendant to allocute at his probation revocation hearing.

[6] These fundamental rights flow from the Due Process Clause, and ordinarily pose no issue in superior court. In Warrick, however, the trial court imposed a new sentence after remand from the court of appeals ordering it to vacate one burglary conviction (based on intent to assault) and reinstate another (based on intent to steal). It carried out these instructions by completing the paperwork in chambers, without convening a hearing. The court of appeals held that the resentencing was not merely a "housekeeping" chore because Warrick had "never previously been sentenced on the count that 'stuck'," which was arguably less serious than the original, and the right to point this out was a "meaningful one" that required the defendant's presence. 551 A.2d at 1334-35. There is no due process right to presence or allocution where correction of sentence would not affect the total time to be served, Bennett v. United States, 620 A.2d 1342, 1345-46 (D.C. 1993), or where a previously imposed sentence takes effect upon revocation of probation, Applewhite v. United States, 614 A.2d 888, 891 (D.C. 1992); see also Mooney v. United States, 938 A.2d 710 (D.C. 2007) (not an abuse of discretion not to have defendant present at resentencing hearing to correct illegal sentence where trial judge had no discretion other than to impose a mandatory minimum sentence for felony murder).

[7] United States v. Hamid, 531 A.2d 628 (D.C. 1987), ruled that the court's lack of knowledge about certain key facts may allow later resentencing. The trial court had found that the defendant and counsel were under duress at the time of sentencing and therefore unable to present mitigating facts, and granted the extreme writ of error coram nobis. The facts of Hamid were unique; counsel cannot rely on such a collateral attack, but must present mitigation at the initial sentencing.

D. The Prosecution

1. The Government's Allocution

The government is also entitled to allocute. D.C. Code § 23-103(a); Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(c)(1); Quarles, 349 A.2d at 694 (right is not conditioned on exercise of defendant's right). An agreement not to allocute at sentencing, as part of a bargain, will be strictly enforced. Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971). Agreements that fall short of a full waiver of allocution – such as an agreement not to oppose a specific sentence or a term of probation with certain conditions – should be drawn carefully and stated on the record when the plea is taken. If the government fails to abide scrupulously by such an agreement, the defendant is entitled either to withdraw the plea or to be sentenced by a different judge. Id. at 262-63; White v. United States, 425 A.2d 616, 620 (D.C. 1980); cf. Braxton v. United States, 328 A.2d 385, 387-88 (D.C. 1974) (promise to waive allocution at initial sentencing does not implicitly waive allocution on motion to reduce sentence).

2014 Supplement

Clark v. United States*, 51 A.3d 1266 (D.C. 2012). See, supra, Chapter 6.I.B.

2. The Victim Impact Statement

Victims have the "right" to submit a written victim impact statements prior to the imposition of sentence. D.C. Code § 23-1904(b). The statements may contain information concerning "any emotional, psychological, financial, or physical harm done to or loss suffered by the victim." D.C. Code § 23-1904(b). But see Collins v. United States, 631 A.2d 48, 50-51 (D.C. 1993) (statute does not limit information sentencing court can consider). The court "shall" consider any written victim impact statement submitted in accordance with D.C. Code § 23-1904 and the impact statement must be included in the pre-sentence report. See D.C. Code § 23-1904(c). In addition to filing a written statement, a crime victim has the "right" to make a statement at the defendant's sentencing; however the absence from the sentencing of the victim does not preclude the court from proceeding with the hearing. D.C. Code § 23-1904(e). A "victim" is any "individual who or entity which has suffered direct physical, emotional or pecuniary harm" as a result of or while trying to prevent any felony or violent misdemeanor, while helping another victim, or while helping to capture a perpetrator or prevent the commission of a crime. § 23-1905(2)(A). D.C. Code § 23-1904(d) also grants victims the right to attend parole, post-conviction and record-sealing hearings. The victim may submit in writing an opinion on whether parole should be granted and may make a statement at the defendant's record-sealing hearing. D.C. Code § 23-1904(e).

II. SENTENCING PROVISIONS

A. Introduction – Changes In Sentencing Laws

As of August 5th, 2000, parole was abolished in the District of Columbia.[8] All offenses committed on or after August 5, 2000 are subject to the determinate sentencing system.[9] Because of the Ex Post Facto Clause of the U.S. Constitution, parole cannot be abolished retroactively. Thus, all offenses committed before midnight August 5, 2000 are still subject to the indeterminate (parole-based) system. While the overwhelming majority of cases currently in the system are for offenses allegedly committed after August 5, 2000, this chapter will explain the basic mechanics of both the indeterminate and determinate systems. Counsel should have familiarity with the indeterminate system because aspects of the determinate system were crafted with specific reference to the indeterminate system. Also, it may be the system with which their older clients are familiar. Clients may be on parole or have convictions from the indeterminate system and counsel may need to read and understand records and references to such older sentences. Counsel may also have an opportunity to work on an old case on remand or after reversal by the D.C. Court of Appeals.

B. Felony Cases

1. Indeterminate Sentencing

Indeterminate sentencing for felonies in D.C. specified a minimum and a maximum sentence, and allowed the USPC to determine when, within that range, to release the prisoner. The minimum term may be any period up to "one-third of the maximum sentence imposed." D.C. Code § 24-403(a); see Blakeney v. United States, 653 A.2d 365, 370 (D.C. 1995) (sentencing court acted properly in correcting stated, unlawful sentence of "7 to 12" years to "7 to 21" years, where mandatory minimum for offense was seven years); Heard v. United States, 686 A.2d 1026 (D.C. 1996) (eighty months to twenty years sentence was proper where maximum sentence for offense was life imprisonment). Thus, unless a mandatory minimum was involved, the minimum sentence may have been as low as one day. The upper limit on a minimum sentence for a charge other than murder was 15 years, even if the court imposed a maximum of life imprisonment. § 24-403(a). Thus, "15 years to life" was the longest possible sentence for armed robbery in the indeterminate system.

[8] See the National Capital Revitalization and Self Improvement Act of 1997, P.L. 105-33, 111 Stat. 712 (Aug. 5, 1997), amended P.L. 105-274, 111 Stat. 2419 (Oct. 21, 1998); D.C. Law 13-302, the Sentencing Reform Amendment Act of 2000. The criminal justice provisions of the Revitalization Act (without the amendments) are codified at D.C. Code § 24-101 et seq. (2004 ed.).

[9] Technically, the determinate system applies to all offenses committed on or after 5 p.m., August 11, 2000, and may apply to offenses committed from midnight, August 5th, to 4:59 p.m., August 11, 2000. Because it is unlikely that any offenses committed during the week of August 5, 2000, will be prosecuted at this time, this chapter will not discuss the "Revitalization Act System," as enacted by the Council on the Truth in Sentencing Commission recommendations. If counsel has a case where the client is convicted of an offense committed during the week of August 5, 2000, counsel should contact the Public Defender Service for assistance.

The judgment and commitment order (J & C) had to indicate the minimum. Dobson v. United States, 449 A.2d 1082, 1083 (D.C. 1982) (remand for correction of sentence necessary if trial court fails to specify minimum). Parole eligibility after serving the minimum sentence did not guarantee parole at or near the minimum date; current parole guidelines may be instructive on when the client who was sentenced in the indeterminate system might realistically expect to be paroled.[10]

2. Determinate Sentencing

a. Sentences of imprisonment

In the determinate system, any sentence of imprisonment or of commitment under D.C. Code § 24-903 will be for a definite term. Instead of defendants receiving two numbers from the court, reflecting a minimum (parole eligibility) and a maximum, defendants receive one number. Defendants are required to serve at least 85% of that number or term. The federal good time statute, 18 U.S.C. § 3624(b)(1), applies to District of Columbia inmates and only allows an inmate to reduce his sentence by 15% (hence the requirement that a defendant serve at least 85% of his term of imprisonment or commitment).

In the determinate system, if the statutory maximum term of imprisonment for an offense is a term of years, the maximum prison sentence a court can impose is the statutory maximum for that offense minus the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for revocation of release. If the offense is specifically designated a Class A felony,[11] the maximum prison sentence a court can impose is the statutory maximum; the maximum term of imprisonment upon revocation of supervised release is not deducted. (For further explanation of the mechanics of life sentences in the determinate system, see infra the "Life and Life without Parole Sentences" section.) For offenses that are non-Class A offenses, the amount of time a defendant can be incarcerated on a particular offense (original sentence plus revocation time) cannot exceed the statutory maximum prison sentence for that offense. For Class A offenses, the amount of time a defendant can be incarcerated on a particular offense (original sentence plus revocation time) can exceed the statutory maximum.

b. Supervised Release and Revocation of Supervised Release

If the court imposes a term of imprisonment or commitment under § 24-903, then the court must impose a term of supervised release to follow the imprisonment. D.C. Code § 24-403/01(b)(1). Supervised release is, in essence, the replacement for parole supervision. Offenders on supervised release are subject to the authority of the U.S. Parole Commission ("USPC"). D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b)(6). The USPC has the power to set the conditions of supervised release, [10] The U.S. Parole Commission regulations governing parole grants can be found at 28 CFR §§ 2.70 et seq., 2.80 et seq.

[11] All offenses that were life offenses in the indeterminate system, including offenses that still carry the possibility of life imprisonment in the determinate system and armed carjacking are all designated "Class A" felonies in the determinate system. The statute for each Class A felony will specifically designate the offense as such. See e.g., D.C. Code 22-3002(b) ("For purposes of imprisonment following revocation of release authorized by § 24-403.01(b)(7), the offense defined by this section [first degree sexual abuse] is a Class A felony."

modify the term of supervised release, revoke supervised release, impose a term of imprisonment as a sanction for violation of a condition of supervised release ("revocation term") and impose a term of supervised release to follow the revocation term. CSOSA will monitor offenders on supervised release on behalf of the USPC.

The term of supervised release begins the day a person is released from imprisonment and shall run concurrently to any term of probation, parole or supervised release for another offense to which the defendant is subject during the term of supervised release. D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b)(5). If the defendant is imprisoned in connection with a conviction for another crime and the period of imprisonment is thirty days or more, the term of supervised release is tolled until the defendant is released from the term of imprisonment. Id.

The length of terms of supervised release shall be as follows:

If the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense of conviction is 25 years or more and	the Court imposes a prison sentence of more than 1 year,	the Court shall impose a term of supervised release of 5 years
If the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense of conviction is 25 years or more and	the Court imposes a sentence of 1 year or less,	the Court shall impose a term of supervised release of at least one day but not more than 5 years
If the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense of conviction is more than 1 year but less than 25 years and	if the Court imposes a sentence of more than 1 year,	the Court shall impose a term of supervised release of 3 years
If the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense of conviction is more than 1 year but less than 25 years and	If the Court imposes a sentence of 1 year or less,	the Court shall impose a term of supervised release of at least one day but not more than 3 years
SEX OFFENSES (where registration is required)	The Court must at least follow the rules above but may instead	impose a longer term up to 10 years or, if the person is required to register for life, up to life.

See D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b)(2).

If the USPC revokes supervised release, it may order the offender to serve a period of imprisonment as follows:

If the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense is life or the offense is specifically designated as a "Class A" felony.	Not more than 5 years revocation time, cumulative
If the maximum term of imprisonment authorized is 25 years or more, but less than life	Not more than 3 years revocation time, cumulative.
If the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense is 5 years or more, but less than 25 years	Not more than 2 years revocation time, cumulative.
If the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense is less than 5 years	Not more than 1 year revocation time, cumulative.
SEX OFFENSES	Revocation operates the same as for any other offense

See D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b)(7).

When revoking an offender, the USPC need not require an offender to serve the entire revocation term authorized but may impose a shorter term of imprisonment. The revocation terms in the above chart and in the statute are maximums that cannot be exceeded regardless of the number of times the offender is revoked on that offense. When the USPC revokes an offender, it may also require that the offender serve a term of supervised release after the revocation imprisonment. That term of supervised release may be as long as the statute authorizes, even if the sentencing court originally exercised its discretion and imposed a shorter term, minus any revocation term of imprisonment. Credit is not given for "street time," time spent on supervised release before the revocation.

Example 1: Defendant was convicted of robbery, which has a statutory maximum of 15 years imprisonment. See D.C. Code § 22-2801. Because the statutory maximum(15 years) is more than 5 years but less than 25 years and robbery is not a Class A felony, the revocation term cannot exceed 2 years. See infra Revocation Table. Because this is a non-Class A offense, the idea is that the offender will not spend more time in prison than the statutory maximum; therefore, the maximum sentence of imprisonment the defendant is facing on the day he is sentenced by the court is 13 years (15 year statutory max minus 2 year revocation term). If the sentencing judge gave the offender the maximum prison sentence of 13 years and if the USPC revoked the offender's supervised release and imposed the maximum revocation time of 2 years, the defendant's time in prison would still not have exceeded the maximum prison time statutorily authorized for robbery. If, at sentencing, the court imposes a sentence greater than 1 year, then the court must also impose a 3-year term of supervised release because the statutory maximum is more than 1 year but less than 25 years. If the court imposes a sentence of 1 year or less, the court must impose a term of supervised release but has the discretion to impose a term between 1 day and 3 years.

Assume that the judge imposed the maximum sentence of 13 years. The defendant would serve at least 85% of that 13-year sentence.[12] Upon release from prison, he is supposed to be on supervised release for 3 years. Assume the defendant violates his conditions of supervised release after having served 2 years of the 3-year supervised release term. While the USPC can impose a revocation term of up to 2 years, it decides to impose a revocation term of 6 months. Once the defendant has completed his 6-month revocation term of imprisonment, the USPC can impose an additional term of supervised release up to 2½ years (3 years supervised release authorized by the statute minus 6 months served on revocation). Note that the amount of time the defendant successfully spent on supervised release prior to being revoked is irrelevant to the calculations, though it may be relevant to the USPC's decision whether or not to revoke and, if revoked, how long of a revocation term to impose. If the defendant again violates a condition of his supervised release, the USPC can revoke him and impose a sentence up to the amount of revocation time remaining. In this example, the defendant got a 6-month "hit" on the first revocation and still has 18 months "hanging over his head" (2 years from the chart minus the 6 months he already did). The USPC can impose the full 18 months or some fraction thereof and may impose an additional term of supervised release (minus all revocation time already served, the first 6-month hit plus whatever fraction of the revocation time the defendant is ordered to serve on this second revocation).

[12] If the defendant earns all of this good time, see D.C. Code 24-403.01(d) and therefore is released after only serving 85% of the term imposed by the sentencing judge, that "extra" 15% is not added to the supervised release term or revocation time term. Good time is not like parole. In parole, the amount of unserved time is the amount of time an offender serves on parole and is the amount of time the USPC may impose on the offender upon revocation. Time unserved because of good time is not added to and does not in any way affect the length of the supervised release term or of the revocation term.

Example 2: Defendant was convicted of armed robbery, which has a statutory maximum of 30 years imprisonment. See D.C. Code §§ 22-2801, 22-4502. Armed robbery, which was a life offense in the indeterminate system, is a Class A felony. The maximum revocation term authorized for a Class A felony is 5 years. The maximum prison sentence the defendant can receive is 30 years (the revocation term of 5 years is not subtracted from the statutory maximum for Class A felonies). If the court imposes a prison sentence of more than 1 year, then the court must also impose a 5-year term of supervised release. If the defendant violates supervised release, the USPC can impose a revocation term of 5 years or some fraction thereof. The USPC can also impose another term of supervised release to follow the revocation term, but must subtract the amount of time served upon revocation from the supervised release term authorized by the statute.

Example 3: Defendant was convicted of attempted robbery. See D.C. Code § 22-2802. The statutory maximum for attempted robbery is 3 years. The revocation term is 1 year because attempted robbery has a maximum term of imprisonment of less than 5 years. Attempted robbery is not a Class A felony, so subtract the revocation term from the statutory maximum to arrive at the maximum possible prison sentence. 3-year statutory maximum minus 1-year revocation term equals 2-year maximum possible prison sentence. Assume the judge imposes a sentence of exactly 1 year. The sentencing judge must impose a term of supervised release but has the discretion to impose any term between 1 day and 3 years. (Had the judge imposed a sentence of more than 1 year, then the judge would have had to impose a 3-year term of supervised release.) Assume the judge imposes a 6-month term of supervised release to follow the imprisonment. Assume the defendant violates his supervised release and the USPC revokes his release and gives him a 3-month "hit" (3 months of the 1-year revocation term they could have imposed). The USPC has the authority both the place the defendant back on supervised release at the end of his term of supervised release and to impose the maximum amount of statutorily authorized supervised release. While the sentencing judge initially gave only a 6-month term, the statute allowed the judge to give as much as 3 years. The USPC is not bound by what the sentencing judge imposed; the USPC can now impose a term of supervised release of 3 years minus the 3 month "hit" the defendant just did in prison. 3 years minus 3 months means that the USPC can place the defendant on supervised release for up to 2 years and 9 months. Note that had the defendant been convicted of a sex crime that requires sex offender registration, the maximum statutorily allowable amount of supervised release is the length of the registration – 10 years for some sex offenses and life for others.

The statutory maximums for some felonies are tied to statutory maximums for other felonies, which can seem complicated. The period of supervised release, the revocation time, and the prison sentence that can be imposed are tied to the maximum sentence for the offenses of conviction and not to a percentage of time for the underlying offense. For example, a person convicted of accessory after the fact faces a maximum possible sentence of up to one-half the maximum imprisonment to which the principal is subjected. If the underlying offense is aggravated assault, the defendant would face a 5-year statutory maximum because 5 years is half the 10-year statutory maximum for aggravated assault. However, even though the maximum prison time the court can impose for aggravated assault is 8 years (10-year statutory maximum minus 2 years revocation time), the most prison time the court can impose on the defendant convicted of accessory after the fact (aggravated assault) is not 4 years (½ of 8), but 3 years (5 year statutory maximum minus 2 years revocation time). The period of supervised release is not 1½ years, but 3 years (because the sentence for accessory after the fact, like the sentence for aggravated assault, is less than 25 years).

Offenses that enhance a sentence based on a percentage of another offense are calculated similarly. For example, a person convicted of a crime in a case in which repeat papers have been filed pursuant to § 22-1804 faces a maximum sentence of 1½ times the underlying offense penalty for a second conviction and 3 times the underlying offense penalty for a third or subsequent conviction. A defendant convicted a second time for aggravated assault with repeat papers is facing a 15-year statutory maximum (10-year statutory maximum for aggravated assault times 1½) and a 30-year statutory maximum (10 years times 3) for a third or subsequent conviction. Again, even though the maximum prison time the court can impose for aggravated assault is 8 years, the most prison time the court can impose for a third conviction of aggravated assault with repeat papers is not 24 years (3 x 8), but 27 years (30-year statutory maximum minus 3-year revocation time). The period of supervised release is 5 years, not 9 (3 x 3), because the statutory maximum for third time aggravated assault with repeat papers (30 years) is greater than 25 years.

3. Voluntary Sentencing Guidelines

Since June 14, 2004, D.C. Superior Court has had a system of voluntary guidelines. The guidelines apply to all felony cases for which a conviction (guilty plea or guilty verdict) was entered on or after June 14, 2004. Begun as a pilot program, the guidelines have now been codified at D. C. Code §§ 3-101, 3-105. The guidelines are promulgated, implemented and revised by the D.C. Sentencing and Criminal Code Revision Commission ("Sentencing Commission"). . The guidelines, using a master grid for all non-drug felony offenses and a drug grid for all drug felony offenses, provide a recommendation to the sentencing judge on both the in/out decision (probation, short split or prison) and the prison sentence length. Shading on the grid gives guidance on the in/out decision: light shading indicates that a probation or short split sentence would be compliant; dark shading indicates that a short-split sentence would be compliant; no shading indicates that only a prison sentence would be compliant. Regardless of shading, prison is an option in each cell of the grids. Guidance on the length of the prison sentence is provided in each cell by a range of months on the grids. A judge who chooses to comply with the guidelines and to impose a prison sentence should impose a sentence that is not less than the lowest number in the applicable range or more than the highest number in the range.[13] The applicable cell determined by finding the offense of conviction ranked in groups on [13] The judge may also find that one of the specified aggravators or mitigators applies and may then depart above or below the recommended range as far as the statute for the offense of conviction allows. Such departure will be considered compliant.

the Y-axis and by calculating the criminal history score and finding the resulting points score on the X-axis.

The system is voluntary and there is no penalty against the judge if the judge chooses to ignore the guidelines and impose an otherwise lawful sentence. The judge must always impose a lawful sentence consistent with the determinate sentencing system for offenses committed on or after August 5, 2000 or with the indeterminate sentencing system for offenses committed before August 5, 2000. No law requires the judge to consult the guidelines before proceeding with sentencing. Even if the judge chooses to "consult" the guidelines, no law requires the judge to impose a sentence compliant with the guidelines. There may be appealable issues as a result of the sentencing that counsel should litigate, but a judge's decision not to follow the voluntary guidelines is not one of them. The Sentencing Commission asks a judge who does not impose a compliant sentence to explain why s/he chose not to follow the guidelines. This information is to assist in the ongoing evaluative work of the guidelines system that the Sentencing Commission compiles. Note that the guidelines have specific aggravating and mitigating factors that allow the judge to depart (imposing a greater or lesser sentence) than the recommended range; if the judge uses one of the specified aggravators or mitigators to "depart," the resulting sentence is still considered compliant. Sentences imposed pursuant to Superior Court Criminal Rule 11(e)(1)(c) guilty pleas, even if wholly unrelated to the recommended guideline range for that offense of conviction, are also considered compliant.

PRACTICE TIP:

Counsel should acquire a copy of and become familiar with the Voluntary Sentencing Guidelines Practice Manual. The guidelines grid is very simple; however, some of the rules of the system, particularly those related to calculating the criminal history score (the X-axis of the grid) can be complicated. The Practice Manual is FREE and can be downloaded from the Sentencing Commission's website, www.acs.dc.gov (the Sentencing and Criminal Code Revision Commission was previously titled the Advisory Commission on Sentencing, hence the initials in the website address).

The guidelines do apply to indeterminate system cases. While such cases would be rare at this date, an indeterminate sentencing system case (offense committed before August 5, 2000) where the date of conviction is on or after June 14, 2004, is a guidelines case. An example of this might be a case with an offense date before August 5, 2000 (an indeterminate case), that was reversed and remanded for a new trial by the D.C. Court of Appeals, where the new trial resulted in a conviction after June 14, 2000 – such a case would be a guidelines case. If, however, the D.C. Court of Appeals remanded a case for re-sentencing, not for a new trial, and that case has an offense date before August 5, 2000 (an indeterminate case), and the conviction in that case was before June 14, 2000, then the case is not a guidelines case. If the indeterminate system case is a guidelines case, then the sentencing range in the appropriate box in the sentencing grid provides the minimum sentence, the parole eligibility number or the "front number." The judge would then multiply that number by 3 to get the back number or maximum release date. For example, if the offense of conviction was assault with a dangerous weapon and the defendant had no criminal history, then the recommended guideline range (Box 6A on the sentencing grid) would be 18-60 months. If the ADW occurred after August 5, 2000, this would be a determinate system case, and the judge complying with the guidelines would impose a sentence consisting of a single number between 18 and 60 months. If the ADW occurred before August 5, 2000, this would be an indeterminate system case and the judge complying with the guidelines would impose a parole eligibility date (the front number) of between 18 and 60, for example 24 months, and would multiply that by 3 to get the maximum release date. The resulting sentence would be 24-72 months. Note that the guidelines give the front number because the historical data used as the basis for the recommended ranges used the front number of historical indeterminate sentences.

C. Misdemeanor Cases

1. Indeterminate Sentencing

In misdemeanor sentencing, the court imposes a single sentence. If the sentence is 180 days or less, there is no "minimum" or parole eligibility date; the defendant will serve the entire sentence imposed. See D.C. Code § 24-408(a) (Parole Board's authority limited to "prisoners whose sentences exceed 180 days"). If the cumulative sentence is for more than 180 days and the offense date is before August 5, 2000, the defendant is eligible for parole after serving one third of the sentence. Id. Note that, effective June 22, 1994, the maximum sentence for almost all misdemeanors in DC is 180 days.

2. Determinate Sentencing

For a misdemeanor case in the determinate system, meaning the offense was committed on or after August 5, 2000, the court imposes a prison sentence with a single number. See D.C. Code § 24-403.02. Unlike felonies which have statutory good time that can reduce a sentence by up to 15%, misdemeanor sentences must be served in full, except for the possibility of earned good time, see D.C. Code §§24-221.01 – 221.05. On the positive side, however, at the conclusion of a misdemeanor prison sentence, there is no supervised release or revocation time, and the USPC does not have any jurisdiction over the defendant. The only time supervision might follow a misdemeanor sentence is if the sentencing judge imposed a "split sentence," requiring some period of imprisonment, suspended part of it, followed by a period of probation. If the defendant is on probation, then his compliance will be monitored by CSOSA and the judge will have the jurisdiction to decide whether to revoke for violating any terms of probation. Misdemeanor sentences are served in the custody of the D.C. Department of Corrections.

D. Life and Life without Parole Sentences

1. Aggravating circumstances – generally

In the indeterminate system (offenses committed before August 5, 2000), a life sentence had a parole eligibility date. Offenders were eligible for parole after 15 years for most life offenses, after 20 years for second-degree murder, and after 30 years for first-degree murder.[14] Life without parole was possible for first-degree murder, first-degree sexual abuse, and first-degree child sexual abuse if specific aggravating circumstances were proven. See D.C. Code §§ 22-2104.01, 22-3020. In the change to the determinate system, most offenses that carried life in the indeterminate system became 30-year (Class A) offenses in the determinate system. First-degree murder, second-degree murder, first-degree sex abuse, and first-degree child sex abuse all remain life offenses, but with the abolishment of parole, are all now life without release offenses; all are also Class A felonies.

First-degree and second-degree murder, first-degree sexual abuse, first-degree child sexual abuse and armed carjacking now have a "soft cap" – a sentence above which the sentencing court cannot go unless aggravating circumstances are found. The sentencing court cannot impose a sentence in excess of 60 years for first-degree murder, in excess of 40 years for second-degree murder, or in excess of 30 years for first-degree sex abuse, first-degree child sex abuse, or armed carjacking, unless aggravating circumstances have been indicted and proved beyond a reasonable doubt. If the jury finds the aggravating circumstances, the court can exceed the "soft cap" and impose any term up to life[15] for first-degree murder, second-degree murder, first-degree sex abuse, and first-degree child sex abuse, or up to 40 years for armed carjacking.

In sum, the determinate system has the following structure for excess or enhanced sentencing:

Offense	Max Prison without Proven Aggravators	Max Prison with Proven Aggravators	Applicable Aggravator or Enhancement Provisions
Murder I	60 years	Life without release	§ 22-2104.01 or § 24-403.01(b-2)
Murder II	40 years	Life without release	§ 24-403.01(b-2)
1st Degree Sex Abuse 1st Degree Child Sex Abuse	30 years	Life without release	§ 22-3020 or § 24-403.01(b-2)
Armed Carjacking	30 years	40 years	§ 24-403.01(b-2)

In addition to those aggravating circumstances listed in § 22-2104.01, which are applicable only to first-degree murder, and in § 22-3020, which are applicable only to first-degree sex abuse and first-degree child sex, § 24-403.01(b-2)(2) lists the following aggravating circumstances applicable to all the offenses with a "soft cap": (1) the offense was committed because of the victim's race, color, religion, national origin, or sexual orientation; (2) the offense was committed because the victim was or had been a witness in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding or was capable of providing or had provided assistance in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding; (3) the offense was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from custody; (4) the offense was especially heinous, [14] First-degree murder also has a mandatory minimum of 30 years. See D.C. Code § 22-2104(b) (formerly §22-2404(b)). Thus, all indeterminate first-degree murder sentences were 30 years – life.

[15] "Life" in the determinate system means life without release. Because parole or early release is abolished in the determinate system, there is no need to distinguish between "life" and "life with parole (or without release)."

atrocious, or cruel; (5) the offense involved a drive-by or random shooting; (6) the offense was committed after substantial planning; (7) the victim was less than 12 years old or more than 60 years old or vulnerable because of mental or physical infirmity; or (8) except where death or serious bodily injury is an element of the offense, the victim sustained serious bodily injury as a result of the offense.

D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(1) specifies that the court may impose an excess sentence for the eligible offenses only if (1) 30 days prior to trial or the entry of a plea of guilty, the prosecutor files an indictment or information with the clerk of the court and a copy of such indictment or information is served on the person or counsel for the person, stating in writing one or more aggravating circumstances to be relied upon and (2) one or more aggravating circumstances exist beyond a reasonable doubt. Though the statute gives the option of filing by indictment or information, the Supreme Court's decision in Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000) clearly held that aggravating circumstances used to increase prison sentences as charged in the indictment must be submitted to the jury (except if based upon prior convictions) and proven beyond a reasonable doubt. See also Keels v. United States, 785 A.2d 672 (D.C. 2001) (holding that the trial judge's reliance relied on two aggravating factors that she, not the jury, found to impose life without parole sentence – that the murder was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel, and that the victim was especially vulnerable – was plain error in light of Apprendi).

2. Mitigating circumstances

Even if the government satisfies its burden of proof, the judge has unlimited discretion not to impose life or not to exceed the soft cap. While the statute does not refer to mitigation, nothing in it circumscribes the court's traditional and inherent authority to consider any mitigating information. Furthermore, because the statute is structurally analogous to capital sentencing statutes, it is reasonable to infer that the Council intended to incorporate the constitutional requirement in death penalty cases that the sentencer be given the opportunity to consider and give effect to all relevant mitigating evidence. See, e.g., Lockett v. Ohio, 438 U.S. 586, 604-05 (1978); cf. Henderson v. United States, 678 A.2d 20, 24 n.7 (D.C. 1996) (history of theft-related but not violent crimes "does not excuse the offense here"). If the sentencing court does decide to exceed the soft cap, it need not automatically sentence the defendant to the maximum penalty authorized, but may impose any lawful sentence above the soft cap. For example, if the proper procedures were followed and the jury found the indicted aggravated circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt and the sentencing judge decided to exceed the 30-year soft cap for first-degree sexual abuse, the court could impose a sentence of 31 years, 32 years…35 years…40 years, etc., up to and including life.

3. First-degree murder

First-degree murder has a mandatory minimum sentence of thirty years imprisonment. For offenses committed before August 5, 2000, this means that a defendant must serve at least 30 years before becoming eligible for parole. For offenses committed on or after August 5, 2000, the court must impose a sentence of imprisonment of at least 30 years. In both the indeterminate and determinate systems, the sentence for first-degree murder may be life without parole or without release. See D.C. Code § 22-2104. However, in the determinate system, the court may impose a sentence greater than 60 years only after and the jury finds the indicted aggravating circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt.[16] The life without parole provision, in either the indeterminate or the determinate system, does not apply to persons who were younger than eighteen on the day of the murder.[17] § 22-2104(a).

A sentence of life (without release) is mandatory for the deliberate and premeditated murder of a law enforcement our public safety officer, if the defendant knew or "had reason to know" that the victim was an officer and kills while the officer is engaged in, or on account of, official duties. D.C. Code § 22-2106. See Dean v. United States, 938 A.2d 751 (D.C. 2007) (finding the reduced mens rea of 'a reason to know' that victim is law enforcement officer not unconstitutional because rationally related to legislative objective of deterring criminals from taking life of police officer). D.C. Code § 22-2106(b) specifically defines "law enforcement officer," and in addition to MPD officers, includes Department of Corrections officers, Metro Transit officers and probation, parole, supervised release, community supervision and pretrial services officers of CSOSA and the Pretrial Services Agency. "Public safety employee" is also defined and includes D.C. firefighters and EMT's. See D.C. Code § 22-2106(b)(2).

Most of the aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 22-2104.01(b) are derived from Model Penal Code § 210.6, a capital sentencing statute. A wealth of precedent addresses the validity of similar aggravating circumstances in the context of capital sentencing. It is unclear whether capital and non-capital sentencing proceedings are constitutionally similar for purposes of challenging the validity of aggravating circumstances; Caspari v. Bohlen, 510 U.S. 383, 396-97 (1994), declined to resolve that issue.

The "heinous, atrocious, and cruel" aggravating circumstance has been held constitutionally invalid in capital sentencing, unless limited by judicial construction. See, e.g., Godfrey v. Georgia, 446 U.S. 420 (1980); cf. Henderson v. United States, 678 A.2d 20, 23 (D.C. 1996) ("the death in this case was a form of torture which was especially heinous, atrocious or cruel"). See [16] D.C. Code § 22-2104.01(b). The aggravating circumstances are that: (1) the murder was committed in the course of kidnapping or an attempt to kidnap; (2) the murder was committed for hire; (3) the murder was committed to avoid a lawful arrest or to effect an escape from custody; (4) the murder was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel; (5) the murder was a drive-by or random shooting; (6) there was more than 1 offense of murder in the first degree arising out of 1 incident; (7) the murder was committed because of the victim's race, color, religion, national origin, sexual orientation or gender identity or expression; (8) the murder was committed while committing or attempt to commit a robbery, arson, rape or other sexual offense; (9) the murder was committed because the victim was or had been a witness in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding, or the victim was capable or providing or had provided assistance in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding; (10) the murder victim was especially vulnerable due to age or a mental or physical infirmity; (11) the murder was committed after substantial planning; or (12) at the time of the murder, the defendant had a prior conviction in any jurisdiction in the U.S., of murder, manslaughter, any attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit murder, assault with intent to kill, or assault with intent to murder.

[17] Note that the aggravating circumstances statute that applies specifically to first-degree sexual abuse and first-degree child sexual abuse and the one that applies generally to first-degree murder, second-degree murder, first-degree sexual abuse, and first-degree child sexual abuse do not preclude a life (without release) sentence for persons younger than 18 years of age at the time the offense was committed. Because aggravators cannot be used to enhance a sentence for first-degree murder for persons younger than 18 years when the crime was committed, a 17-year-old convicted of first-degree murder cannot receive a life sentence while a 17-year-old convicted of second-degree murder can.

generally Arave v. Creech, 507 U.S. 463, 470-74 (1993). Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476 (1993), probably resolves the constitutionality of discriminatory motive as an aggravator. Because "drive by" and "random" are not defined, that aggravator may be subject to a vagueness challenge; the witness-killing factor is especially vague. The "especially vulnerable" circumstance may be unconstitutional to the extent that it enhances the penalty on the basis of a characteristic of the victim unknown to the defendant, especially if the characteristic would not be apparent to a reasonable person in the defendant's position. Cf. Henderson, 678 A.2d at 24 ("the victim's vulnerability due to age [78] was critical"); cf. D.C. Code § 22-3601(c) (reasonable belief that victim was not 60 years of age or older is an affirmative defense to senior-citizen enhancement). Generally speaking, counsel should consider how Apprendi applies to each aggravator.

D.C. Code § 22-2104.01 sets out some procedures for determining whether an aggravating circumstances applies. The prosecution must give the notice required in D.C. § 22-2014(a), which means that aggravators affected by Apprendi must be indicted. A separate sentencing procedure is to be held "as soon as practicable" after the conclusion of the trial. The finding of whether one or more aggravating circumstances exist must be in writing and shall be made beyond a reasonable doubt.

E. "Enhancements," Mandatory Minimums, and Non-mandatory Minimums

1. Introduction

Numerous statutes provide for a longer term of imprisonment (and a larger fine) than what is normally authorized or required for a particular offense. "Permissive" enhancements expand the court's discretion by allowing a longer sentence if specified conditions are shown, but the court need not use them even if they apply. "Mandatory" provisions restrict the court's discretion, eliminating sentencing options on the more lenient end of the range and requiring the court to impose at least a certain sentence upon the showing of specified conditions. The Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of mandatory sentences for recidivists. Rummel v. Estelle, 445 U.S. 263 (1980) (mandatory life for third felony conviction); see also United States v. Johnson, 49 F.3d 766 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (enhancement of sentence for crime committed while under previous criminal justice sentence proper even though defendant not under active supervision of parole authorities), and Jones v. United States, 828 A.2d 169 (D.C. 2003) (allowance of sentence increase to life without parole for first-degree sexual abuse due to manner in which victim died).

In the determinate system (offenses occurred on or after August 5, 2000), it is BOP policy that offenders can receive good time credit on mandatory terms of more than one year. Thus, mandatory time can be reduced by 54 days each year (15%).

A few statutes prescribe a non-mandatory minimum or a "minimum maximum." Thus, the requirement that one convicted of felony failure to appear in court be "imprisoned not less than one year and not more than five years," D.C. Code § 23-1327(a)(1), means that the maximum sentence must be at least one year. It does not preclude suspension of that sentence in favor of a period of probation. Lawful sentences under § 23-1327(a)(1) would include sentences such as "1 year, to be followed by 3 years supervised release, suspend all but 6 months, to be followed by 2 years probation" or "1 year, to be followed by 6 months supervised release, suspend all, to be followed by 2 years probation." The judge must impose the 1 year but may suspend any or all of it.

The government must give notice that enhancement provisions apply. D.C. Code § 23-111 sets out the procedural requirements. But see Edwards v. United States, 767 A.2d 241 (D.C. 2001) (no error to impose enhanced sentence for commission of new offense while on pretrial release; court not required to give defendant opportunity to affirm or deny release or to make government prove release status where defense did not contest it). The government must file, and serve on counsel or the defendant, any information alleging the prior convictions on which it relies.[18] If the enhancement raises the potential penalty to more than three years, a defendant previously charged by information is entitled to indictment. § 23-111(a)(2). A non-jury charge becomes jury demandable if the information increases the penalty to more than 180 days. D.C. Code § 16-705(b); Dobkin v. District of Columbia, 194 A.2d 657, 659-60 (D.C. 1963). It is important for counsel to be aware of the holding in Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000), for any case in which the government is seeking an enhancement.

Because enhanced sentencing involves a substantial liberty interest, the courts have "repeatedly mandated strict compliance with the procedures set forth in the code." Boswell v. United States, 511 A.2d 29, 31 (D.C. 1986).[19] Enhancement papers must be filed before trial or entry of a guilty plea. § 23-111(a)(1).[20] Erskines v. United States, 696 A.2d 1077, 1082 (D.C. 1997) (ten year mandatory minimum sentences must be vacated where government did not file necessary enhancement papers before trial). This means "before the process of impaneling the jury has begun." Key v. United States, 587 A.2d 1072, 1073 (D.C. 1991) (citations omitted). Because the papers must be filed before jeopardy attaches, they should be filed before the first witness is sworn in a bench trial and before the Rule 11 inquiry in a guilty plea. Pre-trial notice is necessary to avoid the unfairness of increasing the potential penalty after the trial has begun, ensuring that the defendant can make an intelligent decision about whether to go to trial. See Arnold v. United States, 443 A.2d 1318 (D.C. 1982) (finding the government's filing enhancement papers after the jury was selected but before they were sworn constituted harmless error where the record demonstrated that the defendant was fully aware of the government's intention to file the papers); Robinson v. United States, 756 A.2d 448 (D.C. 2000) (remanding for resentencing of co-defendant Butler where the government failed to file repeat papers prior to the start of the jury selection process and the government's intention to file was not clear either). Gaston v. United States, 535 A.2d 893 (D.C. 1988), dealing with an analogous notice problem, reversed the conviction of a defendant who pled guilty but was not advised that she was ineligible for an exception to the mandatory minimum sentence; the court found both an ineffective Rule 11 inquiry by the judge taking the plea and ineffective assistance of counsel.

[18] If counsel is served with the information, the defendant need not be personally served. Willingham v. United States, 467 A.2d 742, 744 (D.C. 1983).

[19] The judge may not suggest that enhancement papers be filed. Brandon v. United States, 239 A.2d 159, 161 (D.C. 1968). Whether to seek an enhanced sentence "is for the prosecution alone to determine." Lawrence v. United States, 224 A.2d 306, 309 (D.C. 1966).

[20] The government may seek a continuance in order to file the information if it could not have obtained the necessary facts earlier with due diligence. Id.

To challenge the accuracy of the information or to claim that any of the convictions were obtained unconstitutionally, the defense must file a written response. § 23-111(c)(1). The court must then conduct a hearing to determine whether increased punishment is available. Id. At the hearing, the government has the burden of proof, beyond a reasonable doubt, on any issue, except that the defendant must prove unconstitutionality of the previous conviction, by preponderant evidence.[21] § 23-111(c)(1).

The court must follow the procedures of § 23-111(b) before imposing an enhanced maximum penalty or a mandatory minimum that applies by reason of a prior conviction.[22] In determining what type of possible enhancement offense a prior conviction may constitute, the sentencing court may not look to police reports or complaint application; examination is limited to statutory definition, charging document, written plea agreement, transcript of plea colloquy, and "any explicit factual finding by the trial judge to which the defendant assented." Shepard v. United States, 125 S. Ct. 1254 (2005).[23] Regardless of whether a written opposition is filed, the court must address the defendant before sentencing and inquire whether the defendant affirms or denies the previous convictions. The privilege against self-incrimination applies; the defendant need not respond to the question, and "exercise of the privilege cannot be the foundation of enhanced penalties." Boswell, 511 A.2d at 33. The court must also inform the defendant that failure to challenge a prior conviction before sentencing is a waiver. Smith v. United States, 491 A.2d 1144, 1149 (D.C. 1985); § 23-111(b). When the defendant receives sufficient actual notice, technical violations will not result in reversal, absent prejudice to the defendant. Norman v. United States, 623 A.2d 1165, 1169-70 (D.C. 1993); see Coleman v. United States, 628 A.2d 1005, 1009 (D.C. 1993) (notice adequate although prior robbery incorrectly listed as armed robbery); Logan v. United States, 591 A.2d 850, 853 (D.C. 1991).

If enhancement provisions overlap, the specific provision takes precedence over the general provision. See Martin v. United States, 283 A.2d 448, 450-51 (D.C. 1971) ("a special statute covering a particular subject matter is controlling over a general statutory provision covering the same and other subjects in general terms"); accord Lagon v. United States, 442 A.2d 166, 169 (D.C. 1982) ("[W]here two statutes allow the prosecution to proceed against the defendant as a repeat offender . . . the government [must] proceed under the more specific rather than the more general provision").

[21] "Identity of names" is prima facie evidence the defendant is the person previously convicted, but may not be enough; circumstances such as a common name may require other evidence (fingerprints, photographs, testimony, or other records). See Boswell, 511 A.2d at 33-34.

[22] See Arnold v. United States, 443 A.2d 1318, 1319 (D.C. 1982); Fields v. United States, 396 A.2d 990, 991 (D.C. 1979) ("strict, not substantial compliance, is the rule") (citation omitted); Irby v. United States, 342 A.2d 33, 41 (D.C. 1975).

[23] The Court's analysis relied mostly on the legislative history, construction, and interpretation of the federal statute allowing the enhancement. This case is informative in superior court, particularly when counsel are attempting to calculate the client's criminal history score and trying to "match" an out-of-state conviction to a DC criminal statute. According to the Practice Manual, if the default rules are used to match the out-of-state offense, the prosecutor may offer other evidence of the greater seriousness of the client's prior conviction (in an attempt to have more criminal history points assigned to the conviction). Counsel should be aware of Shepard and consider all arguments about the reliability of the government's evidence – the possibility, for example, that the police report initially filed does not reliably, and as required by the Constitution and consistent with the presumption of innocence and requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, reflect the conduct of which the client was actually convicted.

Counsel should be alert to problems of "double enhancement" – an attempt to use two or more enhancement provisions. Henson v. United States, 399 A.2d 16, 20-21 (D.C. 1979) (single felony cannot be used both to enhance basic sentence for CPWL and as predicate for life papers). More than one enhancement statute may be applied if each is based on a different policy and a separate precondition. Lagon, 442 A.2d at 168 (upholding enhancement based on a weapon in the current offense and two prior felony convictions); see also Bigelow v. United States, 498 A.2d 210, 214-16 (D.C. 1985) (where defendant had three prior convictions, one could be used to elevate CPWL to felony, and other two could be used as basis for "habitual offender" sentencing).

Rapid changes in the penalties applicable to drug and weapons offenses require constant vigilance and current supplements for statutory materials. Moreover, certain special definitions in enhancement and mandatory minimum statutes may not coincide precisely with definitions of the same terms in other statutes. For example, the offenses that are "crimes of violence" for purposes of increased penalties under § 22-4502 are not the same as the ones that are "crimes of violence" subject to victim impact statements under § 23-1904.

2014 Supplement

Brocksmith v. United States*, 99 A.3d 690 (D.C. 2014). Trial court did not err in failing to make necessary inquiries under D.C. Code § 23-111(b) prior to handing down enhanced sentence where defendant informally admitted to prior convictions at sentencing hearing in response to trial court's inquiries and did not contest validity of these admissions on appeal or make any belated attempt to dispute any prior conviction, and where defendant made no showing as to how trial court's failure to comply prejudiced him.

Daniels v. United States*, 33 A.3d 324 (D.C. 2011). (CourtView is "modern equivalent" of case jacket, and thus locating a defendant's release information in CourtView is sufficient for imposing an enhanced sentence for having committed a crime while on release).

2. "Release Papers" – § 23-1328

Triggering requirements	Penalty
Conviction of a misdemeanor, committed while on release in another case	Maximum of 90-180 days, consecutive to any sentence imposed for the misdemeanor
Conviction of a felony, committed while on release in another case	Maximum of 1 to 5 years, consecutive to any sentence imposed for the felony

Release papers apply only if the crime was committed while the defendant was released in another case. "On release" means release on personal bond, on conditions, or after the posting of a cash or surety bond. It is irrelevant whether the case in which the defendant was released results in a conviction, because the enhancement provision is aimed at people who commit crimes while under court supervision. Speight v. United States, 569 A.2d 124 (D.C. 1989) (en banc), held that this scheme does not violate due process.

3. "Repeat Papers" – § 22-1804

Triggering requirements	Enhanced maximum
One prior conviction, which is the same as or necessarily includes the current offense	Usual maximum is increased 50 percent
More than one such prior conviction	Usual maximum is tripled

- A prior robbery, ADW, or murder can enhance a current charge of simple assault because the robbery, ADW, and murder convictions each "necessarily include" the current simple assault offense; a prior simple assault cannot enhance a current charge of robbery, ADW, or murder because simple assault does not "necessarily include" a completed robbery, ADW, or murder, the current offense charged.

- If the prior conviction was entered in time to file notice in compliance with § 23-111, it is irrelevant whether that offense was committed before or after the current offense. Cornwell v. United States, 451 A.2d 628, 629 (D.C. 1982) (per curiam). The relevant date is the date of sentencing. See McDonald v. United States, 415 A.2d 538, 541-42 (D.C. 1980) (per curiam).

- This general statute does not apply where prior convictions trigger more specific enhancement statutes.

- A prior conviction for which one has been pardoned "on the ground of innocence" cannot serve as a predicate for enhancement. A sentence for an offense committed prior to August 5, 2000 that was subsequently set aside pursuant to the federal or D.C. Youth Act cannot serve as a predicate for enhancement.

4. "Life Papers" – §§ 22-1804a & 22-3020

Triggering requirements	Indeterminate Enhanced Maximum	Determinate Enhanced Maximum
Current felony conviction; before committing current offense, defendant had been convicted of at least two felonies (§ 22-1804a)	Life Imprisonment	30 years
Current crime of violence conviction; previous convictions of two prior crimes of violence (§ 22-1804a(b)(2))	Life without parole	Life without release
Current conviction for sex offense carrying possible life sentence; and victim under age 12, or victim under age 18 and "significant relationship" between defendant and victim, or "victim sustained serious bodily injury," or "defendant	Life without parole (1½ times statutory maximum for non-life offenses)	Life without release (1½ time statutory maximum (for non-life offenses) See also supra Section D on Life and Life without Parole Sentences.

was aided and abetted by 1 or more accomplices," or defendant "has been found guilty of committing sex offenses against 2 or more victims," or "defendant was armed with…firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon" (§ 22-3020(a))

- One of the two prior felonies must have been committed after initial sentencing for the first. § 22-1804a(c). A multi-count indictment leads to but a single prior "conviction" for purposes of this statute; the timing of the prior convictions must display successive courses of criminal conduct. Rogers v. United States, 419 A.2d 977, 981 (D.C. 1980); Washington v. United States, 343 A.2d 560, 563 (D.C. 1975). An order of probation is an "initial sentencing." McDonald, 415 A.2d at 541-42.

- A prior conviction cannot serve "double duty" for enhancement purposes. Thus, one prior conviction cannot be used both to convert a charge of CPWL into a ten-year felony, and as one of two prior convictions on which life papers for the CPWL are based. Henson, 399 A.2d at 21. However, the government can use one prior conviction to elevate a CPWL to a ten-year felony and two others as the predicate for life papers. Bigelow, 498 A.2d at 214-16. Also, one prior conviction can be used to enhance each of multiple charges. Jones v. United States, 416 A.2d 1236, 1239 (D.C. 1980).

- A prior conviction for which one has been pardoned cannot serve as a predicate for enhancement. § 22-1804a(d). A sentence for an offense committed prior to August 5, 2000 that was subsequently set aside pursuant to the federal or D.C. Youth Act cannot serve as a predicate for enhancement.

5. Armed Offenses – § 22-4502

Triggering Requirements	Indeterminate Enhanced Penalty	Determinate Enhanced Penalty
Committed "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous or deadly weapon
Current conviction is for a crime of violence or dangerous crime, as defined in § 22-4501(f), (g)	Maximum up to life	30 years (except for first-degree murder, second-degree murder, first-degree sex abuse and first-degree child sex abuse)
First-degree murder, second-degree murder, first-degree sex abuse, first-degree child sex abuse	Maximum up to life (statute does not distinguish these offenses from other crimes of violence or dangerous crimes)	Maximum up to life (without release) if authorized by §§ 22-2104.01, 22-3020
If weapon was operable pistol or firearm	5-year mandatory minimum	5-year mandatory minimum

Current conviction is while armed with operable pistol or firearm and is second or subsequent conviction for offense while armed with a pistol or firearm	10-year mandatory minimum	10-year mandatory minimum
Current conviction is after commission in D.C. of prior armed crime of violence	5-year minimum maximum; Youth Act sentencing not available	5-year minimum maximum; Youth Act sentencing not available

- For mandatory minimum to apply, the weapon must be an operable pistol or firearm: the indictment must allege, and the government must prove, operability, and the government must establish that the gun is a pistol (§ 22-4501(a)) or a firearm (§ 7-2501.01(9)).

- A "functional approach" is used in deciding whether an object is a "dangerous or deadly weapon." Edwards v. United States, 583 A.2d 661, 662-68 (D.C. 1990) (stationary toilet bowl not a dangerous weapon); Mitchell v. United States, 399 A.2d 866, 870 (D.C. 1979) (per curiam) (automobile can be a dangerous weapon).

- While one may be sentenced up to the maximum authorized for committing a crime of violence with a weapon "readily available," one must have committed the offense "while armed with" a weapon in order to receive the mandatory minimum. Thus, for either the principal or an aider and abettor to receive the mandatory minimum, the principal must have had actual possession of a gun. Abrams v. United States, 531 A.2d 964, 970-72 (D.C. 1987); see Morton v. United States, 620 A.2d 1338, 1339 (D.C. 1993), vacating the mandatory minimum portion of a sentence imposed based on a plea to armed PWID-cocaine, where the defendant was within "arm's length" of a handgun. Abrams discussed, but did not reach, the issues of what the indictment must allege and what the jury must find before the mandatory minimum applies. 531 A.2d at 972-73. Actual "use" of the weapon is not required. Jamison v. United States, 670 A.2d 373, 375 (D.C. 1996).

- Unless the crime is murder, Youth Act sentencing is available as a means of avoiding the mandatory minimum for a first "while armed" offense.

- The repeat offender provision applies even if the present offense was committed before the conviction for the prior crime, so long as the qualifying conviction exists at the time of sentencing for the later offense. United States v. Hilliard, 366 A.2d 437 (D.C. 1976). The weapon used in the prior crime need not have been of the same kind as that used in the current charge, nor need it have been a pistol or firearm. Lemon v. United States, 564 A.2d 1368, 1379-82 (D.C. 1989).

- Although assault with a dangerous weapon is listed as a "crime of violence," a first ADW is not subject to life imprisonment under § 22-4502. McCall v. United States, 449 A.2d 1095 (D.C. 1982) (per curiam). Assault on a police officer while armed is covered not here but by § 22-405(b) (maximum sentence of 10 years) and § 24-403(c) (mandatory minimum of one year after a previous felony conviction).

- The enhancement does not apply to involuntary manslaughter committed with an object that is not designed as a weapon, absent circumstances from which the jury could infer conscious disregard of a known risk of injuries to others. Reed v. United States, 584 A.2d 585, 590 (D.C. 1990) (no enhancement of criminal-negligence manslaughter, based on reckless driving); cf. Morris v. United States, 648 A.2d 958, 959 (D.C. 1994) (enhancement applies to involuntary manslaughter committed with operable gun with which defendant was "fiddling," and which was pointed in decedent's direction when it discharged).

- D.C. Code § 22-4504(b) sets out a separate offense of possession of a firearm or imitation, regardless of operability, during a crime of violence or dangerous crime as defined in § 22-4502, with a mandatory term of five to fifteen years in the indeterminate system and a mandatory five-year and a maximum 15-year sentence in the determinate system. See Hager v. United States, 791 A.2d 911 (D.C. 2002) (no abuse of discretion in imposing separate sentences of ten to thirty years for manslaughter and ten years to life for "while armed" under D.C. Code § 22-3202, making the sentence for manslaughter while armed twenty years to life).

2014 Supplement

Colter v. United States*, 37 A.3d 282 (D.C. 2012). Assault with significant bodily injury ("felony assault") is not a "crime of violence."

6. Senior Citizen Victims – § 22-3601

Triggering requirements	Enhanced maximum
Conviction for robbery or attempt, theft or attempt, extortion, 1st- or 2nd-degree fraud, and victim was 60 years of age or older at the time of the offense.	Usual maximum is increased 50%

"It is an affirmative defense" to application of the enhanced penalty "that the accused knew or reasonably believed that the victim was not 60 years of age or older." § 22-3601(c). Some guidance in explaining the burdens may be found in instructions on self-defense. See, e.g., Criminal Jury Instruction No. 9.505

7. Members of Citizen Patrols – § 22-3602

Triggering requirements	Enhanced maximum
Conviction for enumerated crime, committed while or because victim is a member of a citizen patrol	Usual maximum is increased 50%

8. Miscellaneous Enhancements – § 24-403

Offense	Triggering requirements	Enhanced penalty
Armed robbery; assault with intent to rape	Prior conviction for a crime of violence (§ 22-4501(f))	2-year minimum
Armed assault on police officer	Prior conviction for same offense or any felony	1-year minimum
Illegal possession of a pistol (§ 22-4503)	Prior conviction in D.C. for same offense	1-year minimum
Possessing implements of crime (§ 22-2501)	Prior conviction for same offense in D.C. or a felony anywhere	1-year minimum

These specific provisions control over general repeat papers. Many of the minimums have been overtaken by stiffer mandatory minimum provisions, but they remain in the code and may be used on rare occasions.

F. Suspended Sentences

1. Probation

Probation is an available sentencing option for any offense not requiring a mandatory prison term. Beale v. United States, 465 A.2d 796, 806 (D.C. 1983), overruled on other grounds, Winfield v. United States, 676 A.2d 1 (D.C. 1996) (en banc). Probation may not be ordered without the defendant's consent. D.C. Code § 16-710(a). It may be supervised or unsupervised.[24] Regardless of the lawful term of imprisonment that could be ordered for the offense, probation can last no longer than five years. § 16-710(b). See Simmons v. United States, 461 A.2d 463 (D.C. 1983) (three-year probation for prostitution solicitation not abuse of discretion). The trial court may not impose an order that imposes an obligation that extends beyond the period of probation. Flores v. United States, 698 A.2d 474, 483 (D.C 1997).

In ordering probation, the court imposes a sentence of incarceration and then suspends its execution – "ESS." § 16-710(a). If a sentence is imposed but its execution is suspended, no greater sentence may be imposed upon revocation of probation. Mulky v. United States, 451 A.2d 855, 856 (D.C. 1982). Time on probation does not count toward the sentence imposed at revocation.

The court may impose any lawful condition of probation that will serve the ends of justice and the best interests of the public and the defendant. § 16-710(a). Every grant of probation includes the general condition that the defendant remains free of criminal involvement. Wallace v. United [24] Deferred sentencing is a separate option that operates similarly to probation. With deferred sentencing, the court holds the sentencing hearing in abeyance after the guilty finding, usually with the proviso that no sentence will be imposed and the case will be dismissed if the defendant complies with conditions set by the court and agreed upon by the parties.

States, 475 A.2d 401, 403-04 (D.C. 1984). Other standard conditions are that the defendant keeps all appointments with the probation officer,[25] notify the probation officer of any change of address, obtain permission before leaving the District of Columbia, and abstain from the use of illegal drugs. These conditions are printed on the form probation order issued by the court.

Special conditions may be added. See Moore v. United States, 387 A.2d 714, 715-16 (D.C. 1978) (defendant required to obtain psychiatric treatment); Willis v. United States, 250 A.2d 569, 570 (D.C. 1969) (stay-away order permissible);[26] Merle v. United States, 683 A.2d 755 (D.C. 1996) (appellant under special order to remain voluntary inpatient in hospital and not leave hospital without special permission); cf. Huffman v. United States, 259 A.2d 342, 346 (D.C. 1969) (condition that defendants submit to specified searches "were impossible of performance and were illegal"), rev'd on other grounds, Huffman v. United States, 502 F.2d 419 (D.C. Cir. 1974). The court may not impose "pre-conditions" before granting probation, upon which the suspension, imposition or execution of sentence depends. Butler v. District of Columbia, 346 F.2d 798 (D.C. Cir. 1965) (per curiam) (essay on citizenship duties). Neither may it require as a condition of probation in one case that the probationer comply with a condition of probation imposed in another, exposing the defendant to double punishment, in violation of the Double Jeopardy Clause. Hardy v. United States, 578 A.2d 178 (D.C. 1990).

The court has jurisdiction to modify the conditions at any time during the probationary term. D.C. Code § 24-304(a). A hearing, with assistance of counsel, is required before any modification, unless the modification "is favorable to the probationer." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32.1(b). The defendant may appeal from modification of probation, but cannot later appeal from an order revoking probation. Barnes v. United States, 513 A.2d 249 (D.C. 1986).

Probation should be used creatively as an alternative to incarceration to develop an individualized program that meets the various sentencing objectives. There are rarely government funds available to pay for programs; alternate sources must be sought if money is required. Counsel may consult the Offender Rehabilitation Division (ORD) of PDS for sentencing ideas.

[25] Requiring that a probationer report to the probation officer and truthfully answer questions relating to the probation status is not custodial interrogation; however, the probationer is free to assert the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, and cannot be penalized for doing so. Minnesota v. Murphy, 465 U.S. 420 (1984).

[26] See infra Sections J and K on orders to pay court costs, restitution, and reparation, and to perform community services.

PRACTICE TIPS:

Particularly in misdemeanor cases, where the client is not exposed to a lengthy period of imprisonment, counsel should discuss with the client the possibility of rejecting probation, especially if the court will impose a number of conditions. Probation cannot be imposed without the consent of the client. See D.C. Code § 16-710(a). Some clients may prefer to spend, for example, 180 days in jail (if the judge imposed the maximum on most misdemeanors) than to have to live for five years, the maximum period of probation allowed, complying with a long list of conditions.

If the client is fortunate enough to receive a sentence of unsupervised probation, it is counsel's responsibility to follow up and move for any benefits to which the client may be entitled. For example, if the client received unsupervised Youth Act probation, counsel must consult with client about filing a motion requesting the court to terminate probation early. If Youth Act probation is terminated early, the set aside benefit is automatic. Counsel should file such motion sufficiently in advance of the probation expiration to give the court ample time to rule. If the Youth Act probation term expires, set aside is not automatic and counsel must move the court to set aside the conviction. Because the probation was unsupervised, there is no probation officer or other court or CSOSA personnel charged with the responsibility of moving the court to set aside the client's conviction.

2. Drug Misdemeanors – Probation and Expungement

A defendant convicted of simple possession of a controlled substance, with no prior drug convictions, is eligible for "probation without judgment" under D.C. Code § 33-541(e) [now § 48-904.01(e)]. Sentencing under this provision, however, is not automatic and may be subject to the discretion of the trial judge. See, e.g., Pernell v. United States, 771 A.2d 992 (D.C. 2001) (trial judge did not abuse discretion in denying defendant probation under D.C. Code § 48-904.01(e) where judge said such a sentence is "designed for the person who makes a mistake and has a drug problem, and…says…I've made a mistake…" and that defendant, in contrast, "simply indicated that she was wrongly convicted"). If such treatment is granted, probation is ordered without entry of a judgment of conviction. If probation is successfully completed, no conviction is entered and the record can be expunged according to procedures described in Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(f). If probation is violated, a revocation proceeding may commence and result in entry of a judgment of conviction. If no revocation occurs, counsel should argue for expungement. See United States v. McNeil, 115 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 2264 (D.C. Super. Ct. Oct. 26, 1977) (Kennedy, J.). If the court takes no action to revoke, terminate or modify probation during the probationary term, the probationer is entitled to expungement at the end of the term, even if violations are reported to the court after probation expires. Neal v. United States, 571 A.2d 222 (D.C. 1990).

Upon successful completion of probation, CSOSA should notify the court, the probationer, defense counsel, and the prosecutor. If the government wishes to contest the notice of successful completion, it must do so in writing within ten days. If necessary, the court can hold a hearing. Upon determining that the person has successfully completed probation, the court enters an order discharging the probationer and dismissing the proceedings, whereupon the clerk retains a non-public record of the case solely for future determinations of whether the person qualifies for § 904.01(e) treatment. Counsel should not rely on these procedures, however, but should set up a system to track when the probation has expired, and check with probation to ensure that a motion for discharge and dismissal has been filed.

PRACTICE TIP:

Because after probation has expired the court does not have the jurisdiction to do anything other than to dismiss the charge against the client and expunge his record, see Neal v. United States, 571 A.2d 222 (D.C. 1990), counsel should not check with probation to ensure that the motion to discharge and dismiss has been filed until after probation has actually expired. Note that this is unlike the Youth Act, where counsel should contact probation before Youth Act probation expires because the benefit of set aside is only automatic if Youth Act probation is terminated early.

Once the court acts to dismiss the case and discharge the probationer, expungement is a matter of right, but it is the probationer's obligation to file a motion for expungement. The order directs various agencies to expunge all official records. Probation includes form motions for expungement with the notice of successful completion to the probationer. Again, counsel should not rely on the client to file the motion, but should check with probation to make sure this is complete.

Common reasons for denying § 904.01(e) treatment include a record of non-drug offenses (which do not preclude § 904.01(e) treatment), or underlying facts indicating actual distribution. See In re D.F.S., 684 A.2d 1281, 1282 (D.C. 1996) (refusing to allow § 33-541(e) [now § 48-904.01(e)] to apply to juvenile convictions). However, the court may not deny § 904.01(e) treatment for these reasons as a matter of policy, because adherence to a uniform policy would defeat the discretionary intent of the statute. Houston v. United States, 592 A.2d 1066 (D.C. 1991).

G. Youth Act Sentencing

The objectives of the Youth Rehabilitation Act (YRA), D.C. Code §§ 24-901 to 906, are "to give the court flexibility in sentencing a youth offender according to his individual needs," to "separat[e] youth offenders from more mature, experienced offenders," and to provide an "opportunity for a deserving youth offender to start anew through expungement of his criminal record." Report from Chairperson of the Judiciary to the Council members on Bill 6-47, June 19, 1985.

The YRA is available if a plea of guilty or verdict of guilty is entered before the defendant's twenty-second birthday. § 24-901(2), (6); see Holloway v. United States, 951 A.2d 59 (D.C. 2008) (defendant's age at conviction or guilty plea, not sentencing, determines eligibility for sentencing under YRA); Williams v. United States, 656 A.2d 288, 295 (D.C. 1995) (YRA sentencing not available to defendant who withdraws guilty plea and is convicted after trial, having turned twenty-two in interim).

All crimes, except murder and convictions for a second crime of violence while armed, are eligible for Youth Act treatment. (The important issue with both exclusions is the crime of conviction, not the original charge.)

To impose a Youth Act sentence, the court must determine that the defendant is a "youth offender" and "will derive benefit from the provisions of this subchapter," making a statement of its reasons on the record. § 24-903(c); see Veney v. United States, 681 A.2d 428 (D.C. 1996) (en banc).[27] Before making the determination of benefit, the court may order the defendant "committed for observation and study at an appropriate classification center or agency." § 24-903(e). This study will be prepared within sixty days or after any additional period that the court may grant. Id. The defendant is entitled to present relevant facts. § 24-903(c).

Youth Act probation may be imposed, with either imposition or execution of sentence suspended, if the court finds that the defendant "does not need commitment." § 24-903(a). No term of probation may exceed five years. D.C. Code § 16-710(b). The term of incarceration "for treatment and supervision" may be anything up to the ordinary maximum term for the particular offense. § 24-903(b).

Youth Act confinement is designed to provide "treatment" – "corrective and preventive guidance and training designed to protect the public by correcting the antisocial tendencies of youth offenders." § 24-901. As the report from Chairperson Rolark indicates, this treatment is to include "intensive guidance, counseling, educational instruction and job training." Programs may vary, depending on the length of the sentence, and counsel should determine in advance what programs may be available for the client.

Although there formerly existed multiple benefits of a Youth Act commitment, such as the possibility of early release and imprisonment separate from non-youthful offenders, those statutory benefits were rescinded with the change to the determinate system, the abolishment of parole (early release) and the change in custody to BOP. The benefit that remains is the most important one, however. The remaining purpose and benefit of a Youth Act sentence is the possibility it affords for "clearing" the record of conviction. The key to "set aside" is unconditional discharge of the defendant, by the institution or the court. Public access to court records of set-aside convictions must be restricted. United States v. Doe, 730 F.2d 1529 (D.C. Cir. 1984). The set-aside is also intended to remove "legal disabilities created by the conviction." Lindsay v. United States, 520 A.2d 1059, 1063 (D.C. 1987). Thus, a set-aside conviction cannot be used to enhance penalties or deprive one of voting or contractual rights or other aspects of citizenship. Barnes v. United States, 529 A.2d 284, 286-87 (D.C. 1987). However, the records are not "obliterat[ed]," but remain available to law enforcement personnel and court officials for "legitimate" purposes. Id. at 287-88; Lindsay, 520 A.2d at 1063. In some circumstances, set-aside convictions may be used at trial. Askew v. United States, 540 A.2d 760 (D.C. 1988) (challenge to defendant's character witness). Thus, a set-aside is not the equivalent of expungement. A conviction that has been set aside may be used: (1) in determining whether a person has committed a second or subsequent offense for purposes of imposing an enhanced sentence under any provision of law; (2) in determining whether an offense under D.C. Code § 48-904.01 is a second or subsequent violation under D.C. Code § 24-112(h)(14); (3) in determining an appropriate sentence if the person is subsequently convicted of another crime; (4) for impeachment if the person testifies in his own defense at trial pursuant to D.C. Code § 14-305; (5) for cross-examining character witnesses; or (6) for sex offender registration and notification. D.C. Code §24-906(f). This list of allowed uses of set-aside convictions should be scrutinized for legal and constitutional problems. One potential issue of constitutional magnitude is that the statute allows the defendant to be impeached should he testify in his own defense at trial but does not specifically allow for the impeachment of government witnesses with their set aside convictions. This places a burden on the defendant's right to testify. The uses should only apply to convictions for offenses committed on or after August 5, 2000, that have been subsequently set aside.

If the maximum term of probation or imprisonment expires without early termination, a motion should be filed to set aside the conviction nunc pro tunc. See Brooks v. United States, 458 A.2d 66 (D.C. 1983). The trial court has the authority to set aside convictions nunc pro tunc when the probation officer's recommendation of unconditional discharge and set-aside is filed belatedly, but within a reasonable time after the expiration of probation. Argueta v. United States, 759 A.2d 1067 (D.C. 2000). On the implications of failures to effectuate set-asides, see Barnett v. District of Columbia Dep't of Employment Services, 491 A.2d 1156 (D.C. 1985) (no fraud to fail to mention FYCA conviction erroneously believed to have been set aside).

If YRA probation is ordered, the court has discretion to "unconditionally discharge the youth offender from probation" at any time before the probation expires. This discharge automatically sets aside the conviction, and a certificate to this effect is issued to the defendant. § 24-906(d). Set-aside is also automatic for offenders who are unconditionally discharged from a Youth Act commitment. § 24-906(a). If the sentence of a committed defendant expires before unconditional discharge, the United States Parole Commission has discretion to set aside the conviction. § 24-906(b). This section allows the Commission to correct administrative errors and to address cases in which the sentence structure does not permit release before unconditional discharge.

If the Director of the Department of Corrections determines that a youth offender will no longer benefit from YRA treatment, the Director may order a transfer after giving the prisoner notice and a chance to appeal. § 24-905(a). See Vaughn v. United States, 598 A.2d 425 (D.C. 1991). The notice must inform the person of the reasons for the decision that there is no further benefit, that the prisoner has a right to appeal the decision to the sentencing court within thirty days, and that this appeal will stay the Director's action until after the court has ruled. § 24-905(a). A judicial decision contrary to that of the Director precludes further action to change the defendant's status for six months. § 24-905(b).

Counsel should ask for a split sentence with a period of probation for Youth Act misdemeanant cases, rather than a straight commitment. A split sentence with probation will give the court the jurisdiction to determine whether to grant a set aside. It will also allow the court to terminate probation early, allowing an automatic set aside. Straight commitment gives the authority to the U.S. Parole Commission to determine whether or not to grant a set aside. The USPC has the authority to determine whether to set aside in a conviction in all Youth Act Commitment cases. For clients committed in felony cases, the USPC will receive a recommendation from the Community Supervision Officer and will have the record of the time the client spent in a BOP facility (or contract facility) and the record of his time on supervision on which to base its decision. For misdemeanants, however, it is the Department of Corrections that will make the recommendation. It is the stated policy of DOC that it will forward all disciplinary charges, whether or not substantiated. A client's chance of demonstrating that he is deserving of the set aside are likely greater before the sentencing judge who gave him the Youth Act opportunity than before the USPC; a split sentence with a probation term, even a very short one, will give the jurisdiction to determine the set aside to the court.

If client receives Youth Act probation, counsel should put a note in her calendar or ensure some other sure way of reminding herself to contact the CSO approximately 6 months before probation is to expire to ask if CSO will move for early termination of probation, which would automatically set aside conviction.

If probation is Unsupervised, counsel MUST file a motion with the judge before probation ends, asking for early termination, which automatically sets aside conviction. With unsupervised probation, there is no probation officer with the responsibility of recommending the court either terminate early or set aside the conviction. Client will not get the benefit of the set aside if counsel does not move for it. A set aside only "sets aside" the conviction; it does not expunge or in any way seal the client's arrest record. Once a Youth Act conviction has been set aside, it is a "non-conviction" for purposes of arrest records sealing. See D.C. Code § 16-803 et seq. to determine client's eligibility to have his arrest record sealed.

H. Modified Sentences of Incarceration

1. Split Sentences

A split sentence is when the court imposes a sentence but suspends execution of that entire sentence and instead orders the defendant to serve only a portion of it initially. A split may be followed, but does not have to be, by a period of probation. In Boykins v. United States, 856 A.2d 606 (D.C. 2004), the Court of Appeals found that a sentence that suspended a portion of the prison sentence and the supervised release but did not impose a probation term was a legal sentence, citing the use of the word "may" at D.C. Code § 16-710(a). "[W]hether or not to place a defendant on probation is a matter committed to the court's sentencing discretion." Id. at 608.

a. Indeterminate System

To order a split sentence, the court imposes a sentence and suspends "execution of a portion thereof." D.C. Code § 16-710(a) (overruling Davis v. United States, 397 A.2d 951 (D.C. 1979)). The portion of the sentence that must be served may be followed by a period of probation. The defendant serves the entire specified term and, if a period of probation is to follow, is released directly to probation supervision. If probation is revoked, the court can order the suspended sentence or any lesser term into effect. See § 16-711.

Counsel should consider a split sentence, with or without probation to follow, in indeterminate sentence cases sentenced under the Voluntary Sentencing Guidelines. The Guidelines apply to indeterminate cases (offense occurred before August 5, 2000) for which a plea was entered or guilty verdict returned on or after June 14, 2004, the date the guidelines went into effect. Whereas for determinate system cases, the guidelines recommend the sentence the judge should impose and the defendant may serve only 85% of that sentence, for indeterminate system cases, the guidelines recommend the parole eligibility number and the judge must multiply that number by three to get the maximum release date. The defendant with the indeterminate system case might therefore spend 3 times longer in prison than an otherwise similarly situated defendant with the determinate system case. Further, anecdotally, the US Parole Commission grants initial parole significantly later than did the D.C. Parole Board. So defendants serving an indeterminate system today will spend longer in prison than an otherwise similarly situated defendant with that same sentence would have served under the authority of the DC Parole Board. In light of all that, counsel should consider requesting the court impose a split sentence. Such split sentence must still comply with the guidelines. For example, for an offense in a prison-only (no shading) cell on the grid, the unexecuted part of the imposed sentence must be a number that falls within the recommended guideline range.

To impose a split sentence in the indeterminate system, the court begins with a normal sentence, specifying a maximum and a minimum (felonies) or simply a maximum (misdemeanors). It then specifies the portion to be served immediately, using language such as "execution of all but [the amount of the split] suspended. If the court chooses to impose a period of probation to follow the initial incarceration, the court should also state "the defendant to be placed on probation for [a specified period of five years or less]." The split portion cannot be less than any required mandatory minimum.

b. Determinate System

To impose a split sentence in the determinate system, the court must suspend both a portion of the imposed prison term and the imposed supervised release. The District's sentencing scheme does not permit concurrent terms of probation and supervised release for the same offense. If the court imposes a period of probation to follow the split, a conflict between the supervising authorities, the court in the probation and the USPC in the supervised release, could result. See Richardson v. United States, 927 A.2d 1137 (D.C. 2007).

A split sentence in determinate system cases must therefore have the following elements:

(1) an imposed sentence;
(2) an imposed period of supervised release;
(3) suspension of some, but not all, of the prison time; and
(4) suspension of all of the supervised release term.

To impose a legal split sentence, the court must impose both the prison sentence it wants the defendant to serve if probation is later revoked and the amount of supervised release that must be imposed with that prison sentence. Then the court must suspend the amount of prison time it wants to suspend and suspend all the supervised release time. The court imposes a period of probation to follow the executed part of the prison sentence, which probation term cannot exceed 5 years. See D.C. Code § 16-710(b). The court must impose a term of supervised release because the law says that every felony prison sentence must be followed by an adequate period of supervised release. The court must suspend the imposed term of supervised release when it is imposing a split sentence because the felony sentence will not be completely served and the supervised release should not begin unless and until probation is revoked and the defendant serves the unsuspended portion of the original prison sentence (or some lesser sentence, if the judge chooses to reduce it upon revocation).[28] If the supervised release were not entirely suspended, it would run concurrently with the probation and the court (through the probation) and the USPC (through the supervised release) would both have jurisdiction in the same case at the same time. Importantly, if the defendant is successful on probation and is never revoked, then the defendant will not serve the suspended prison time nor will he serve any supervised release.

Example: In an aggravated assault case, the judge may impose the following example of a legal split sentence: "6 years in prison to be followed by 3 years supervised release, suspend all but 2 years in prison to be followed by 4 years probation." With this sentence, the defendant will serve 2 years in prison and then be released to do 4 years probation. If the defendant is successful on probation, then he will never serve the remainder of the prison sentence (the 4 years he did not serve of the 6-year imposed sentence) and he will never serve the term of supervised release. If the defendant is unsuccessful and the court revokes probation, then the defendant will serve the remainder of the prison sentence (or less, if the court chooses) and, once released from prison, the defendant will serve the 3-year-term of supervised release.

When calculating a split sentence, the initial prison sentence that the court imposes cannot be greater than the maximum prison sentence allowed for the offense. Splitting a sentence does not change the rules for how the maximum prison sentence must be calculated for non-Class A felonies. A defendant cannot be made to serve more time in prison that the statutory maximum penalty for that offense for non-Class A felonies and cannot be made to serve more time in prison than the statutory maximum penalty for that offense plus the revocation term for Class A felonies.

[28] If a lower sentence is imposed upon revocation than was previously imposed, counsel should ask that the court explicitly state that credit is to be given for time already served. Cf. Brame v. Palmer, 510 A.2d 229 (D.C. 1986) (Court assumed trial court took into account time previously served in imposing reduced sentence upon revocation).

Split sentences provide many possibilities for creative sentencing. For example, "weekend" sentences are legal in the indeterminate system[29] and qualify as being in "custody" for purposes of the escape statute. Williams v. United States, 781 A.2d 740 (D.C. 2001). Split sentences are especially valuable in the indeterminate system because they allow defendants to avoid the USPC because release is automatic at the end of the split. Although less valuable in the determinate system (because the release date is very predictable, unlike in the indeterminate system), split sentences still have some value in the determinate system because they allow supervision (on probation) by the court upon release at the end of the split, rather than supervision (on supervised release) by the USPC. But see Olden v. United States, 781 A.2d 740 (D.C. 2001) (trial judge had authority to impose a conditional sentence and require defendant to fulfill a condition of probation – finding a drug treatment program outside of the District of Columbia – while still incarcerated during the front portion of the "split sentence"; any potential conflict between trial court's sentence and power of USPC to release defendant was too speculative since no conflict would arise unless defendant remained incarcerated after completion of the five-year minimum term).

The Voluntary Sentencing Guidelines give guidance to the court on which counts, given the offense of conviction and the defendant's criminal history score, it may impose a "short split." A "short split," defined in the Guidelines Manual, is six months or less. "Short splits" sentences are considered compliant in any shaded cell on the Master and Drug Grids.

2. Work Release

a. Misdemeanors

Work release can be ordered for anyone imprisoned for a misdemeanor, contempt, or failure to pay a fine. D.C. Code §§ 24-241.01 et seq. A "recommendation" for work release by the court on a judgment and commitment order is legally meaningless. The court must enter a specific work release order, Armstead v. United States, 310 A.2d 255 (D.C. 1973), and the defendant will be placed in a Department of Corrections halfway house.

Work release privileges may not be revoked except by court order. The Department of Corrections may, however, suspend privileges for up to five days for a violation of its rules. § 24-241.05(a).

The order for work release may be conditioned on payment of restitution from wages earned while on release. Davidson v. United States, 467 A.2d 1282 (D.C. 1983). The United States Parole Commission also has authority to place misdemeanants in halfway houses upon eligibility for parole. §§ 24-241.01, 241.02.

[29] This is accomplished by ordering that "execution of sentence is suspended except for that portion between (time) Friday and (time) Sunday for (number) consecutive weekends."

b. Felonies

For felony convictions, the court has the authority to order as a condition of probation a defendant be in custody during nights, weekends or other intervals. D.C. Code § 16-710(b-1). The court may not order a defendant to serve more than a total of one year in custody as a condition of probation. Thus, the court may fashion a sentence, using probation, which allows the defendant to maintain employment. For example, the court could order the defendant to report to custody every night or on a series of weekends.

I. Probation Revocation

1. General Procedures

Judicial authority to revoke probation for violation of a condition is codified at D.C. Code § 24-304. Revocation may be for violating any condition that is either express or "so clearly implied that a probationer, in fairness, can be said to have notice of it. . . . [T]he probationer must have acted, or failed to act, in a way that foreseeably could result in revocation." The standard of proof for revocation of probation is preponderance of the evidence. Johnson v. United States, 763 A.2d 707 (D.C. 2000); Carradine v. United States, 420 A.2d 1385, 1389-90 (D.C. 1980) (improper to revoke probation for failure to respond adequately to psychiatric treatment when maintaining prescribed level of mental stability had not been a condition; also noting that revocation based solely on mental state would raise serious questions). Resper v. United States, 527 A.2d 1257 (D.C. 1987), held that a defendant who was to be released from jail when space became available in a residential program did not violate any condition of probation when she failed to enter the program on her own after being prematurely released by mistake from the jail; the court had not advised her of a contingent responsibility to use "self-help" to enter the program, and imposed no time limit on her entry into the program. Commission of a crime is a violation of probation. Wallace v. United States, 475 A.2d 401, 405 (D.C. 1984) ("implicit in every case where [a] prison sentence is suspended and probation granted is the condition that the probationer refrain from any violation of law until his term of probation has been satisfactorily completed"). Probation cannot be revoked for failure to pay a fine or make restitution if the defendant "has made all reasonable efforts to pay yet cannot do so through no fault of his own." Brown v. United States, 900 A.2d 184, 191 (D.C. 2006) (quoting Black v. Romano, 471 U.S. 606, 614 (1985); see also Bearden v. Georgia, 461 U.S. 660 (1983).

Technical violations – failure to report or to advise of a change of address, see Harris v. United States, 612 A.2d 198, 203 n.7 (D.C. 1992) – are often the product of communication difficulties or personality differences between the defendant and the probation officer, or other problems that can be resolved short of revocation. Counsel must speak to the probation officer in advance to determine what precipitated the violation report, and what solutions might be satisfactory; this is particularly important in case the probation officer in court is not the client's own probation officer. Postponement may be requested so that the defendant can comply with amended conditions or demonstrate ability to comply with the original conditions. If a personality conflict cannot be resolved satisfactorily, counsel may request assignment of a new probation officer. Counsel should always try to examine the probation file before the hearing, and may seek a continuance to speak with the specific probation officers who made certain notations in the file.

The sentencing court may learn of D.C. rearrests through the Social Services Division, within 48 hours of the arrest. Other violations may be brought to its attention through a report filed by the probation officer, which specifies the alleged violations, discusses general probation adjustment, and makes a recommendation on whether a "show cause hearing" should be convened. The court then decides whether to initiate revocation proceedings by issuing an order for the defendant to appear in court, with counsel, to show cause why probation should not be revoked.

When a probationer is rearrested in D.C., the judicial officer at presentment may order a five-day bondless hold pursuant to D.C. Code § 23-1322(a). If the new case is a felony, the preliminary hearing is held on the same return day, unless the probation judge "formally elects" to handle it. The preliminary hearing in the new case serves as the first of the two revocation hearings discussed infra Section 3. If a hold is not imposed at presentment, the sentencing judge can decide whether to issue a show-cause order and revoke probation without regard to the time constraints of the five-day hold provision. A revocation hearing held after the preliminary hearing will be heard by the probation judge.

To expedite this procedure, commissioners in arraignment and presentment court sometimes consolidate counsel in "five-day hold" cases, appointing counsel in the new case to represent the defendant in the probation case as well. The consent of neither prior counsel nor the defendant is sought. The difficulty is that new counsel is unfamiliar with the facts and circumstances of the past case, hence unable to correct errors in government proffers or provide explanations or exculpatory information. New counsel should therefore contact prior counsel immediately and obtain as much information as possible about the old case. If it is particularly complicated or if a special relationship existed between prior counsel and the defendant, the defendant may want to object to the removal of counsel, and new counsel may seek to decline appointment.

The court's decision to revoke is left to it sound discretion; the court is permitted "great leeway and flexibility to tailor the decision on revoking probation to each probationer's needs." Brown, 900 A.2d at 188. Revocation "typically involves a two step analysis: (1) a retrospective factual question whether the probationer has violated a condition of probation; and (2) a discretionary determination as to whether violation of a condition warrants revocation…. In making the latter, discretionary decision, the court "must balance the competing interests of the community in safety with the rehabilitative goals of probation." Id. (internal quotation and citation omitted).

2014 Supplement

Washington v. United States*, 8 A.3d 1234 (D.C. 2010). Error to revoke probation for convictions that preceded the imposition of probation.

2. The Timing of Revocation

Probation can be revoked "[a]t any time during the probationary term." D.C. Code § 24-304(a). It can also be revoked even before it begins, if the defendant commits an offense "of such nature as to demonstrate to the court that he is unworthy of probation." Wright v. United States, 315 A.2d 839, 841 (D.C. 1974) (citation omitted). The same principle applies to violation of any condition that can be violated before probation begins. Resper, 527 A.2d at 1259 (contrasting commission of a crime with reporting to one's probation officer).

Similarly, the court can extend its jurisdiction to revoke until after the date on which probation is due to expire, if it takes affirmative action during the term to preserve its jurisdiction. § 24-304; Brown v. United States, 666 A.2d 493 (D.C. 1995) (show cause order issued during probationary term extends term). A rearrest does not toll the probationary term. White v. United States, 564 A.2d 379 (D.C. 1989). Nor may the court use its contempt power to address violations of probation of which it learns after the probationary period has expired. Jones v. United States, 560 A.2d 513 (D.C. 1989).

"[E]x parte extensions of probation are inadvisable because of the potential for prejudice involved." Valentine v. United States, 394 A.2d 1374, 1376 (D.C. 1978). But "exigent circumstances may legitimately arise which require such extensions in order to preserve jurisdiction over a probationer which would otherwise be lost due to expiration of the probation term." Wallace, 475 A.2d at 403. Wallace found such exigency when the court was notified of violations shortly before the probationary term expired, and upheld issuance of an ex parte notice extending probation, followed by a show-cause hearing during the extended term. Id. at 404. The probationer must be afforded the procedural rights listed in Rule 32(b) "before any actual modification of the terms and conditions . . . become[s] effective." Id. In no circumstance may probation be extended or imposed for a period of more than five years from its beginning. D.C. Code § 16-710(b). See Payne v. United States, 792 A.2d 237 (D.C. 2001) (per curiam) (defendant sentenced to period of incarceration with all but thirty days suspended and to three years probation; he served the thirty days over ten consecutive weekends in jail. An order to show cause why probation should not be revoked was issued more than 3 years after sentence was imposed, but within 3 years and one month. Because the probationary term was tolled during the weekends in jail, the trial court still had jurisdiction to revoke probation at the time the show cause order was issued).

3. Deprivation of Liberty Before Revocation

Due process requires that: (1) detention be preceded by a preliminary hearing, with a finding of probable cause to believe that a violation has occurred; and (2) revocation be preceded by a hearing at which it is found that revocation is warranted. Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973). In the wake of Gagnon, then Chief Judge Greene set out procedures for what are now referred to locally as "Peters I" and "Peters II" hearings. See United States v. Peters, 103 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 2217 (D.C. Super. Ct. 1975), incorporated in the concurring opinion of Judge Nebeker, In re A.W., 353 A.2d 686 (D.C. 1976) (per curiam). Those procedures are now detailed in Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32.1.

A Peters I hearing is required only if the defendant is detained pending the final revocation hearing. Smith v. United States, 474 A.2d 1271, 1272-73 (D.C. 1983). It is not required if the defendant is held on a different case. Wallace, 475 A.2d at 403.

a. The Detention Hearing

The defendant is entitled to notice of the detention hearing, of the alleged violations, and of the evidence to be introduced with respect to probable cause. Rule 32.1(a)(1)(A); Dent v. District of Columbia, 465 A.2d 841, 843 (D.C. 1983); A.W., 353 A.2d at 691 (Peters). Peters also suggests that when the presentment court imposes a five-day hold, it should provide notice of the alleged violations, and that the preliminary hearing will serve as an initial revocation hearing. Id. at 693. Hearing commissioners may conduct initial revocation hearings. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 117(f).

The detention hearing may be informal, and reliable hearsay is admissible. Rule 32.1; Harris, 612 A.2d at 202; Patterson v. United States, 570 A.2d 1198, 1199 (D.C. 1990); A.W., 353 A.2d at 694 (Peters); accord Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 489 (1972) (parole revocation). The defendant is entitled to counsel, to testify, to present evidence, and to question adverse witnesses. Rule 32.1(a)(1)(B)-(D); cf. A.W., 353 A.2d at 694 (Peters) (defendant must be allowed "to confront adverse witnesses, unless . . . there would be a specific risk of harm to any witness as a result of such confrontation") (citing Morrissey, 408 U.S. at 487). The right of confrontation precludes basing a detention order solely upon a grand jury indictment.

At the conclusion of the hearing, the court must decide whether there is probable cause to believe that the defendant has violated a condition of probation. If so, the defendant "shall be detained [pending a final revocation hearing], unless the court finds by clear and convincing evidence that the person is not likely to flee or pose a danger to any other person or to the property of others." Rule 46(a)(3); see Rule 32.1(a)(1).

b. The Final Revocation Hearing

If the defendant is detained, the final revocation – Peters II – hearing must be held within sixty days after the detention hearing, or the defendant must be released until a revocation decision is made. Rule 32.1(a)(3). If detention was based on a rearrest, the sixty-day period is tolled by a defense request that the revocation hearing be postponed until final disposition of the new charges. Then, however, the final revocation decision must be made within twenty days after that disposition, or the detention order lifted until the decision is made. Rule 32.1(a)(3).

Greater procedural protections are required at the revocation hearing. Black v. Romano, 471 U.S. 606, 611-12 (1985). "[A] probationer subject to a revocation proceeding is entitled to an opportunity to show not only that he did not violate the conditions, but also that there was a justifiable excuse for any violation or that revocation is not the appropriate disposition….[A] probationer is entitled to (1) written notice of the claimed violation of his probation; (2) disclosure of the evidence against him; (3) an opportunity to be heard in person and to present witnesses and documentary evidence; (4) a neutral hearing body; and (5) a written statement by the factfinder as to the evidence relied on and the reasons for revoking probation." Brown, 900 A.2d at 188-89 (quoting Black 471 U.S. at 612) (citing Gagnon, 411 U.S. at 786); see also Rule 32.1(a)(2); Colter v. United States, 392 A.2d 994 (D.C. 1978) (vacating revocation order where written notice was not provided); A.W., 353 A.2d at 694 (Peters). Reliable hearsay is admissible. Patterson, 570 A.2d at 1199.

The defendant has limited rights to confront and cross-examine adverse witness. See Brown, 900 A.2d 189. Confrontation rights can be limited only if the government establishes "good cause," Gagnon, 411 U.S. at 786 – that "a confrontation would present a clear danger to the witness." A.W., 353 A.2d at 695 (Peters); see Harris, 612 A.2d at 212-13 (Ferren, J., dissenting). That the witness will testify at the criminal trial is insufficient. A.W., 353 A.2d at 695 (Peters). If the court finds good cause, it should hear the testimony in camera, and make (on the record) findings on the relative reliability of the government and defense witnesses, and the weight to be given to the testimony heard in camera. Id.
Since revocation issues go beyond probable cause, cross-examination that is irrelevant to probable cause, and excludable at a preliminary hearing, may well be admissible at the final revocation hearing. Id. at 692 n.8. The court cannot exercise its discretion on whether to revoke without hearing the witnesses' testimony and making a determination on credibility. Id. at 691. Thus, a preliminary hearing – or a transcript thereof – cannot replace the final revocation hearing. Id. at 691. Therefore, the return of an indictment is an insufficient ground for revocation.

The revocation hearing should be held before the sentencing judge; if that judge is unavailable, a judge must be designated by the Chief Judge. Id. at 694. The court must determine whether the defendant has violated the conditions of probation and whether probation should be revoked in the interests of justice. § 24-104. The probationer is entitled to be heard and to present mitigating information. A.W., 353 A.2d at 694-95 (Peters).

For all violations other than commission of a new offense the court must find the violation by a preponderance of the evidence. Harris, 612 A.2d at 203-07. Both the majority and the dissent in Harris declined to address the proper standard to be used when the alleged violation is a criminal offense, though both seem to acknowledge that it may well have to be higher than preponderant evidence. As a matter of law, there is not clear and convincing evidence of a charge of which the defendant has been acquitted. Roper v. United States, 564 A.2d 726, 731 (D.C. 1989). Thus, if probation is revoked based on a charge that later results in acquittal, revocation should be set aside. Cf. A.W., 353 A.2d at 695 n.22 (Peters) ("'it would be unseemly for the probation court to conclude counter to the result of a criminal trial, that an offense has occurred and that it could provide the basis for revocation'") (citation omitted).

The revocation decision is discretionary, and will not be reversed absent an abuse of discretion. Saunders v. United States, 508 A.2d 92, 95 (D.C. 1986); Jacobs v. United States, 399 A.2d 38 (D.C. 1979) (reversing revocation order). An appeal from a revocation order becomes moot if the sentence is served before it is resolved. Smith v. United States, 454 A.2d 1354, 1356 (D.C. 1983). But see Brown, 900 A.2d at 193 (deciding the case on its merits, though defendant had already completed his revocation sentence, because the government did not argue mootness "coupled with the need this case suggests for reemphasizing the due process standards government parole revocation"). The defendant is entitled to a written statement of the evidence upon which the court relied and the reason(s) for revoking probation. The transcript of the hearing may satisfy the written statement requirement but only if it is "complete enough to satisfy the purpose of the written statement requirement, namely, to insure accurate factfinding with respect to any alleged violation and to provide an adequate basis for review to determine if the decision rests on permissible grounds supported by the evidence." Id. at 191-192 (internal quotation omitted).

c. Tactical Considerations

A five-day hold may be ordered at presentment only if the defendant is on probation and "[m]ay flee or pose a danger to any other person or the community." D.C. Code § 23-1322(a). Counsel must bring to the court's attention any circumstances militating against such a finding. Before presentment, counsel should contact the probation officer to discuss the defendant's compliance. If the defendant has been cooperative and the probation officer would not seek revocation but for the new charge, counsel may be able to convince the court not to impose a five-day hold.

If the government may not prevail on the new charge, the defense may wish to postpone the final revocation hearing until the new case is resolved. Conversely, if the probation charge was minor and the new charge is serious, counsel should consider demanding a Peters II hearing. Since that hearing requires the government to produce witnesses to the new charge in order to prove the probation violation, the government will often decline to proceed, resulting in the client's release on the probation charge. If the government does proceed, there is an opportunity for discovery and cross-examination with respect to the new offense. If probation is revoked and the new case is dismissed or results in an acquittal, counsel should petition for reinstatement of probation.

4. Sentencing Upon Revocation

Upon revocation, the court may impose any sentence that would have been lawful at the original sentencing, with one important exception: if a sentence was imposed when probation was ordered, but its execution was suspended, the sentence upon revocation can be "no more severe than the original sentence." Mulky v. United States, 451 A.2d 855, 856 (D.C. 1982); see D.C. Code § 24-304; cf. Moore v. United States, 468 A.2d 1331, 1334 (D.C. 1983) (court can impose Youth Act sentence that is longer than original sentence, because Youth Act sentence is less severe in light of its "nonpunitive" nature and rehabilitative purpose).

- If the court gives lesser sentence on probation revocation than it originally imposed, the court must explicitly say "credit for time served" in order for the client to receive credit from the time he has already served, including time served pre-trial and time served on the original sentence, in the case of a split sentence for example.[30]

- If the court simply imposes the original sentence, i.e., orders that the client serve the rest of the sentence originally imposed, the court does not have to say "credit for time served" in order for client to get credit.

[30] "It is presumed that the sentencing judge who resentences a defendant following the revocation of probation is aware of the Bureau of Prisons' guidelines, which expressly provide for [the assumption that the modified, reduced sentence has already taken into account the previous time served unless the record shows credit was not given], and that the judge intends, when ordering a more lenient sentence to be served, the Bureau to apply those guidelines." Brame v. Palmer, 510 A.2d 229, 230 (D.C. 1986).

As for initial sentencing, counsel should seek the best available alternatives and propose a specific plan, and may want to focus on the defendant's overall adjustment to probation and the reason for revocation. However, the court need not state that it has considered alternatives to incarceration before revoking probation. Black v. Romano, 471 U.S. 606 (1985).

The new sentence may be the subject of a motion to reduce within 120 days under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 35. An appeal may be noted from the revocation order, but it cannot be used to challenge the original conditions of probation, which must be the subject of a timely appeal when they are imposed. See Barnes v. United States, 513 A.2d 249 (D.C. 1986).

J. Restitution, Reparation and Community Service

"Reasonable" restitution or reparation may be required as a condition of probation, in connection with any other sentence, or as a sentence itself. D.C. Code § 16-711(a).[31] In ordering restitution, the court must consider:

> the number of victims, the actual damage of each victim, the resources of the defendant, the defendant's ability to earn, any obligation of the defendant to support dependents, and other matters as pertain to the defendant's ability to make restitution or reparation.

§ 16-711(b). The court must specify the manner in which restitution is to be made (16-711(c); the defendant may seek a hearing at any time regarding the restitution plan. § 16-711(d). The period of payment may or may not be the same as the period of probation. If restitution is not a condition of probation, the remedy for non-compliance is a contempt action. The court must also inform the defendant when a plea is entered that restitution may be required. Holland v. United States, 584 A.2d 13 (D.C. 1990).

"Actual damage" for which restitution may be required "includes known liquidated damages such as medical expenses, lost wages, and other expenses connected with the crime," but not "pain, disfigurement, suffering, and anguish." Sloan v. United States, 527 A.2d 1277, 1290 (D.C. 1987). A restitution order for liquidated damages "can be used as a set-off against any subsequent civil damage verdict." Id. at 1290 n.22; see also Southall v. United States, 716 A.2d 183, 187-88 (D.C. 1998) (trial court erred in setting a restitution amount to compensate the victim for pain and suffering).

Sloan stressed the need for specific findings of fact in support of a restitution order, and "a factual basis in the record to support the court's determination of the amount of restitution." Id. at 1290. If restitution is likely to be ordered, counsel should insist that the government provide reliable information on the nature and amount of the victim's expenses and, where necessary, conduct an independent investigation by interviewing the complainant and obtaining relevant records from hospitals or employers.

[31] Brown v. United States, 579 A.2d 1158 (D.C. 1990), upheld payment of child support as a condition of Youth Act probation, but held that, as with restitution, the court must conduct an inquiry to determine the appropriate amount.

Sloan did not resolve whether a restitution award can include losses for which the victim has received compensation through insurance policies or employment benefits. While a civil plaintiff can recover notwithstanding collateral source payments, see generally District of Columbia v. Jackson, 451 A.2d 867, 870-73 (D.C. 1982), the restitution statute refers only to the victim's "actual damage," § 16-711(b) (emphasis added), which does not include amounts for which the complainant is otherwise compensated. Including such recovery in a criminal restitution order would also make restitution the functional equivalent of a civil judgment, without the jury trial on damages that is guaranteed by the Seventh Amendment.

Restitution may be ordered as to cases dismissed in a plea agreement, if the defendant agrees to the plan. Hill v. United States, 529 A.2d 788, 791 (D.C. 1987) ("not every imaginable restitution plan may be offered as the basis of an alternative to incarceration[, but this plan was] circumscribed by reasonableness"). Hill suggests that if a defendant wants to change the terms of restitution, the proper vehicle is a motion for a hearing under § 16-711(d).

The court cannot incarcerate the defendant for failure to pay restitution, unless it finds that the defendant has not made "sufficient bona fide efforts" to pay or that adequate alternative forms of punishment do not exist. Bearden v. Georgia, 461 U.S. 660, 661 (1983). It can, however, condition a sentenced misdemeanant's work release privileges upon payment of restitution (out of wages earned while on work release). Davidson v. United States, 467 A.2d 1282, 1285 (D.C. 1983).

The court may also order "reasonable" community service as a "condition of probation or as a sentence itself." § 16-712(a). The term of community service cannot exceed five years. In ordering community service, the court must consider the defendant's physical and mental health, age, education, employment and vocational training, family circumstances, and financial conditions. § 16-712(b). A motion to modify or revisit the plan may be made under § 16-712(d).

K. Court Costs

Every sentence must include an assessment of "costs" of the prosecution, pursuant to the Victims of Violent Crimes Compensation Act of 1996, D.C. Code §§ 4-501 to 518. Although the purpose of the Act is to compensate victims of enumerated offenses, § 4-501(6), the requirement affects convictions for all offenses. The court must assess $100 for each violation of D.C. Code §50-2201.05, fleeing from scene of accident; driving under the influence of liquor or drugs; "between $50 and $250 for other serious traffic and misdemeanor offenses;"[32] and "between $100 and $5,000 for each felony offense." § 4-516(a). Wages earned during incarceration, parole or probation may be levied. Id. To determine whether a complainant is obtaining compensation from the fund, contact the Crime Victim Compensation Program at 727-8445. On the provisions generally, see Morris v. District of Columbia Dept. of Employment Services, 530 A.2d 683 (D.C. 1987).

[32] The assessment applies to all misdemeanor offenses, not just "serious" misdemeanors. Parrish v. District of Columbia, 718 A.2d 133, 135 (D.C. 1998). Moreover, the trial court may not waive the assessment. Id. at 136.

III. COMPUTATION AND SERVICE OF SENTENCE

A sentence which is imposed does not actually commence being served until "the point of 'transfer of a convicted individual from the judiciary, which pronounced the sentence, to the executive, which administers it.'" Francis v. United States, 715 A.2d 894, 898 n.9 (D.C. 1998) (quoting Thomas v. United States, 388 A.2d 1231, 1232 (D.C. 1978)). In Francis, the trial court imposed a split sentence, but stayed its execution at the request of the defense. In the meantime, the trial court realized that it had failed to take into account Department of Corrections policy on credit for time served, so it modified the sentence upward to effectuate its original intent regarding how much time the defendant would actually serve in custody. The Court of Appeals affirmed, reasoning that (1) the increased sentence did not violate double jeopardy because the sentence was stayed and was not yet being served at the time of the upward modification; and (2) as a court of general jurisdiction, the Superior Court had jurisdiction in these unique circumstances to modify the sentence upward to conform to the clear intent expressed by the court at the original sentencing hearing. Id. at 899-904.

A. Consecutive or Concurrent Sentences

All sentences run consecutive to one another, unless the court expressly orders that they run concurrently. D.C. Code § 23-112; Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(c)(2); see also Bragdon v. United States, 717 A.2d 878 (D.C. 1998) (separate Youth Act commitments imposed on multiple charges are deemed consecutive unless the sentencing judge explicitly states otherwise). Counsel must ensure that the judgment and commitment order (J & C) accurately reflects that the sentences are to run concurrently, if the judge so orders.

The voluntary sentencing guidelines have rules about when counts must be run consecutively or concurrently with each other and about when consecutive versus concurrent sentencing on counts is left purely to the judge's discretion. For example, one crime of violence per victim per event must be sentenced consecutively to others when there are multiple victims in one event. Multiple non-violence crimes in a single event must be run concurrently. See Chapter 6 of the Voluntary Sentencing Guidelines Manual. It is important to note that "crime of violence" is defined in the Manual, see the glossary at Chapter 7, and that this definitional list does not match the definition at D.C. Code § 23-1331(4). "Event" is also defined in the Manual. There is a specific mitigating factor that allows the judge to depart from the recommended sentence if "the consecutive/concurrent sentencing policy results in a guideline sentence so excessive in relation to the seriousness of the offense and history of the defendant that imposition of the guideline sentence would result in manifest injustice." However, "[a] departure based solely on this factor shall not result in a sentence that is less than the sentence that would result if all guideline sentences are concurrent. See Mitigating Factor (9) of Section 5.2.3 of the Manual. There is a corresponding aggravating factor if the consecutive/concurrent policies result in too lenient a sentence. See Aggravating Factor (10) of Section 5.2.2 of the Manual.

B. Credit for Time in Pretrial Custody

Credit for time served is due "for time spent in custody or on parole as a result of the offense for which the sentence was imposed." D.C. Code § 24-221.03(a). It is given automatically if the defendant is incarcerated pre-conviction on the current charge, and no other. Time "in custody due to a charge that resulted in a dismissal or acquittal . . . shall be credited against any sentence that is based upon a charge for which a warrant or commitment detainer was placed during the pendency of custody." § 24-221.03(b). Finally, credit is due for "all time actually spent, pursuant to a court order, . . . in a hospital for examination purposes or treatment prior to trial or pending an appeal." § 24-221.03(c).[33] Shelton v. United States, 721 A.2d 603 (D.C. 1998) (defendant must receive credit for time served confined at Saint Elizabeth's Hospital pursuant to the Sexual Psychopath Act following his guilty plea and prior to sentencing). Credit for pretrial custody ceases to accrue on the date that the defendant commences service of any unrelated sentence.

When a client has more than one case, counsel must know the client's bond status in each, because the statute provides automatic credit only if the person is convicted in a case in which custody was in place. The following hypothetical illustrates this point:

> Defendant is on release in case A when he is arrested and charged with a new offense, B. A surety bond is set in B, which the defendant does not post. He later pleads guilty to charge A and charge B is dismissed.

This defendant will not receive credit for time in custody before the plea because he will be sentenced on the offense for which he was not in custody. If the court orders credit to which the defendant is not legally entitled, the Department of Corrections will simply ignore that notation. To obtain credit, counsel should ask that the sentence reflect the credit that is administratively foreclosed – that is, that the court impose a sentence reduced by the amount of time served but not credited.

To avoid having to rely on the court's cooperation at the end of the case, counsel should take steps to ensure that credit is being accrued. If the defendant will not be able to post bond in the new case, counsel should move the court to impose a nominal bond in all cases so that the defendant is earning credit for all, regardless of which one ultimately goes to sentencing.[34] If consecutive sentences are ultimately imposed, the defendant will receive credit toward the aggregate.

Department of Corrections computation practices have created an anomaly in credit for split sentences. If the defendant serves the unsuspended portion of the sentence and is released on probation, but the court subsequently revokes probation and reduces the sentence, the defendant may be denied credit for the time already served. Bureau of Prisons treats the reduced sentence

[33] See 18 U.S.C. § 3585: "A sentence to a term of imprisonment commences on the date the defendant is received in custody awaiting transportation to, or arrives voluntarily to commence service of sentence at, the official detention facility at which the sentence is to be served…A defendant shall be given credit toward the service of a term of imprisonment for any time he has spent in official detention prior to the date the sentence commences – (1) as a result of the offense for which the sentence was imposed; or (2) as a result of any other charge for which the defendant was arrested after the commission of the offense for which the sentence was imposed; that has not been credited against another sentence."

[34] A judge's idea of "nominal" may range from $10 to $1,000. A motion to reduce, reminding the court that the bond was intended to be nominal, may be required if the case that originally held the defendant was dismissed.

as a new sentence, and assumes that the court took the time served into account when it reduced the sentence. Counsel must therefore ask the court to specify "credit to be given for time served" on the Judgment and Commitment Order – an endorsement that in all other cases has no effect on the way credits are computed, but in this situation will compel the BOP to credit the period already served toward service of the reduced sentence. The alternative is for the court simply to consider the time served in imposing the sentence.

Counsel should obtain a copy of the J & C from the clerk or the jacket, and ask the client to forward a copy of the time computation ("face sheet") after the sentence has begun, in order to check the accuracy of the computation and the credit to be given.

C. Credits During Incarceration

An inmate serving a sentence for an offense committed on or after August 5, 2000 (the determinate system) may receive "good time" credit towards the completion of his sentence. D.C. Code § 24-403.01(d) states that such good time credit is controlled by 18 U.S.C. § 3624(b)(1), which allows credit of up to 15% of the inmate's sentence. In practice, BOP credits the credit time when projecting the inmate's release date; disciplinary infractions can reduce the credit and move the defendant's projected release date closer to his maximum release date, 100% of the sentence imposed by the court. For inmates serving time on offenses committed between June 22, 1994 and August 5, 2000, institutional good time is not available. [35] Educational good time and meritorious good time are available to misdemeanants pursuant to D.C. Code §§ 24-221.01 – 221.05. An inmate serving a felony sentence for a "non-violent offense," an offense not included in the definition of crime of violence at § 23-1331(4), may receive up to a one-year reduction in his sentence upon successful completion of a substance abuse treatment program in accordance wit 18 U.S.C. § 3621(e)(2). See D.C. Code § 24-403.01(d-1).

Time spent on probation receives no credit. Time spent on supervised release receives no credit. Effective May 20, 2009, credit for a parolee's "street time" is now available in some instances. See Chapter 12, Parole and Supervised Release, Section H., Final Revocation Decision.

D. The Effect of Parole Violator Warrants

Many defendants who await sentencing are also facing parole revocation, based on the new charge or unrelated violations. The status of a parole violation warrant determines whether the client can avoid serving consecutive sentences. The U.S. Parole Commission has the authority to revoke parole and to issue violator warrants for D.C. parolees. The controlling factor is execution of the warrant, not whether the warrant has been issued nor whether parole has been revoked. There are instructions on all parole warrants by the USPC for D.C. parole violators, that if a parole violator is committed on bond or subject to some other hold, the outstanding parole warrant should not be executed but instead as a detainer by the holding authority. A detainer is simply an unexecuted warrant. See Moody v. Daggett, 429 U.S. 78 (1976). Unless the bond in the new case is paid or, any other hold is lifted, the parole warrant will not be executed.

If a parole warrant has been issued and lodged as a detainer – but not executed – at the time of sentencing on the new offense, the court cannot make the new sentence concurrent with the parole sentence, because, technically, the defendant is not serving the parole sentence. Therefore, it may[36] be in the client's interest to have the warrant executed, giving the judge the discretion to make any new sentence concurrent.[37] This will also require the USPC to schedule and hold a revocation hearing "within a reasonable time," usually within 60 to 90 days. See Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1971).[38]

Execution of a parole warrant means the defendant is in custody on the parole case. The time remaining on the parole sentence, or "backup time," begins to run when the warrant is executed. See Wells v. United States, 802 A.2d 352 (D.C. 2002) (defendant not entitled to credit toward D.C. sentence while he was at liberty after being paroled by Virginia authorities, but before D.C. parole officials executed a parole violation against him). Pre-sentence credit on the new case ceases to accrue. Ali v. District of Columbia, 612 A.2d 228 (D.C. 1992). See also Hill v. District of Columbia Board of Parole, 766 A.2d 497 (D.C. 2000). Since the warrant has been executed, the judge on the new case can make any new sentence concurrent. To do so, the court must be explicit and counsel should insure the court expresses the intent on the Judgment and Commitment Order. See D.C. Code § 23-112.

Detainers are placed in the client's Department of Corrections file in the records office at the holding institution. If the USPC does not lift the detainer, it will continue in effect until the client is released in the new case. The warrant will then be executed and the client will be entitled to a formal revocation hearing. At the revocation hearing, the USPC will have the options of reinstating parole, revoking parole and reparoling immediately, or revoking parole and scheduling a rehearing at some time in the future, within the remaining time on the parole term.

E. Defendants Brought to the District from Other Jurisdictions

Defendants incarcerated in other jurisdictions may be returned to the District for trial pursuant to a writ of habeas corpus ad prosequendum or the Interstate Agreement on Detainers (IAD). Upon conclusion of the proceedings in the District (but before execution of sentence), the defendant must be returned to the foreign jurisdiction. Because two jurisdictions are involved, problems occasionally arise in computing and executing sentences imposed in the District.

[36] Thought should be given to whether it is desirable to have a parole revocation hearing prior to trial or other disposition on the new case because the USPC will not sua sponte postpone the hearing to await disposition of the new case. Counsel may, however request that USPC take the parole case off the docket until such time as counsel decides to put it back on, for example when the trial on the new matter has concluded.

[37] Counsel should realize, whether it is possible to post bond and cause execution of the parole detainer warrant, posting bond will change client's status from pretrial detention credit to serving parole term or backup time. Some thought should be given to which is more valuable – pretrial credit or credit against the backup time. One tactic that will both maximize pretrial credit and preserve eligibility for a concurrent sentence is to delay posting bond until the day before sentencing on the new case.

[38] See infra Chapter 12, Parole and Supervised Release.

If the defendant is under sentence in another jurisdiction and a D.C. court imposes a consecutive sentence, the defendant will be returned to the foreign jurisdiction, then returned to D.C. for service of the sentence. Technically, a defendant who must return to a foreign jurisdiction is not "delivered into the custody of the Attorney General of the United States," pursuant to 18 U.S.C. § 3568, for the purpose of commencing the District sentence until the defendant is brought back to the District after completion of the other jurisdiction's sentence.[39] See Crawford v. Jackson, 589 F.2d 693 (D.C. Cir. 1978); cf. Millard v. Roach, 631 A.2d 1217 (D.C. 1993) (granting credit toward D.C. sentence for time served in foreign jurisdiction as equitable relief in unique circumstances).

The D.C. court cannot impose a concurrent sentence; it can effectuate one by requesting a federal designation and requesting that the Federal Bureau of Prisons designate the state institution as the situs for service of the D.C. Code sentence. See 18 U.S.C. § 482(b). This designation is virtually guaranteed if such a recommendation is made on the Judgment & Commitment Order (J & C).

The situation is less clear if the defendant has not yet been sentenced in the other jurisdiction, because there is no sentence to which the District sentence could be concurrent. Counsel should still attempt to persuade the judge to record on the J & C an intent that the sentence commence immediately.[40] If the order does not specify immediate commencement of the sentence, credit is not received until the defendant is actually committed to the custody of the Attorney General to serve it.

IV. INCREASED SENTENCE AFTER RETRIAL

The Due Process Clause limits the court's authority to increase a sentence after retrial. Increasing a sentence to penalize a defendant for seeking a new trial "'would be patently unconstitutional.'" North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 724 (1969) (citation omitted). Because "due process also requires that a defendant be freed of apprehension of . . . a retaliatory motivation on the part of the sentencing judge," the reasons for an increased sentence must "affirmatively appear" on the record and "be based upon objective information concerning identifiable conduct on the part of the defendant occurring after the time of the original sentencing proceeding." Id. at 725-26. Due process forbids only an increased sentence actually motivated by vindictiveness toward a defendant for having exercised the right to appeal.

[39] Defendants brought to the District by a writ are not entitled to credit on the D.C. sentence for time in pretrial custody here, which is generally credited to the sentence being served in the other jurisdiction. If the other jurisdiction will not give credit for this time, counsel should ask the court to adjust the D.C. sentence to compensate for what would otherwise be "dead time." If counsel can prove to the D.C. records office that the foreign jurisdiction did not give credit for time spent here, it may be possible to have this time "administratively credited." The defendant must undertake this effort; records personnel will not do it automatically. Also, the U.S. Marshal Service's Prisoner Coordination Section will not return the defendant to the foreign jurisdiction until it receives a memorandum from the U.S. Attorney's Office indicating that the District prosecution is concluded. Counsel should contact the prosecutor to ensure that the Marshal Service is notified promptly upon completion of the case.

[40] "_____ to _____ years, sentence to commence as of today. The court recommends a federal designation and that this designation be to the [state] facility to which the defendant is to be returned."

Wasman v. United States, 468 U.S. 559, 568 (1984). A vindictive motive is presumed in the absence of other articulated bases for the increased penalty. Id. at 569.

Cases following Pearce have limited the situations that give rise to the presumption of vindictiveness. Wasman, for example, was pending trial for mail fraud when he was convicted of unrelated false statements. The sentencing judge in the false statements case did not consider the pending mail fraud. Wasman was again convicted of false statements after reversal on appeal; in the interim, he had pled nolo contendere to the mail fraud. At the second sentencing for the false statements, the judge took into account the mail fraud conviction. The Supreme Court upheld the stiffer sentence, even though the defendant did not actually engage in any misconduct between the first and second trials; the fact of the conviction was an event that threw "new light upon the defendant's 'life, health, habits, conduct, and mental and moral propensities.'" Wasman, 468 U.S. at 570-71 (citation omitted).

Texas v. McCullough, 475 U.S. 134 (1986), also found no due process violation. A jury sentenced McCullough to twenty years for murder. At a retrial after reversal on appeal, the government presented new evidence that McCullough, not his accomplices, actually stabbed the victim. After conviction, McCullough chose to be sentenced by the court, which imposed a fifty-year sentence, pointing to that additional evidence as well as the newly presented fact that McCullough had been released from prison shortly before the homicide. The Supreme Court found those reasons sufficient to rebut a presumption of vindictiveness. It also implied that the presumption might not apply where the trial court itself granted the motion for a new trial and different sentencing authorities were involved. See Chaffin v. Stynchcombe, 412 U.S. 17 (1973) (no presumption of vindictiveness where second sentence was imposed by jury).

Alabama v. Smith, 490 U.S. 794 (1989), further restricted Pearce and overruled Simpson v. Rice, its companion case, holding that the presumption of vindictiveness is not triggered when the first conviction was based on a guilty plea and the second followed a trial; then, > the increase in sentence is not more likely than not attributable to the vindictiveness on the part of the sentencing judge. . . . [T]he relevant sentencing information available to the judge after the plea will usually be considerably less than that available after a trial.

Id. at 801. The Court of Appeals has declined to presume vindictiveness in the converse situation: where a defendant pleads guilty after reversal of an initial conviction. Eldridge v. United States, 618 A.2d 690, 699 (D.C. 1992) ("As long as the total length of the new sentence on the remaining counts does not exceed the total length of [the] previous sentence on all counts . . . and there is no other evidence of any retaliatory motive, such resentencing offends neither due process nor the double jeopardy clause").

The Due Process Clause also limits the prosecutor's discretion to recharge an offense or add new counts. See, e.g., Blackledge v. Perry, 417 U.S. 21 (1974); Wynn v. United States, 386 A.2d 695, 697-98 (D.C. 1978) (vacating added charge); United States v. Jamison, 505 F.2d 407 (D.C. Cir. 1974) (dismissing indictments for first-degree murder). The defendant in Blackledge was convicted of misdemeanor assault. After he exercised his right to a trial de novo, the prosecutor obtained a felony indictment based on the same conduct. The Supreme Court noted that the prosecutor > clearly has a considerable stake in discouraging convicted misdemeanants from . . obtaining a trial de novo. . . . [I]f the prosecutor has the means readily at hand to discourage such appeals – by "upping the ante" . . . – the State can insure that only the most hardy defendants will brave the hazards of a de novo trial. . . .

>
> A person convicted of an offense is entitled to pursue his statutory right to a trial de novo, without apprehension that the State will retaliate by substituting a more serious charge for the original one, thus subjecting him to a significantly increased potential period of incarceration.

417 U.S. at 27-28; see also Thigpen v. Roberts, 468 U.S. 27 (1984) (reaffirming Blackledge on similar facts).

If the defendant can show "a realistic likelihood of prosecutorial vindictiveness," the burden is "on the government to answer or explain the allegations." United States v. Schiller, 424 A.2d 51, 56 (D.C. 1980). United States v. Goodwin, 457 U.S. 368 (1982), however, held that the presumption of vindictiveness did not apply where a prosecutor added felony charges after the defendant, who was originally charged with misdemeanors, insisted on a jury trial. The Court analogized Goodwin's situation to that of the defendant in Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357 (1978), which held that a threat to add charges if a plea offer was rejected did not violate due process.

POST-CONVICTION LITIGATION

This chapter discusses various avenues for challenging a conviction or sentence (other than the direct appeal) and the types of claims that may be raised. Specifically, the chapter discusses the purposes, procedures, and types of claims which can be made in a Motion for Judgment of Acquittal or arrest of Judgment under Rules 29 and 34, Motion for a New Trial under Rule 35, motions challenging the validity of detention under D.C. Code § 23-110 (with a particular emphasis on claims of inadequate assistance of counsel), motions under the Innocence Protection Act, motions to correct or reduce sentence under Rule 35, motions to seal records, and petitions seeking writs of habeas corpus under the federal code and D.C. Code and petitions for Writs of Error Coram Nobis. The chapter includes an Appendix outlining the time frames in which these post-conviction applications must be made.

I. MOTION FOR JUDGMENT OF ACQUITTAL OR ARREST OF JUDGMENT

The post-trial motion for judgment of acquittal (MJOA) seeks review of the sufficiency of the evidence. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 29(a), (c). A motion for a judgment of acquittal may be made or renewed either when a jury reaches a verdict or when a jury is discharged without having returned a verdict. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 29(c). Upon this motion, the court may set aside the verdict and enter a judgment of acquittal or, if there has been no verdict, simply enter a judgment of acquittal. Id. The defense is not required to have made a motion for judgment of acquittal prior to the case's submission to the jury. Id. A motion for arrest of judgment alleges that the indictment or information does not charge an offense or that the court lacked jurisdiction. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 34.

Counsel may make or renew a motion for judgment of acquittal or move for an arrest of judgment within seven days after the jury is discharged, a verdict or plea is entered, or within "such further time as the Court may fix during the 7-day period." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 29(c); Super. Ct. Crim. R. 34. Defense counsel should raise these issues as early as possible. See United States v. Bradford, 482 A.2d 430, 435 n.4 (D.C. 1984) (construing indictment liberally in favor of validity because the motion for arrest of judgment came "so late"). Counsel who needs more time for a new trial motion should make an oral request immediately after the entrance of the guilty verdict.[1]

There is no distinction between subsections (a), (b), and (c) of Rule 29 for double jeopardy purposes. Id. Retrial is thus barred under the Double Jeopardy Clause should a motion for judgment of acquittal be granted after a deadlocked jury is discharged. See United States v. Martin Linen Supply Co., 430 U.S. 564, 575-76 (1977) (judgments of acquittal are acquittals in substance and form).

[1] The seven-day time limit is not jurisdictional, but rather is a claim-processing rule. Eberhart v. United States, 546 U.S. 12 (2005) (per curiam). Where the government fails to raise a defense of untimeliness until after the court has reached the merits, it forfeits that defense. Id. at 19.

The government may, however, seek appellate review of a successful MJOA after a jury returns a guilty verdict, as reinstatement does not require retrial. Bradford, 482 A.2d at 435 n.5.; United States v. Hubbard, 429 A.2d 1334, 1337 (D.C. 1981). The Court of Appeals will review the lower court decision under an abuse of discretion standard in order to determine whether, in the light most favorable to the prosecution, "any rational trier of fact could have found the elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt." United States v. Foster, 557 F.3d 650, 655 (D.C. Cir. 2009) (motion for a mistrial) (quoting United States v. Dykes, 406 F.3d 717, 721 (D.C. Cir. 2005).

Motion for Judgment of Acquittal:

- ✓ Defense counsel should attempt to raise issues as early as possible
  - Post-trial MJOA seeks review of the sufficiency of the evidence
  - Motion for arrest of judgment alleges that the indictment or information does not charge an offense or that the court lacked jurisdiction
- ✓ If counsel requires more time, make an oral request for a new trial motion immediately after the entrance of the guilty verdict

II. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL

A. Motions Filed Within Seven Days

On a defendant's motion, a court may grant a new trial if "the interests of justice so require." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 33. To do so, the trial court must sit "as a thirteenth juror" and decide whether "a fair trial requires that the [claim presented in the motion for new trial] be made available to the jury." Brodie v. United States, 295 F.2d 157, 160 (D.C. Cir. 1961) (citations omitted), cited in Godfrey v. United States, 454 A.2d 299 (D.C.1982). Even after a bench trial, a court may vacate its judgment, take additional testimony, and enter a new judgment on the defendant's motion. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 33. Motions for new trial may be made on the basis of new evidence or any other ground. Id.

A new trial motion based on any ground other than newly discovered evidence must be filed within seven days of the verdict, or within "such further time as the Court may fix during the 7-day period."[2] Super. Ct. Crim. R. 33.[3] As with a motion for an MJOA or an arrest of judgment, counsel who expect to file a new trial motion should consider making an oral motion immediately after the entrance of the guilty verdict and requesting more time. Motions based on new evidence must be filed within three years of the judgment of guilty. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 33. If a case is on appeal, the trial court can only grant the motion once the case is remanded. Id.

[2] The time limit is non-jurisdictional as with motions under Rule 29. Therefore, the government will waive an untimeliness objection should it fail to raise this issue prior to the court reaching the merits. Eberhart, 546 U.S. 12.

[3] Motions based on newly discovered evidence are treated in the next section.

A Rule 33 motion filed within seven days of verdict may present any legal or factual claim. See, e.g., Herbin v. United States, 683 A.2d 437, 440 (D.C. 1996) (remanded to determine credibility of recantation of principal government witness and effect it would have on jury); Geddie v. United States, 663 A.2d 531, 533 (D.C. 1995) (raising issue that co-defendant's threats prevented the accused from testifying at trial); Gant v. United States, 467 A.2d 968 (D.C. 1983) (motion for new trial based upon prosecutorial misconduct); Godfrey, 454 A.2d 293, 301 n.28 (D.C. 1982) (motion for new trial alleging ineffective assistance of counsel). The court may not grant a new trial on a ground not asserted in the motion, and may not initiate the motion. See United States v. Braman, 327 A.2d 530, 534 (D.C. 1974) (per curiam). Evidence supporting the claim may have been newly discovered or available to the defendant during trial. Godfrey v. United States, 454 A.2d 293, 299 n.19 (D.C. 1982).

A motion for a new trial filed within seven days of a verdict is governed by a "more lenient" standard than a motion filed later in the process, as it is "substantially unaffected by the usual considerations favoring finality of judgments." Godfrey, 454 A.2d at 299 (quoting Sellars v. United States, 401 A.2d 974, 979 (D.C. 1979)). Denials of motions for new trial are reviewed on appeal under an abuse of discretion standard. Graham v. United States, 703 A.2d 825, 830 (D.C. 1997). A lower court's failure to consider a relevant factor, or consideration of a wrongful factor, can be considered an abuse of discretion. O'Brien v. United States, 962 A.2d 282, 314 (D.C. 2008) (discussing government's knowing presentation of false evidence).

"Generally, a hearing is not required for a motion for a new trial." Graham, 703 A.2d 825, 831 (D.C. 1997) (citing Geddie, 663 A.2d at 534). A hearing should be held if: (1) the allegations in the motion raise factual questions outside the record; and (2) are supplemented by adequate supporting materials such as affidavits "disclosing the source of . . . information or verifying the details" upon which the motion is based. Payne v. United States, 516 A.2d 484, 501 (D.C. 1986) (per curiam) (quoting Khaalis v. United States, 408 A.2d 313, 360 (D.C. 1979)); see also Wilson v. United States, 380 A.2d 1001, 1004 (D.C. 1977). However, where a colorable claim is made even without affidavits, the DCCA has reversed a conviction based on the trial court's denial of a hearing on a Rule 33 motion. Lyons v. United States, 833 A.2d 481 (D.C. 2003)).

The defense may be entitled to discovery relevant to a motion for new trial. In Gibson v. United States, 566 A.2d 473, 478-80 (D.C. 1989), the Court of Appeals remanded to permit discovery of the similarities between the sexual assault for which Gibson was convicted and a series of rapes committed by another man, based upon "compelling facts" indicating that the other man may have perpetrated the rape. The court held that discovery procedures derived from civil and criminal rules can be used to develop a new trial motion "in order that the new trial motion receive fair and meaningful consideration." Id. (quoting Harris v. Nelson, 394 U.S. 286, 300 (1968)). The trial court's decision whether to grant or deny post-trial discovery is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. See, e.g., Brooks v. United States, 683 A.2d 1369, 1371 (D.C. 1995) (per curiam).

Tactical Considerations For issues to be raised in motion: The question of whether to raise a particular issue in a post-trial motion for new trial or to pursue it initially on direct appeal requires counsel to make a tactical decision guided by a number of considerations. A motion for a new trial is not necessary to preserve an appellate issue unless the issue requires additional factual development. However, including a legal claim in a new trial motion may not cure a failure to object at trial for purposes of appellate review. Counsel should move for a new trial if there is a significant likelihood that the judge will grant relief or the claim requires development of the factual record, there is little point in moving for a new trial. Finally, while a new trial motion may serve as a vehicle to provide new authority to a judge who has previously rejected an argument, it also creates a risk that the motion judge may find any error "harmless." See Davis v. United States, 564 A.2d 31, 33-35 (D.C. 1989) (setting standard of review for trial court findings relating to harmlessness).

B. Newly Discovered Evidence

When a new trial motion is filed more than seven days after verdict, the defendant must establish that:

> (1) the evidence was newly discovered since the trial; (2) the defendant was diligent in attempting to procure the newly discovered evidence; (3) the evidence relied on is not merely cumulative or impeaching; (4) the evidence is material to the issues involved; and (5) the evidence is of such a nature that in a new trial it would likely result in an acquittal.

Godfrey v. United States, 454 A.2d 293, 299 n.18 citing, Thompson v. United States, 188 F.2d 652, 653 (D.C. Cir. 1951) and Heard v. United States, 245 A.2d 125, 126 (D.C. 1968) (the ''Thompson-Heard'' test); accord Byers v. United States, 649 A.2d, 279 287 (D.C. 1999); Smith v. United States, 466 A.2d 429, 432-33 (D.C. 1983). The court must sit "as a thirteenth juror" to "determine whether a fair trial requires that the [claim presented in the motion for new trial] be made available to the jury." Geddie, 663 A.2d at 533 (claim that defendant did not testify because intimidated by do-defendants and his associates) (citations omitted). If the credibility of otherwise pertinent newly discovered evidence is questioned, the court must hold an evidentiary hearing in order to assess its credibility. See, e.g., Thomas v. United States, 942 A.2d 1180 (D.C. 2008). Failure to do so is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. Id. (failure to hold an evidentiary hearing to assess credibility of an exonerating letter written post-trial is an abuse of discretion).

A motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence must be made within three years of the verdict or finding of guilty. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 33. This time limit is jurisdictional, meaning a court cannot consider the claims beyond the statutory time limits. Diamen v. United States, 725 A.2d 501, 506 (D.C. 1999). However, where newly discovered evidence is relevant to a defendant's claim that his constitutional rights have been violated, that evidence may be presented and considered pursuant to D.C. Code § 23-110, and thus is not subject to the Rule 33 time limitations. See Diamen, 725 A.2d at 511-12 (discussing claim of actual innocence and affirming conviction).[4] (Ultimately, relief was granted by the D.C. district court under 28 U.S.C. § 2241. Eastridge v. United States, 372 F.Supp.2d 26 (D.D.C. 2005).

[4] Motions for a new trial pursuant to D.C. Code § 23-110 are discussed infra Section III.

2014 Supplement

Ingram v. United States*, 40 A.3d 887 (D.C. 2012). No abuse of discretion for trial court to deny without a hearing defendant's motion for a new trial based on evidence to be given by a former co-defendant, where no affidavit was submitted by the former co-defendant and the co-defendant's testimony would have contradicted the "compelling" testimony of other witnesses who had testified at trial.

Medina v. United States*, 61 A.3d 637 (D.C. 2013). Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying motion to overturn conviction or for new trial based on newly discovered evidence where officer witness's testimony at adverse action hearing post-trial did not differ significantly from statements made at trial.

Paige v. United States*, 25 A.3d 74 (D.C. 2011). Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying motion for new trial based upon ineffective assistance of counsel and newly discovered evidence where defense argument that trial counsel had failed to conduct reasonable investigation of potential exculpatory witnesses was contradicted by trial counsel testimony that defense team had interviewed more than two dozen witnesses and had gone door-to-door in neighborhood and where court determined that defendant's claims of "new" evidence – indictment of detective for tax fraud and statements of exculpatory witnesses – were untimely raised, had been previously ruled upon, or could have been known through exercise of "reasonable" or "due" diligence.

Richardson v. United States*, 8 A.3d 1245 (D.C. 2010). Not error to deny actual innocence claim based on "new evidence" where "new evidence" constituted an affidavit by a witness whose existence was revealed, at a minimum, on first day of trial but whom defendant never attempted to contact at the time, and where information obtained from affidavit and subsequent hearing testimony demonstrated a discrepancy between witness testimony as to the sequence of events that could have been used for impeachment of identification but not to prove actual innocence.

C. Recanting Witnesses

When a witness asserts he or she did not tell the truth at trial and wants to recant that testimony, a trial judge in deciding a new trial motion based on a recanting witness must first decide whether the recantation is credible.

If the court does not credit the recantation, the new trial motion must be denied. See Tyer v. United States, 912 A.2d 1150, 1167 (D.C. 2006) (trial testimony credible and recantation made under "intimidating circumstances"); Herbin, 683 A.2d at 441. Denials of new trial motions are reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. Tyer, 912 A.2d at 1166. If the court credits the recantation, it must apply the Thompson-Heard newly-discovered evidence test.[5] This is a prospective approach, in which the court must determine whether the evidence is of such a nature that a new trial "would probably produce an acquittal." United States v. Williams, 233 F.3d 592, 593-95 (D.C. 2000).

[5]The D.C. Court of Appeals avoided deciding between the Thompson standard and the Larrison standard, applied in other circuits, until 1991, but explicitly chose the Thompson standard in United States v. Williams, 233 F.3d 592, 594-95 (D.C. 1991).

D. Suppressed Exculpatory Evidence and Government Use of Perjured Testimony

A defendant generally must make a strong showing in order to reopen a case following a determination of guilt. A more lenient burden of proof applies when the motion is based on exculpatory evidence that was in the possession of the government or its agents at the time of trial.[6]

> [T]he fact that such evidence was available to the prosecutor and not submitted to the defense places it in a different category than if it had simply been discovered from a neutral source after trial. For that reason the defendant should not have to satisfy the severe burden of demonstrating that the newly discovered evidence probably would have resulted in an acquittal. If the standard applied to the usual motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence were the same when the evidence was in the State's possession as when it was found in a neutral source, there would be no special significance to the prosecutor's obligation to serve the cause of justice.

United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 111 (1976).

Due process requires reversal of a conviction for prosecutorial failure to disclose material exculpatory evidence.[7] Evidence is considered material if "there is a reasonable probability that, had the evidence been disclosed to the defense, the result of the proceeding would have been different. A 'reasonable probability' is a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome." United States v. Bagley, 473 U.S. 667, 682 (1985); see also Catlett v. United States, 545 A.2d 1202, 1217 (D.C. 1988) (quoting Bagley).[8] This standard applies whether the favorable evidence is directly exculpatory or could have been used to impeach a government witness. Bagley, 473 U.S. at 676; Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150, 154 (1972) (inducements offered to informants who testified at trial).

An even more searching standard of review applies when the government knowingly offers false testimony. "[A] conviction obtained by the knowing use of perjured testimony must be set aside

[6] The Brady doctrine applies to information relevant to sentencing as well as to guilt; Brady itself involved suppression of evidence that could have mitigated the defendant's sentence. Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83, 87 (1963).

[7] Because both the suppression of exculpatory evidence and the knowing use of perjured testimony violate due process, these claims may also be raised in a motion to vacate sentence and judgment pursuant to D.C. Code § 23-110.

[8] The D.C. Court of Appeals has stated that a trial court's decision regarding materiality under Brady is reviewed only for "reasonableness." Derrington v. United States, 488 A.2d 1314, 1339 (D.C. 1985); Davies v. United States, 476 A.2d 658, 661 (D.C. 1984). These statements have been superceded, however, by the Supreme Court decisions in Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419 (1995) and Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263, 289-90 (1999), in which the Supreme Court engaged in its own analyses of materiality, displaying no deference to the conclusions of the lower courts. See also Kyles, 514 U.S. at 455 (Stevens, J., concurring) ("[W]e should independently review the record").

III. PROCEEDINGS UNDER D.C. CODE § 23-110

A. In General

D.C. Code § 23-110 provides a collateral remedy analogous to the relief available to federal prisoners under 28 U.S.C. § 2255. See Swain v. Pressley, 430 U.S. 372 (1977); Spencer v. United States, 748 A.2d 940, 945 n.3 (D.C. 2000). Like its federal counterpart, it is brought to challenge an illegal detention:

> A prisoner in custody under sentence of the Superior Court claiming the right to be released upon the ground that (1) the sentence was imposed in violation of the Constitution of the United States or the laws of the District of Columbia, (2) the court was without jurisdiction to impose the sentence, (3) the sentence was in excess of the maximum authorized by law, [and] (4) the sentence is otherwise subject to collateral attack, may move the court to vacate, set aside, or correct the sentence.

D.C. Code § 23-110(a).

A § 23-110 motion "may be made at any time," D.C. Code § 23-110(b), by anyone who is in legal custody. Snell v. United States, 754 A.2d 289, 291-92 & n.3 (D.C. 2000). In order to be in custody, a defendant's physical movements must be restricted. Mitchell v. United States, 977 A.2d 959, 964 (D.C. 2009). A sentence of probation is considered to be custodial. Snell, 754 A.2d 289. An order to pay a monetary assessment or fine, however, is not. Mitchell, 977 A.2d at 968. Likewise, an obligation to register under the Sex Offender Registration Act is not considered to be a form of custody. Id. at 968.

Common grounds for § 23-110 motions include involuntariness of a guilty plea, illegality of a sentence,[10] double jeopardy violations, and ineffective assistance of counsel at trial, in connection with plea proceedings, or at sentencing. See infra Section B.[11] [9] Pre-trial and post-trial litigation of Brady claims is discussed more fully in Chapter 5 of this manual.

[10] An illegal sentence may also be attacked through a motion under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 35(a). However, that rule "presupposes a valid conviction and may not, therefore, be used to challenge alleged errors in proceedings that occurred prior to the imposition of sentence." Allen v. United States, 495 A.2d 1145, 1149 (D.C. 1985). Sentence

There is a presumption that a trial court presented with a 23-110 motion should conduct a hearing in order to evaluate the claim. D.C. Code § 23-110(c); s*ee also McCrimmon v. United States*, 853 A.2d 154 (D.C. 2004) (remanding for evidentiary hearing on whether defense attorney's decision not to cross-examine crucial prosecution witness was based on a prior attorney-client relationship between the defense attorney and the government witness); Haley v. United States, 799 A.2d 1201, 1214-15 (D.C. 2002) (remanded for hearing); Jones v. United States, 743 A.2d 1222, 1225-26 (D.C. 2000) (remanding for hearing on adequacy of counsel's plea advice); Williams v. United States, 725 A.2d 455 (D.C. 1999) (hearing required when allegations are neither vague nor conclusory); Woodard v. United States, 719 A.2d 966, 969 (D.C. 1998) (hearing required for motion on ineffective assistance where there were "factual disputes clearly raised by the record").

The presumption will be overcome, and no such hearing necessary, if "the motion and files and records of the case conclusively show that the prisoner is entitled to no relief." D.C. Code § 23-110(c); Freeman v. United States, 971 A.2d 188, 201 (D.C. 2009). This will be the case when "allegations of the motion itself are vague and conclusory, are wholly incredible, or, even if true, would merit no relief." Miller v. United States, 479 A.2d 862, 869 (D.C. 1984) quoting Gibson v. United States, 388 A.2d 1214, 1216 (D.C.1978) (per curiam); s*ee also Washington (Anthony) v. United States*, 834 A.2d 899, 903 (D.C. 2003) (affirmed denial of hearing where appellant procedurally barred from asserting ineffective assistance of counsel claim). Because the court will deny a claim when there is either no dispute or a dispute that can be resolved based on the record, it is advisable to substantiate any allegations in the motion with affidavits or other documents.[12] See Bettis v. United States, 325 A.2d 190, 197 (D.C. 1974) (dispute resolved from the record).

Obtaining Counsel: A court has discretion under D.C. Code § 11-2601(3)(A) to appoint counsel for an indigent person seeking collateral relief if "the interests of justice" so require. Jenkins v. United States, 548 A.2d 102, 104-05 (D.C. 1988). A prisoner who seeks the appointment of counsel must therefore proffer the grounds for collateral relief at the time counsel is requested. Id. at 106. In order to prevail on an application for counsel, the prisoner must show that his or her § 23-110 motion satisfies the same criteria that would entitle him or her to a hearing on the motion. Wu v. United States, 798 A.2d 1083, 1089 (D.C. 2002); Doe v. United States, 583 A.2d 670, 672 (D.C. 1990); s*ee also Kyle v. United States*, 759 A.2d 192, 201 (D.C. 2000). The denial computation issues may not be litigated under D.C. Code § 23-110. Alston v. United States, 590 A.2d 511, 514 (D.C. 1991).

[11] A claim of ineffective assistance of appellate counsel may not be raised in a § 23-110 motion. Mayfield v. United States, 659 A.2d 1249, 1251 (D.C. 1995). Rather, litigation of this claim requires a motion to recall the mandate because the "Superior Court does not have authority to rule on the constitutionality of appellate proceedings." Id. at 1252 (quoting Watson v. United States, 536 A2d 1056, 1060 (D.C. 1987)).

[12] Even this practice may be insufficient to entitle the defendant to a hearing. See Derrington v. United States, 488 A.2d 1314, 1338-41 (D.C. 1985). In Derrington, the trial court denied a hearing on allegations that the government had failed to disclose a "deal" it had made with a witness in exchange for testimony, and that the witness recanted after trial. The court stated: "The need for a hearing on a § 23-110 motion is diminished where a witness seeks to recant earlier testimony and the trial court has had the opportunity to observe the witness's demeanor and weigh the credibility of the witness at trial. On review of a motion to vacate sentence, the testimony must be considered most strongly in support of the jury's verdict." Id. at 1340 (citations omitted).

of a request for counsel is not an appealable order. Jenkins, 548 A.2d at 108. When the court determines that a hearing is required, appointment of counsel is obligatory. Doe, 583 A.2d at 673.

Although § 23-110 does not provide for discovery, the Court of Appeals held courts should allow discovery when necessary to give "meaning and substance to the objectives of the law." Gibson v. United States, 566 A.2d 473, 478 (D.C. 1989) citing Harris v. Nelson, 394 U.S. 286 (1968). "[W]here specific allegations before the court show reason to believe that the petitioner may, if the facts are fully developed, be able to demonstrate that he is . . . entitled to relief, it is the duty of the court to provide the necessary facilities and procedures for an adequate inquiry." Id. quoting Harris, 394 U.S. at 300. This is a fact-specific inquiry, and courts have discretion in determining whether or not discovery is warranted. Given this discretion, a judge may refuse to allow discovery if claims in the § 23-110 motion are "'overly broad, and speculative.'" Brown v. United States, 726 A.2d 149, 156 (D.C. 1999) (claim was prosecutor had violated Brady by failing to disclose in timely manner that the complaining witness had been arrested three weeks before trial and was not charged with a drug offense) citing Brooks v. United States, 683 A.2d 1369, 1371 (D.C. 1995), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1130 (2000). However, failure to provide for discovery where warranted is considered an abuse of discretion. See Bracey v. Gramley, 520 U.S. 899, 908-09 (1997) (judge had been convicted of taking bribes in murder trials).[13]

D.C. Code 23-110 "is not designed to be a substitute for direct review," Head v. United States, 489 A.2d 450, 451 (D.C. 1985), and preserved claims cognizable on direct appeal should not be litigated through motions under D.C. Code § 23-110. A defendant who has not raised an issue on direct appeal may only raise that issue on collateral attack if he shows "both cause for his failure to do so and prejudice as a result of his failure." Head, 489 A.2d at 451; Wainwright v. Sykes, 435 U.S. 72 (1977)). The "cause and prejudice" standard is difficult to meet, and defendants can often meet one requirement but not the other. See, e.g., Strickler v. Greene, 527 U.S. 263 (1999).

Where an appellate court has disposed of an issue on direct appeal, that issue will not be considered afresh on collateral attack "absent special circumstances." Doepel v. United States, 510 A.2d 1044, 1045-46 (D.C. 1986). Such "special circumstances" can consist of an intervening change in relevant law, if that law is one "which would have exonerated the defendant had it been in force at the time of the direct appeal." Kirk v. United States, 510 A.2d 499, 504 (D.C. 1986) citing Davis v. United States, 417 U.S. 333, 342 (1974); see also Pettaway v. United States, 390 A.2d 981, 986 (D.C. 1978) (strict principles of res judicata do not apply to § 23-110 litigation). In deciding whether to bring a claim based on new law, counsel must determine whether principles of retroactivity would bar the new law from being applied. [14]

[13] Implementing the mandate of Harris, the federal system promulgated Rule 6 of Rules Governing § 2255 Proceedings in the United States District Courts, which provides that a judge should grant discovery "for good cause shown." Bracey, 520 U.S. at 904.

[14] Such intervening law must be applied in a post-appeal collateral attack in at least three situations: (1) when an intervening decision merely has applied settled precedents to new and different factual situations; (2) where the decision goes to the very heart of the truth-finding function; and (3) where the decision makes clear that the trial court lacked authority to punish a criminal defendant in the first place. Kirk, 510 A.2d at 507-08 (citations omitted). In this last category of cases, where jurisdiction was already lacking, the new rule does not so much apply retroactively as reveal the fact that the prior judgment or sentence was void ab initio. Id. at 508.

Second or Successive Motions: As a general matter, the court is only required to entertain a prisoner's first motion for a specific type of relief. D.C. Code § 23-110(e). When a successive petition is filed, "'[c]ontrolling weight may be given' to the denial of a prior application for collateral relief on the same ground if that denial was on the merits, unless the ends of justice require that the claim be considered anew." Vaughn v. United States, 600 A.2d 96, 97 (D.C. 1991) quoting Sanders v. United States, 373 U.S. 1, 15 (1963) (citations omitted). But see Brown v. United States, 656 A.2d 1133, 1136 (D.C. 1995) (claim should be considered anew where movant was unrepresented in earlier proceeding but had been entitled to have counsel appointed) citing Vaughn, 600 A.2d at 97.[15]

Denial of a § 23-110 motion is appealable. Under § 23-110(f), a separate notice of appeal must be filed. Taylor v. United States, 603 A.2d 451, 458 (D.C. 1992); Hall v. United States, 559 A.2d 1321, 1322 (D.C. 1989). A party may request release pending appeal. D.C. App. R. 9. If such release is denied, the party may appeal the denial under Rule 9. D.C. App. R. 9(b).

A defendant seeking collateral relief from a Superior Court judgment must initially move under § 23-110. Federal habeas corpus relief is available under 28 U.S.C. § 2241 and habeas relief is available under D.C. Code § 16-1901 only where the § 23-110 remedy is unavailable or "inadequate or ineffective to test the legality of the detention." D.C. Code § 23-110(g). See Swain v. Pressley, 430 U.S. 372, 384 (1977) (upholding constitutionality).[16]

2014 Supplement

Strozier v. United States*, 991 A.2d 778 (D.C. 2010). No abuse of discretion in denying two § 23-110 motions without hearing based on defense counsel's failure to secure presence of Brady witness or independent forensic witness where Brady witness's grand jury testimony that defendant had been unarmed was entered into evidence and defendant was ultimately acquitted of while armed offense, and defendant failed to demonstrate how he was prejudiced by counsel's decision not to call expert witness.

B. Ineffective Assistance of Counsel

The Sixth Amendment guarantees the right to counsel once the adversarial process has been initiated – including when interrogation commences and extends to all "critical stages" of the proceedings. Montejo v. Louisiana, 129 S. Ct. 2079, 2085 (2009) (citations omitted). "[T]he right to counsel is the right to the effective assistance of counsel." Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 686 (1984) (quoting McMann v Richardson, 397 U.S. 7659, 771 n.14 (1970)).[17]

[15] The same standard applied to a successive § 23-110 motion as to repeated applications for habeas corpus relief, 28 U.S.C. § 2254, D.C. App. R. 9(b), or applications to vacate sentence and judgment under 28 U.S.C. § 2255 (containing identical language). See Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436 (1986).

[16] Federal habeas litigation is discussed separately in this chapter.

[17] A claim of ineffective assistance may also be raised by a defendant who proceeded pro se at trial with an attorney as "stand-by" counsel. Ali v. United States, 581 A.2d 368, 379-80 (D.C. 1990) (election to proceed under hybrid form of representation is only partial waiver of Sixth Amendment right to counsel).

Claims of inadequate assistance of counsel can be made before and throughout trial, before sentencing, and post-trial.

A defendant may make a pre-trial claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. Such claims are reviewed on a different standard than post-trial claims. If a defendant claims before trial that counsel was ineffective in investigation, preparation, or some other substantial aspect, "the trial court has a constitutional duty to conduct an inquiry sufficient to determine the truth and scope of the defendant's allegations." Monroe v. United States, 389 A.2d 811, 820 (D.C. 1978); Farrell v. United States, 391 A.2d 755, 762 (D.C. 1978); see also Gamble v. United States, 901 A.2d 159, 164-67 (D.C. 2006).[18] The court "need not attempt to examine every conceivable deficiency in the representation." Forte v. United States, 856 A.2d 567, 574 (D.C. 2004). However, it "must make on-the-record findings sufficient to permit meaningful appellate review on the issue of the ability and preparedness of counsel to render effective assistance under the prevailing circumstances." Fields v. United States, 466 A.2d 822, 824 (D.C. 1983) (explaining the Monroe-Farrell rule[19]; see also Forte, 856 A.2d at 574-76; Woodard v. United States, 719 A.2d 966, 969 (D.C. 1998) (hearing required on claim of ineffective assistance of counsel where factual record did not support trial court's determinations denying relief); Stevens v. United States, 683 A.2d 452, 454-55 (D.C. 1996) (inquiry need not ignore the context of the complaint and can be tailored to that context); Wingate v. United States, 669 A.2d 1275, 1284 (D.C. 1995) (inquiry tailored to explore the specifics of the complaint); McKenzie v. United States, 659 A.2d 838, 840 (D.C. 1995) (scope of inquiry within court's discretion); Witherspoon v. United States, 557 A.2d 587, 593 (D.C. 1989). If the court fails to make adequate findings, the case must be remanded for a Monroe-Farrell hearing or the conviction reversed. See Matthews v. United States, 459 A.2d 1063, 1065-66 (D.C. 1983) (Farrell does not require reversal rather than remand).[20]

Post-trial claims of ineffective assistance of counsel are appropriately raised in a D.C. Code § 23-110 motion.[21] These claims should not be raised on direct appeal in most cases, and are generally unsuccessful when they are made because absent a record made in a collateral proceeding, there is not enough information to permit the appellate court to evaluate the claim intelligently. Simpson v. United States, 576 A.2d 1336, 1338-39 (D.C. 1990). However, a defendant will only be able to collaterally attack his or her conviction based on an ineffectiveness claim not raised during the pendency of appeal if he or she can meet the cause and prejudice standard. Shepard v. United States, 533 A.2d 1278, 1280-81 (D.C. 1987).[22]

[18] A defendant can also make a claim under the Monroe-Farrell doctrine in regard to ineffective assistance with respect to sentencing counsel. Johnson v. United States, 585 A.2d 766, 770-71 (D.C. 1991).

[19] This rule applies retroactively only to convictions not yet reviewed on direct appeal. Id. at 826.

[20] Outright reversal, rather than remand, is required if there is obvious prejudice or the trial court's conclusion is unsupported by the record. McFadden v. United States, 614 A.2d 11, 16-18 (D.C. 1992).

[21] Ineffectiveness claims may also be raised in a motion for new trial under Superior Court Criminal Rule 33. Ineffective assistance resulting in an unconstitutional guilty plea may be challenged in a motion to withdraw the plea pursuant to Rule 32(e).

[22] "Cause" for failure to raise ineffective assistance of trial counsel in a collateral attack during the pendency of an appeal is established when the same counsel represents the accused at trial and on appeal. Little v. United States, 748 A.2d 920, 923 (D.C. 2000).

Therefore, if appellate counsel knows of the grounds for an ineffective assistance of counsel claim during the pendency of direct appeal, counsel should file a 23-110 motion in the trial court at the at that time. Id. at 1280; Doe v. United States, 583 A.2d 670, 674 (D.C. 1990). If a direct appeal has already been filed and there is a basis for an ineffectiveness claim, counsel should file a motion to hold the appeal in abeyance while a § 23-110 motion is pursued. See Simpson v. United States, 576 A.2d at 1339. If the ineffectiveness claim is denied, a new notice of appeal must be filed, and the appellate cases will be consolidated. The duty to investigate various grounds for ineffectiveness "is triggered by what the [client] (and trial counsel) tell appellate counsel in response to a reasonably thorough inquiry, and by what is reasonably noticeable from the trial court's records." Doe, 583 A.2d at 674-75.[23] Trial counsel should not represent a defendant on an ineffective appointment of counsel appeal. "It would be a conflict of interest for a lawyer to appeal a ruling premised on that lawyer's own ineffectiveness." Ramsey v. United States, 569 A.2d 142, 146 (D.C. 1990). "[W]hen, on appeal, a good faith, legitimate issue of ineffective assistance of counsel exists, trial counsel should move to withdraw as counsel on appeal." Reavis v. United States, 395 A.2d 75, 79 n.3 (D.C. 1978).

There is a presumption in favor of a hearing on § 23-110 motions. Jones v. United States, 918 A2d 389, 403-404 (D.C. 2007) (remand for evidentiary hearing on inadequate counsel issue where issue of fact raised by defendant's evidentiary submission with motion); Reaves v. United States, 694 A.2d 52, 57-58 (D.C. 1997) (discussing need for hearing where communications between counsel and client are in dispute and record insufficient to establish counsel's challenged decision was tactical choice) (citing Miller v. United States, 479 A.2d 862, 869-70 (D.C. 1984)); Hollis v. United States, 623 A.2d 1229, 1233-34 (D.C. 1993) (defendant entitled to hearing where counsel failed to interview and call co-defendant who could provide exculpatory testimony); Bruce v. United States, 617 A.2d 986, 995 (D.C. 1992); Wright v. United States, 608 A.2d 763, 765-66 (D.C. 1992); Gillis v. United States, 586 A.2d 726, 728-29 (D.C. 1991); Miller v. United States, 479 A.2d 862, 869-72 (D.C. 1984).

As with any motion pursuant to § 23-110, a hearing does not need to be held where claims are "vague and conclusory, are wholly incredible, or, even if true, would merit no relief," Shepard, 533 A.2d at 1283 (citation omitted); see also Ready v. United States, 620 A2d 233, 234 (D.C. 1993); Tibbs v. United States, 628 A.2d 638 (D.C. 1993) (upholding denial of hearing on complaint that counsel failed to introduce false testimony). Furthermore, a hearing does not have to be held if the claims raised do not involve any new matters outside of the court record. See Jones v. United States, 620 A.2d 249, 253 n.3 (D.C. 1993) comparing Ellerbe v. United States, 545 A.2d 1197, 1198-99 (D.C.) ("movant is entitled to a hearing on his [or her] claims regarding the ineffective assistance of trial counsel only when the claims cannot be disposed of by resort to the files and records of the case because the claims involve matters outside of the record"), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 868 (1988), with (Cleveland) Wright v. United States, 608 A.2d 763, 766

[23] Trial counsel should not represent a defendant on an ineffective assistance of counsel appeal, as this would be a conflict of interest. Ramsey v. United States, 569 A.2d 142, 146 (D.C. 1990). If a legitimate claim of ineffective assistance of counsel arises while already on appeal, trial counsel should withdraw as appellate counsel. Reavis v. United States, 395 A.2d 75, 79 n.3 (D.C. 1978). If the allegedly ineffective trial counsel does not withdraw, failure to raise an ineffectiveness claim on direct appeal will not bar consideration of a subsequent motion under § 23-110, as such a defect is "not correctable on direct appeal." Ramsey, 569 A.2d at 14*; see also Little v. United States*, 748 A.2d 920, 923 (D.C. 2000).

(D.C.1992) ("To uphold the denial of a § 23-110 motion without a hearing, this court must conclude that under no circumstances could the movant establish facts warranting relief.").

Once jeopardy attaches, any claim of ineffective assistance is governed by the Strickland standard rather than by the Monroe-Farrell standard. Johnson v. United States, 746 A.2d 349, 354 (D.C. 2000); Scott v. United States, 619 A.2d 917, 922 (D.C. 1993).[24] This inquiry has two-prongs:

> "First, the defendant must show that counsel's performance was deficient.[25] . . . Second, the defendant must show that the deficient performance prejudiced the defense. This requires showing that counsel's errors were so serious as to deprive the defendant of a fair trial, a trial whose result is reliable."

Strickland, 466 U.S. at 687.[26]

In connection with the first prong, "[j]udicial scrutiny of counsel's performance must be highly deferential. . . . [A] court must indulge a strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance," where reasonableness is defined as "reasonableness under prevailing professional norms." Id. at 687-89; see also McAdoo v. United States, 515 A.2d 412, 419 (D.C. 1986); Hill v. United States, 489 A.2d 1078, 1080 (D.C. 1985). The court must make this determination "considering all the circumstances," based upon "the facts of the particular case, viewed at the time of counsel's conduct." Strickland, 466 U.S. at 688, 690; see also Smith v. United States, 608 A.2d 129 (D.C. 1992) (remanding for hearing on whether counsel failed to cross-examine witnesses adequately where impeaching evidence existed, since trial record alone did not show that this was a "reasonable tactical decision."). While this standard of review gives deference to counsel's strategic choices, the strategic choices must have a meaningful explanation, and "the trial court cannot presume that when counsel states he had some reasons for a decision, that those reasons, whatever they may have been, were sound." Gillis v. United States, 586 A.2d 726, 728-29 (D.C. 1991).

As for the prejudice requirement, "[t]he benchmark for judging any claim of ineffectiveness must be whether counsel's conduct so undermined the proper functioning of the adversarial process

[24] The only cases in which the trial court is required to conduct an immediate inquiry into allegations of inadequate representation, after jeopardy has attached, are those in which it appears that counsel's performance may be affected by a conflict of interest. Johnson, 746 A.2d at 354 (citing Witherspoon v. United States, 557 A.2d 587, 590 (D.C. 1989)); Singley v. united States, 548 A.2d 780, 786 (D.C. 1988); Douglas v. United States, 488 A.2d 121, 136 (D.C. 1985).

[25] Strickland replaced the prevailing standard in the District of Columbia, which required the defendant to show "gross incompetence" that "has in effect blotted out the essence of a substantial defense." Bruce v. United States, 379 F.2d 113, 116-17 (D.C. Cir. 1967); see Angarano v. United States, 312 A.2d 295, 298-99 (D.C. 1973); see also Battle v. Thornton, 646 A.2d 315, 322 (D.C. 1994) ("an attorney in any case is responsible for having not only the formal legal training reflected by membership in the bar but also enough additional knowledge, as well as experience, to permit the exercise [of] that degree of reasonable care and skill expected of lawyers acting under similar circumstances") (citations omitted).

[26] The Strickland analysis also applies to claims of ineffective assistance of appellate counsel. Smith v. Murray, 477 U.S. 527, 533-37 (1986); Watson v. United States, 536 A.2d 1056 (D.C. 1987).

that the trial cannot be relied on as having produced a just result." Strickland, 466 U.S. at 686. The "defendant need not show that counsel's deficient conduct more likely than not altered the outcome of the case," id. at 693, but rather, > must show that there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceedings would have been different. A reasonable probability is a probability sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome. . . Some errors will have had a pervasive effect on the inferences to be drawn from the evidence, altering the entire evidentiary picture, and some will have had an isolated, trivial effect. Moreover, a verdict or conclusion only weakly supported by the record is more likely to have been affected by errors than one with overwhelming record support. Taking the unaffected findings as given, and taking due account of the effect of the errors on the remaining findings, a court making the prejudice inquiry must ask if the defendant has met the burden of showing that the decision reached would reasonably likely have been different absent the errors.

Id. at 694-96; see also Woodard v. United States, 719 A.2d at 971 (trial court applied incorrect legal standard to prejudice requirement when it required petitioner to "prove that he would not have been found guilty" to establish prejudice) (emphasis in original); Wright v. United States, 717 A.2d 304, 309 (D.C. 1998) (prejudice requires showing of reasonable probability of a different outcome).[27]

A court need not consider the two prongs of the analysis in any particular order, and is not required to "address both components of the inquiry if the defendant makes an insufficient showing on one." Strickland, 466 U.S. at 697; see, e.g. Kinard v. United States, 635 A.2d 1297, 1305-07 (D.C. 1993) (defendant not prejudiced by counsel's failure to restrict scope of questioning of defendant to "innocent presence" defense, even had counsel erred); Webster v. United States, 623 A.2d 1198, 1206 (D.C. 1993) (defendant was not prejudiced by counsel's failure to seek redaction of details of drug buy from chemist's report).

When a jurisdiction provides an appeal of right, due process also guarantees the effective assistance of counsel on appeal. Evitts v. Lucey, 469 U.S. 387, 396-97 (1985); see also Griffin v. United States, 598 A.2d 1174 (D.C. 1991) (motion granted where appellate counsel failed to raise meritorious double jeopardy claim). This right does not extend to petitions for rehearing en banc, Wise v. United States, 522 A.2d 898 (D.C. 1987); discretionary appeals, Wainwright v. Torna, 455 U.S. 586 (1982) (per curiam); petitions for certiorari, Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600 (1974); or most post-conviction proceedings, Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722 (1991); Pennsylvania v. Finley, 481 U.S. 551 (1987). Claims of ineffective assistance of appellate counsel should not be brought in a § 23-110 motion, and instead must be presented independently by filing a recall of the mandate directly with the Court of Appeals. Wu, 798 A.2d at 1090-91; Mayfield v. United States, 659 A.2d 1249, 1252 (D.C. 1995); Brown v. United States, 656 A.2d 1133, 1135 n.3 (D.C. 1995); Head v. United States, 626 A.2d 1382 (D.C. 1993).

[27] In the unique circumstance where there is "an actual breakdown of the adversarial process," a court may presume counsel's ineffectiveness without resorting to the two-prong Strickland analysis. United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648, 657-58 (1984); see Yancey v. United States, 755 A.2d 421, 428-30 (D.C. 2000) (discussing Cronic).

Such motions must be filed within 180 days of the issuance of the mandate. D.C. App. R. 41(f) (2009).[28]

Claims of ineffective assistance may be based on any number of acts or omissions, including:

Failure to move to suppress evidence: Kimmelman v. Morrison, 477 U.S. 365, 385-87 (1986); Watley v. United States, 918 A.2d 1198 (D.C. 2007) (failure to file Fourth Amendment suppression motion ineffective); Wright v. United States, 717 A.2d 304 (D.C. 1998) (failure to file suppression motion did not prejudice accused and therefore was not ineffective); Washington v. United States, 689 A.2d 568, 571-73 (D.C. 1997) (identification testimony); Wright v. United States, 608 A.2d 763 (D.C. 1992) (Fourth Amendment); Hockman v. United States, 517 A.2d 44, 50-52 (D.C. 1986) (statements).

Failure to conduct an adequate investigation: Cosio v. United States, 927 A.2d 1106 (D.C. 2007) (en banc) (failure to investigate defendant's relationship with the complainant ineffective where government's case based on complainant's alleged fear of the defendant); Steward v. United States, 927 A.2d 1081 (D.C. 2007) (error to dismiss defendant's § 23-110 motion without a hearing or without allowing him to supplement his motion where counsel failed to interview co-defendant or investigate the possibility of calling him as a witness, and where co-defendant stated in affidavit that he would have provided exculpatory testimony); Stewart v. United States, 881 A.2d 1100, 1113-14 (D.C. 2005) (no ineffectiveness for failure to interview alibi witnesses where alibi vague, where one witness likely to assert Fifth Amendment privilege if called, and where other not at the scene); Matthews v. United States, 629 A.2d 1185, 1194-96 (D.C. 1993) (failure to interview two main defense witnesses); Gray v. United States, 6 17 A.2d 521 (D.C. 1992) (remand for hearing on failure to investigate information available from four witnesses); Gillis v. United States, 586 A.2d 726 (D.C. 1991) (failure to interview alibi witness); Rice v. United States, 580 A.2d 119 (D.C. 1990) (failure to investigate alibi witness where no reason to doubt credibility and evidence of defendant's guilt not so strong as to be outcome determinative); United States v. Berry, 123 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 265 (D.C. Super. Ct. December 1, 1994) (Burnett J.) (order for new trial due to trial counsel's failure to obtain expert interpretation of exculpatory medical records and to present testimony regarding them).

No ineffectiveness was found in United States v. Holmes, 508 F.3d 1091, 1096-97 (D.C. Cir. 2007) (request for continuance to review newly received discovery enabled admission of harmful evidence and issuance of superseding indictment, but not prejudicial and not foreseeable); Stewart v. United States, 881 A.2d 1100, 1114-15 (D.C. 2005) (decision not to cross examine witness about late recovery of a bullet); Minor, 647 A.2d at 775-76 (failure to have drugs tested by independent chemist and to call chemist as defense witness to testify that premixed drugs not sold on street); Sykes v. United States, 585 A.2d 1335 (D.C. 1991) (failure to interview alibi witness who would likely assert Fifth Amendment privilege and not exonerate defendant was within bounds of "reasonable professional assistance"); Doe, 583 A.2d at 673-74 (failure to pursue causation defense); and Hunter v. United States, 588 A.2d 680, 682 (D.C. 1991) (second counsel was unfamiliar with trial record during seven-day period for filing new trial motion).

[28] The 180-day time limit does not apply to mandates issued before the rule was promulgated in January 1985, Hines v. United States, 547 A.2d 988, 989 (D.C. 1988); Watson v. United States, 536 A.2d 1056 (1987).

Ineffectiveness but insufficient prejudice was shown in Webster v. United States, 623 A.2d 1198 (D.C. 1993) (mishandling of misidentification defense); Luchie v. United States, 610 A.2d 248 (D.C. 1992) (deficient preparation and representation at trial); United States v. Barbour, 813 F.2d 1232 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (deficient investigation); United States v. Debango, 780 F.2d 81, 86 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (failure to interview witnesses); Curry v. United States, 498 A.2d 534, 539-43 (D.C. 1985) (failure to have medical expert review record in rape case); and United States v. Frost, 502 A.2d 462 (D.C. 1985) (failure to interview co-defendants).

Neither ineffectiveness nor prejudice was found in Gamble v. United States, 901 A.2d 159 (D.C. 2006) (defendant failed to provide support for claim that counsel failed to interview potentially exculpatory witnesses).

Failure to raise legal issues at trial: Berkeley v. United States, 567 F.3d 703, 709 (D.C. Cir. 2009) (failure to pursue entrapment defense not ineffective where defendant didn't inform attorney of threats leading to drug sale); Perez v. United States, 968 A.2d 39, 88-93 (D.C. 2009) (no ineffectiveness where counsels' decisions not to call certain witnesses were strategic and where defense attorney elicited damaging testimony on cross examination); Howerton v. United States, 964 A.2d 1282, 1292-93 (D.C. 2009) (failure to make motions to challenge joinder and to sever not ineffective where motions unlikely to succeed); Aiken v. United States, 956 A.2d 33, 48-50 (D.C. 2008) (remanded for hearing to determine ineffectiveness in failing to request Kastigar hearing where unclear from record whether defendant's immunized testimony or derivative evidence tainted his trial); Washington v. United States, 689 A.2d 568, 573-75 (D.C. 1997) (failure to request intoxication-defense instruction; no adequate factual basis). Quallis v. United States, 654 A.2d 1281 (D.C. 1995) (failure to object to introduction at trial of incriminating statement not provided in discovery, remanded for further hearing); Taylor v. United States, 603 A.2d 451, 459-60 (D.C. 1992) (failure to seek severance, not prejudicial); Mack v. United States, 570 A.2d 777 (D.C. 1990) (failure to object to damaging hearsay, remanded for hearing); Young v. United States, 515 A.2d 1090, 1093-94 (D.C. 1986) (failure to object to consolidation, insufficient prejudice); Chavarria v. United States, 505 A.2d 59, 65-66 (D.C. 1986) (failure to request limiting instruction, insufficient prejudice).

Trial performance and decisions: Mozee v. United States, 963 A.2d 151, 165-66 (D.C. 2009) (failure to adequately prepare defendant prior to testifying, to cross examine effectively, to object to prosecution's evidence, and to object to erroneous instructions not prejudicial); Stevens v. United States, 944 A.2d 466 (D.C. 2008) (failure to introduce evidence, object to hearsay, adequately cross-examine complainant, and consult with defendant regarding testifying troubling, but not prejudicial); Rivera v. United States, 941 A.2d 434 (D.C. 2008) (failure to request interpreter for attorney client conversations not ineffective where defense investigator and defendant's wife available to translate; no ineffectiveness where attorney properly prepared witness not to refer to gangs while testifying; no ineffectiveness for failure to call defendant's brother as a witness where his account differed from that of other witnesses); Brown v. United States, 934 A. 2d 930 (D.C. 2007) (no ineffectiveness for failure to object to hearsay evidence, and for failure to present defense given in opening due to witness's assertion of Fifth Amendment privilege); Van Kuhn v. United States, 900 A.2d 691 (D.C. 2006) (counsel's arguing a reasonable doubt defense with which defendant did not agree was not ineffective); Cade v. United States, 898 A.2d 349, 354-56 (D.C. 2006) (no ineffectiveness where counsel's strategy to concede guilt on armed robbery charge but argue for acquittal on homicide charge); Brown v. United States, 726 A.2d 149 (D.C. 1999) (no ineffectiveness with respect to attorney's advice about whether accused should testify at trial); Williams v. United States, 725 A.2d 455 (D.C. 1999) (discussing trial counsel's failure to cross-examine complainant on prior inconsistent statement relating to consensual entry of her home by accused, which would have defeated one essential element of burglary charge); Bowman v. United States, 652 A.2d 64, 73-74 (D.C. 1994) (no ineffectiveness in failure to call witnesses who had not observed incident in question); McKinnon v. United States, 644 A.2d 438, 443-44 (D.C. 1994) (no ineffectiveness in defense counsel's conceding ''permanent injury'' element in malicious mayhem case when defense was alibi) Smith v. United States, 608 A.2d 129 (D.C. 1992) (remand for hearing on contention that trial counsel failed to establish location of incident through cross-examination, documentary evidence, and corroborating defense witnesses, all of which corroborate the defendant's testimony).

Failure to introduce exculpatory evidence at trial: Wright v. United States, 979 A.2d 26 (D.C. 2009) (no ineffectiveness for failure to call alibi witnesses who would have provided inconsistent, possibly damaging alibis); Brown v. United States, 934 A. 2d 930 (D.C. 2007) (no ineffectiveness for failure to call Brady witness who had made statement while under the influence); Jones v. United States, 918 A.2d 389 (D.C. 2007) (error to deny § 23-110 motion without a hearing where trial counsel failed to discover and call two alibi witnesses whose affidavits contained exculpatory information); Long v. United States, 910 A.2d 298 (D.C. 2006) (abuse of discretion to deny § 23-110 motion without a hearing where defense counsel failed to call alibi witness or other exculpatory witnesses whose testimony would have been neither cumulative nor inconsistent); Frederick v. United States, 741 A.2d 427 (D.C. 1999) (vacating conviction and remanding for new trial due to counsel's failure to subpoena critical eyewitness); Hollis v. United States, 623 A.2d 1229 (D.C. 1993) (failure to pursue affidavits of co-defendant indicating readiness to exculpate defendant, remand for hearing); Bruce, 617 A.2d at 994-97 (ballistic report that corroborated defense theory was not introduced, remand for findings on deficiency and prejudice); Byrd v. United States, 614 A.2d 25 (D.C. 1992) (failure to call eyewitnesses who could provide exculpatory testimony, prejudice requiring reversal).

Advice to client: Hill v. Lockhart, 474 U.S. 52 (1985) (guilty plea); Smith v. United States, 686 A.2d 537, 547 (D.C. 1996) (erroneous advice regarding plea offer); Matos v. United States, 631 A.2d 28 (D.C. 1993) (failure to advise client of deportation consequences of guilty plea and failed to request judicial recommendation against deportation); Eldridge v. United States, 618 A.2d 690 (D.C. 1992) (failure to advise client of consequences of revised plea bargain); Kelly v. United States, 590 A.2d 1031, 1034-35 (D.C. 1991) (counsel advised defendant not to testify); Johnson, 585 A.2d at 769-70 (failure to relay plea offer); Berkeley, 567 F.3d at 709-710 (advising defendant that if he plead guilty he would be eligible to participate in a drug program for which he was not actually eligible not prejudicial where competent attorney would have advised defendant to plead guilty regardless).

Ineffectiveness at sentencing: Wong v. Belmontes, 130 S. Ct. 383, 387 (2009) (per curiam) (failure to put on evidence to "humanize" the defendant in favor of mitigation at sentencing was not deemed prejudicial because the omitted evidence would have been cumulative); Schriro v. Landrigan, 550 U.S. 465, 475-77 (2007) (failure to present mitigating evidence not ineffective where defendant instructed attorney not to present such evidence); Louis v. United States, 862 A.2d 925 (D.C. 2004) (court did not err when denying defendant's motion to set aside the judgment of conviction and withdrawal of guilty plea due to the court sentencing defendant to 8-24 years when the government agreed to allocute for 5-15 years); Dantzler v. United States, 696 A.2d 1349 (1997) (remanded for hearing to determine whether counsel was ineffective in seeking ''addict exception'').

Conflicts of interest: A "less stringent" standard is applied to a claim that the lawyer had a conflict of interest. Derrington v. United States, 681 A.2d 1125, 1133 (D.C. 1996). This standard provides that "[a] Sixth Amendment violation warranting reversal will be established if a convicted defendant demonstrates on appeal that an actual conflict of interest adversely affected his lawyer's performance." Id. at 1133 (citations omitted) (internal quotations omitted). The petitioner must be able to "point to specific instances in the record to suggest an actual conflict or impairment of their interests." Fitzgerald v. United States, 530 A.2d 1129, 1138 (D.C. 1987) (internal quotations omitted). If able to do so, a defendant "need not demonstrate prejudice in order to obtain relief." Id. (quoting Cuyler v. Sullivan, 446 U.S. 335, 349-50 (1980)); see also Freeman v. United States, 971 A.2d 188, 202-03 (D.C. 2009) (failure to withdraw despite past representation of a witness is not ineffective when no actual conflict demonstrated); Veney v. United States, 738 A.2d 1185, 1193-94 (D.C. 1999) (distinguishing actual conflicts from those that are merely hypothetical or speculative); Gibson v. United States, 632 A.2d 1155, 1159 (D.C. 1993) (same).

The following cases involved ineffectiveness claims based upon alleged conflicts of interest: Burger v. Kemp, 483 U.S. 776 (1987); Nix v. Whiteside, 475 U.S. 157 (1986) (counsel not ineffective in threatening to discontinue representing client who intended to commit perjury, thereby dissuading him from taking the stand); Wages v. United States, 952 A.2d 952, 960-61 (D.C. 2008) (no actual conflict where counsel represented informant and defendant in the same matter but informant's information not useful and obtained before defendant's arrest); Lee-Thomas v. United States, 921 A.2d 772, 777 (D.C. 2007) (allegations of ineffectiveness before and during trial do not render counsel ineffective in advising defendant as to whether or not he should request a mistrial based on alleged ineffectiveness); Thomas v. United States, 685 A.2d 745, 750-52 (D.C. 1996) (remanded for hearing where defense counsel had intimate relationship with police officer from same District as investigating officers); Derrington v. United States, 681 A.2d 1125, 1134-38 (D.C. 1996) (conviction reversed because of conflict arising when one client might benefit from giving government information harmful to another client); Stratmon v. United States, 631 A.2d 1177 (D.C. 1993) (counsel not ineffective for not raising judge's apparent conflict of interest on appeal); Witherspoon, 557 A.2d 587 (remanding on whether actual conflict of interest prejudiced defense or whether defendant manufactured conflict by threatening to present false testimony); Curry, 498 A.2d 534 (failure to request corroboration instruction and to obtain expert assistance in interpreting records is below professional norm but not enough to require reversal).

Failure to file timely notice of appeal: The "failure of counsel to file a timely notice of appeal when his client instructs him to do so amounts to ineffective assistance of counsel." Samuels v. United States, 435 A.2d 392, 395 (D.C.1981); see also In re Sealed Case, 527 F.3d 174 (D.C. Cir. 2008) (two to three minute post-sentencing conversation regarding defendant's right to appeal insufficient where defendant essentially non-responsive). But see Thomas v. United States, 586 A.2d 1228 (D.C. 1991) (not ineffective per se if defendant had not instructed counsel to file appeal). The appropriate remedy in such a case is for the trial court to vacate sentence and resentence the defendant in order to permit a timely appeal. Samuels, 435 A.2d at 395.

2014 Supplement

Chaidez v. United States*, 133 S. Ct. 1103 (2013). Under Teague v. Lane, rule of Padilla v. Kentucky – that effective counsel must advise client of negative immigration consequences of taking a guilty plea – is a new rule that does not apply retroactively to convictions already final on direct appeal when Padilla was decided.

Missouri v. Frye*, 132 S. Ct. 1399 (2012). See, supra, Chapter 6.I.C.

Lafler v. Cooper*, 132 S. Ct. 1376 (2012). See, supra, Chapter 6.I.C.

Padilla v. Kentucky*, 559 U.S. 356 (2010). Advice regarding effect of a criminal conviction on one's immigration status is within ambit of Sixth Amendment right to effective assistance of counsel; therefore, counsel must inform client whether plea carries risk of deportation.

Hopkins v. United States*, 84 A.3d 62 (D.C. 2014). Trial court did not err in failing to intervene, sua sponte, to determine whether defendant had knowingly and voluntarily agreed to counsel's concessions in opening where there was no sign of significantly deficient performance on counsel's part and no indication that defendant opposed, did not understand, or was surprised by counsel's concessions.

Long v. United States*, 83 A.3d 369 (D.C. 2013) (amended).

Blakeney v. United States*, 77 A.3d 328 (D.C. 2013). No bright-line rule that unrebutted expert opinion of defendant's incompetency necessarily creates sufficient doubt to require defense counsel to bring issue to court's attention.

Blakeney v. United States*, 77 A.3d 328 (D.C. 2013). See, supra, Chapter 3.II.B.

Portillo v. United States*, 62 A.3d 1243 (D.C. 2013). Trial court erred in failing to conduct an adequate inquiry into defendant's pretrial ineffective assistance of counsel claim as required by the Monroe-Farrell line of cases, particularly where defendant was non-English speaking and had limited education.

Young v. United States*, 56 A.3d 1184 (D.C. 2012) (amended). Trial counsel's failure to consult with a narcotics expert before trial and present expert testimony at trial to challenge police officers' accounts of drug sale they said they had observed – where government's case turned largely on credibility of its police officer witnesses and where amount, purity, and price were at issue – fell below norm of reasonable professional standards, and this deficiency prejudiced the defense.

Kigozi v. United States*, 55 A.3d 643 (D.C. 2012). Ineffective assistance of counsel and not a tactical decision for lawyer not to consult a defense drug expert where it was critical that decedent may have been under the influence of PCP when making his alleged dying declaration.

Thomas v. United States*, 50 A.3d 458 (D.C. 2012). Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying § 23-110 motion without hearing because defendant did not show that defense attorney's failure to call expert witness on effect of crack on perception and state of mind would have affected outcome of trial where defense was that complaining witnesses were lying, not mistaken, and where the jury was well aware of drug history of each complainant.

Patterson v. United States*, 37 A.3d 230 (D.C. 2012), amended, reh'g en banc denied (Oct. 11, 2012) (per curiam). Trial court did not err in failing during trial to conduct an inquiry into defendant's dissatisfaction with defense counsel's conduct where defendant's statement that he "could do a lot better as [his] own lawyer" did not constitute a positive demand upon the trial court for leave to proceed without counsel.

Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying without a hearing defendant's § 23-110 motion in which he alleged his attorney had failed to investigate another suspect's claim of guilt of the charge and failed to present evidence regarding his hand tattoo where other suspect's "unsworn, vague letter" could not have changed outcome of trial and where other suspect's attorney prevented defendant's attorney from interviewing suspect, and where evidence of hand tattoo would have had limited probative value.

Aiken v. United States*, 30 A.3d 127 (D.C. 2011). On appeal from remand for a Kastigar hearing, Court of Appeals held that the government did not meet its burden to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that no use was made of defendant's immunized testimony regarding another witness's testimony.

McCrimmon v. United States*, 27 A.3d 121 (D.C. 2011). Defendant's counsel did not operate under "actual conflict" in violation of Sixth Amendment right to counsel as a result of discussion between himself and crucial prosecution witness over tentative attorney-client relationship where defense counsel testified at remand evidentiary hearing that he had not held back on cross-examining prosecution witness and that any appearance of such was a tactical decision to avoid depicting defendant as powerful figure who called the shots, which would have bolstered government theory that defendant was "mastermind" of conspiracy to commit criminal offenses.

Paige v. United States*, 25 A.3d 74 (D.C. 2011). See, supra, Chapter 11.II.B.

Ruffin v. United States*, 25 A.3d 1 (D.C. 2011). Trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's § 23-110 motion alleging that counsel inadequately advised him of advantages and disadvantages of taking felony plea offer versus proceeding to trial where counsel informed defendant of parameters of plea and risk of probation revocation if he pled, defendant wanted to take only misdemeanor plea offer, and defendant never admitted to counsel that he was guilty of charged offense such that counsel would have changed his advice about plea.

Smith v. United States*, 20 A.3d 759 (D.C. 2011). Trial attorney not ineffective for failing to argue to court or advise defendant that his gun convictions were preempted by Armored Car Act because, although Act operated in District and defendant was an "armored car crew member," facts demonstrated that defendant did not carry gun while "acting in service of" his employer when he carried his loaded weapon to his wife's home in order to sleep for few hours and then have breakfast with his daughter before leaving for work.

Mungo v. United States*, 987 A.2d 1145 (D.C. 2010). Counsel not ineffective for failing to object to use of stun belts during voir dire because willingness to accept use of stun belts was tactical decision so that defendant could participate in voir dire process and where counsel took steps to ensure stun belts would not be seen, and defendants' active participation in process demonstrated that wearing stun belts did not instill fear in them, distract them or chill their ability to participate in their defense.

Trial counsel not ineffective for failing to cross-examine testifying medical examiner about former co-worker's dismissal for a lapsed medical license and "sloppy" work because defendants did not show how such lapse would have affected the credibility of the testimony such that confidence in the verdict would be undermined.

Court did not err in determining that attorneys' behavior in making facial expressions at government witness and jurors, slamming down exhibits, and gesturing to jury – although improper and unprofessional as trial strategy – did not amount to deficient representation.

Order denying § 23-110 motion affirmed where allegations that counsel failed to prepare adequately for trial, failed to file certain severance and suppression motions, failed to call certain witnesses, and elicited cross-examination testimony that revealed that defendant was incarcerated were belied by record testimony and court's observations that decisions made by counsel were tactical and there was no reasonable probability that outcome of trial would have been different if alleged omissions had not occurred.

IV. PROCEEDINGS UNDER THE INNOCENCE PROTECTION ACT

The Innocence Protection Act (IPA) took effect in 2002. D.C. Code § 22-4131 et seq. (2001). The IPA broadens post-conviction remedies for those who have been wrongfully convicted by, for example, permitting a movant to make a free-standing post-conviction claim of innocence. See Addendum to Report on Bill 14-153, The Innocence Protection Act of 2001 at 5 (Jan. 29, 2002). The IPA was meant to ensure that those who obtain new evidence establishing innocence after the three-year time-limit set out in Super. Ct. Crim. Rule 33 are not precluded from attaining post-conviction relief. Bouknight v. United States, 867 A.2d 245, 251 (D.C. 2005). In order to ensure a broader remedy, an applicant may bring a claim under the IPA at any time. D.C. Code § 22-4135(b). In addition, "every measure should be taken to allow wrongfully-convicted individuals the opportunity to prove their innocence with non-biological evidence as well as DNA." Teoume-Lessane v. United States, 931 A.2d 478, 489 (D.C. 2007) quoting Addendum to Report on Bill 14-153, The Innocence Protection Act of 2001, at 5 (Jan. 29, 2002).

For substantive relief under the IPA based on new evidence of innocence – biological or otherwise – an applicant must file a motion requesting that the court either vacate his or her conviction or grant a new trial. D.C. Code § 22-4135(a). The claim must be based on actual innocence, and the applicant must include in the motion an affidavit affirming that he or she is innocent of the crime for which he or she has been convicted. D.C. Code § 22-4135(d)(1). Furthermore, the motion must set forth new evidence which shows that the applicant was actually innocent. D.C. Code § 22-4135(a). "Actual innocence" means, "the person did not commit the crime of which she or he was convicted." D.C. Code § 22-4131(1). A motion to vacate a conviction or grant a new trial on grounds of actual innocence must explain what new evidence proves innocence, how it does so, and in what manner the evidence is not merely "cumulative or impeaching." D.C. Code § 22-4135(c).

2014 Supplement

Meade v. United States*, 48 A.3d 761 (D.C. 2012). Despite letter from victim stating no rape took place, court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that no evidentiary hearing under IPA was needed where letter would merit no relief even if true, and where defendant failed to show manifest injustice had occurred or that he was actually innocent by clear and convincing evidence.

A. New Evidence Generally

"New evidence" is broadly defined in the IPA. As in Rule 33, it includes evidence that was unknown to the defendant at the time of trial and couldn't have been discovered prior to trial using due diligence. § 22-4131(7)(A). The IPA surpasses Rule 33, however, in that it allows a claim based on evidence which was known to the defendant at the time of trial, but which the defendant was unable to produce or compel, physical evidence the movant could not obtain at the time of the trial, even exercising due diligence, or is evidence obtained as a result of post-conviction DNA testing. D.C. Code § 22-4131(7)

While a petitioner is permitted to offer evidence of which he or she was aware but unable to produce, the petitioner must show that he or she used due diligence in attempting to obtain the evidence prior to trial. Bouknight, 867 A.2d at 255. The D.C. Court of Appeals has held that the due diligence requirement is to be analyzed under the IPA in the same manner as it would be analyzed under Rule 33. Id. at 256 (no due diligence in attempting to procure witness testimony where defendant failed to subpoena witness but argued that witness would have asserted his Fifth Amendment rights even if subpoenaed). Failure to use due diligence in securing evidence is considered a deliberate withholding of evidence under § 22-4135(d), and thus the petitioner is barred from relying on the evidence in a post-conviction proceeding. Id. at 254.

B. New Evidence and Post-Conviction DNA Testing

Petitioners may seek testing of biological material to prove their innocence. Biological material is defined by statute as, "a sexual assault forensic examination kit. Semen, vaginal fluid, blood, saliva, visible skin tissue, or hair which apparently derived from the perpetrator of a crime or, under circumstances that may be probative of the perpetrator's identity, apparently derived from the victim of a crime. D.C. Code § 22-4131(2). Obtaining testing requires the satisfaction of three-steps. D.C. Code § 22-4133; United States v. Cuffey, 2003 WL 23202076, *2 (D.C. Super. Ct. 2003).

First, the movant must show that the biological evidence is in fact evidence from the initial prosecution and that it is still in the custody of the District of Columbia, the United States, or another entity which would have ensured its proper preservation. § 22-4133(a)(1), (2). The movant must also establish that the evidence fits into one of three categories: (a) that the evidence was not subject to DNA testing prior to trial because such testing "was not readily available"; (b) that the evidence was not subject to the particular type of more-accurate DNA testing being requested; or (c) that the evidence was never tested because it was either unknown or unavailable to the movant at trial. § 22-4133(a)(3).

Second, an applicant must assert, by affidavit, his or her actual innocence, identify the evidence sought to be tested and the reason why testing was not previously obtained, and explain how the evidence would help show his or her actual innocence. D.C. Code § 22-4133(b); see also Cuffey, 2003 WL 23202076 at *2 (denying request for post-conviction DNA testing on grounds that testing had already been performed and would not yield evidence that would help show his innocence of the crime charged). At this point, the court must provide the government notice and an opportunity to respond unless the court finds it clear from the record the applicant is not entitled to relief. D.C. Code § 22-4133(c).

Third, if the applicant meets the first two conditions, the court "shall" order DNA testing if there is a reasonable probability that the results of the proposed DNA testing would be non-cumulative and would help establish actual innocence. § 22-4133(d). The reasonable probability standard requires more than conjecture or mere speculation. Cuffey v. United States, 976 A.2d 897, 898-99 (D.C. 2009) (denied request for DNA testing where amount of victim's blood on jacket made it unlikely that DNA from another individual could be detected). The court may reject the application if the testing, regardless of the outcome, clearly would not result in evidence which would aid the theory of innocence. Cuffey, 2003 WL 23202076 at *1 (denied DNA testing where similar testing was already conducted and did not support defense theory). Counsel should be vigilant that the outcome of the testing is not presumed – for the government or the court to presume the results of the tests will be adverse to the petitioner, which there is a temptation to do, would obviate the need for DNA testing.

Initially, there was some concern that D.C. Code § 22-4133 would make frivolous requests for testing more common. Teoume-Lessane, 931 A.2d at 488. D.C. Code § 22-4132, which outlines the procedure for pre-conviction DNA testing, is meant to balance out this potential effect. Under § 22-4132, a defendant has a right to notice in open court and to independent testing of biological evidence. D.C. Code § 22-4132(b).[29] Should the defendant waive independent testing, she or he generally will not be eligible for § 22-4133 post-conviction testing. § 22-4132(b).

2014 Supplement

Mitchell v. United States*, 80 A.3d 962 (D.C. 2013). Government bears burden of substantiating its claim that it does not possess biological material in response to defendant's application for post-conviction DNA testing.

Hood v. United States*, 28 A.3d 553 (D.C. 2011). No due process violation because defendant did not satisfy Innocence Protection Act's materiality requirement where he could not show a reasonable probability that requested testing of trace skin cells on various items of victim's property found at crime scene, even if it resulted in the recovery of a usable DNA profile other than that of defendant or victim, would establish his actual innocence where evidence showed that defendant was alone in house with victim when she was attacked, defendant was only person seen leaving premises after crime, and no one other than defendant and victim was there when police arrived.

C. Burden of Proof for § 22-4135 Motion

After an applicant files an IPA motion, the prosecution is given notice. § 22-4135(e)(1). The judge must then evaluate the new evidence to determine whether or not it shows actual innocence based on five factors:

(A) The new evidence;
(B) How the new evidence demonstrates actual innocence;
(C) Why the new evidence is not cumulative or impeaching;
(D) If the conviction resulted from a trial, and if the movant asserted a theory of defense inconsistent with the current claim of innocence, the specific reason the movant asserted an inconsistent theory at trial; and
(E) If the conviction resulted from a guilty plea, the specific reason the movant pleaded guilty despite being actually innocent of the crime.

D.C. Code § 22-4135(g)(1).

Credibility of the new evidence is an important threshold issue. If the judge determines that the new evidence is not credible, he or she may deny the motion without determining what the [29] While D.C. Code § 22-4132(b) requires that a judge give a defendant notice as to the availability of pre-conviction testing, the court of appeals has held, despite the plain language of the statute, that it does not mandate notice in any particular way. Veney v. United States, 936 A.2d 811, 823 (D.C. 2007) (holding that informing co-defendant and appellant's attorney of rights in front of defendant served as ample notice). Furthermore, while § 22-4132 does state that a defendant "shall" be instructed regarding the availability of DNA testing, this has been construed as a procedural, rather than a substantive, provision. Teoume-Lessane, 931 A.2d at 489. As such, a court's failure to instruct a defendant regarding the possibility of DNA testing does not require reversal as a matter of law. Id. at 489. Likewise, if it can be shown that a court did not personally notify a defendant of these rights but that the defendant was otherwise made aware of the right to DNA testing, the defendant is not entitled to post-conviction DNA testing without otherwise meeting the requirements set out by § 22-4133. Veney, 931 A.2d at 825.

evidence's effect otherwise would be. Bell v. United States, 871 A.2d 1199, 1201 (D.C. 2005) (denying motion where judge found that witness recantation was not credible). D.C. Code § 22-4135 requires an evidentiary hearing unless the motion and files conclusively show that the movant is entitled to no relief. D.C. Code § 22-4135(e)(1). However, an application may be denied without an evidentiary hearing, provided that the record sets forth all relevant information. Bell, 871 A.2d at 1201-1202.

The burden of proof rests on the applicant. If the applicant proves more likely than not he or she is innocent, the court must grant him or her a new trial. D.C. Code § 22-4135(g)(2). "More likely than not" is a preponderance of evidence standard applicable to civil actions. If the applicant proves by clear and convincing evidence that he or she is innocent, the court must vacate the conviction and dismiss the charge(s). D.C. Code § 22-4135(g)(3).

To date, only one case has successfully received relief under the IPA: Judge Burgess found that Steven Dewitt was more likely than not innocent of first-degree murder based on new eyewitness testimony that another individual had committed the crime, admissions of guilt from the true perpetrator to his colleagues, the statement of another witness who was present at the scene, faulty eyewitness testimony, motive evidence, and testimony about the true perpetrator's modus operandi.

V. MOTIONS TO CORRECT OR REDUCE SENTENCE

A. Motions To Correct Sentence

A motion to correct an illegal sentence may be filed at any time. A motion to correct a sentence that is illegally imposed, however, must be corrected within 120 days. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 35(a). The distinction between these illegalities is important:

> Where the sentence is "illegal" in the sense that the court goes beyond its authority by acting without jurisdiction or imposing a sentence in excess of the statutory maximum provided, then such sentence – because of the gravity of the error, the unqualified deprivation of one's liberty – may be challenged at any time. However, where a court of competent jurisdiction imposes a sentence within the limits authorized by the relevant statute, but commits a procedural error in doing so, it is not an abuse of discretion nor unreasonable . . . to characterize this sentence as one imposed in an "illegal manner" . . . and therefore subject to the 120-day jurisdictional limitation for challenge.

Robinson v. United States, 454 A.2d 810, 813 (D.C. 1982) (failure to comply with recidivist statute is ''illegal manner'' not ''illegal sentence''); see also Littlejohn v. United States, 749 A.2d 1253, 1256 (D.C. 2000) (failure to make ''no benefit'' finding under Federal Youth Correction Act is "illegal manner" not "illegal sentence").

An illegal sentence can be corrected at any time because it is considered a nullity. This enables a trial court to sua sponte vacate it and "begin again." Byrd v. United States, 487 A.2d 616 (D.C. 1985). The trial court may impose a different or greater sentence without violating the Due Process Clause in this situation, as the new sentence is intended to correct the judge's error rather than to penalize the defendant. Id. at 618-19. Such resentencing is also considered proper under the Double Jeopardy Clause. Prince v. United States, 432 A.2d 720 (D.C. 1981); Christopher v. United States, 415 A.2d 803, 804-05 (D.C. 1980). While there is no time limit for correcting an illegal sentence, the court has discretion to decline to consider a second Rule 35(a) motion based on grounds already presented in an earlier motion. Neverdon v. District of Columbia, 468 A.2d 974 (D.C. 1983) (no abuse of discretion to deny motion claiming that Youth Act sentence was unlawful, where defendant had not appealed denial of earlier motion). But see Dantzler v. United States, 696 A.2d 1349, 1356 (D.C. 1997) (reaching merits and noting previous claims had been pro se and failed to raise ineffectiveness claim).

The defendant does not need to be present at the time of correction or reduction of an illegal sentence. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 43(c)(4); Wells v. United States, 469 A.2d 1248, 1250 (D.C. 1983). Likewise, a judge does not need to provide an opportunity for the defendant to allocute at the resentencing. Wells, 469 A.2d at 1250.

B. Motions to Reduce Sentence

A motion to reduce sentence may be filed up to and on the 120th day after the day that: (1) the sentence is imposed; (2) probation is revoked; or (3) the court receives the mandate on appeal affirming the judgment or dismissing the appeal,[30] or any order or judgment of the Supreme Court that has the effect of upholding the judgment of conviction or revocation of probation. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 35(b).[31] This time limit is jurisdictional. Garcia v. United States, 542 A.2d 1237, 1241 (D.C. 1988). While the motion is typically brought by the defendant, the court may also reduce a sentence on its own motion. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 35(b). The government is entitled to respond to the motion in either situation, even if the government had agreed not to allocute at sentencing as part of a plea bargain. Braxton v. United States, 328 A.2d 385, 388 (D.C. 1974). The court must act on the motion within a "reasonable" time. Rule 35(b); Garcia, 542 A.2d at 1240.

Trial counsel should advise their client of the availability of the Rule 35 procedure at the time of sentencing. Any attorney who assures a client that he or she will file a Rule 35 motion bears the responsibility of doing so in a timely fashion. Cade v. United States, 311 A.2d 265 (D.C. 1973). While a court has discretion to appoint counsel to pursue a motion to reduce sentencing, there is no Sixth Amendment right to counsel for this purpose. United States v. Hamid, 461 A.2d 1043, 1044 (D.C. 1983); Burrell v. United States, 332 A.2d 344, 347 (D.C. 1975). This has led to some leniency in interpreting pro se requests for sentence reduction, illustrated by the courts' common practice of treating any timely-filed pro se letter requesting sentence modification as a Rule 35 motion. Garcia, 542 A.2d at 1240.

Motions to reduce sentence can be difficult to bring. Those based on the severity of sentence generally will not be successful when the sentence falls within statutory limits. Cook v. United

---

[30] The mandate usually issues 21 days from the date of the appellate decision. D.C. App. R. 41. The precise date of issuance in any particular case may be obtained from the court of appeals.

[31] The 120-day period runs from the issuance of the mandate in the direct appeal. The resolution of an appeal from a collateral motion or proceeding does not trigger the right to file a motion for reduction of sentence. Brown v. United States, 411 A.2d 631, 632 (D.C. 1980).

States, 932 A.2d 506, 506 (D.C. 2007) (citing to Crawford v. United States, 628 A.2d 1002, 1003-04 (D.C.1993)) (not abuse of discretion to deny motion where sentence falls within statutory guidelines and where later enacted voluntary sentencing guidelines would not have compelled a lesser sentence).

C. Reduction of the Minimum Term

The United States Parole Commission has discretion to apply to the sentencing court for reduction of a defendant's minimum sentence if it appears "that there is a reasonable probability that a prisoner will live and remain at liberty without violating the law, and that his immediate release is not incompatible with the welfare of society." D.C. Code § 24-401c. The court "shall have jurisdiction to act upon the application at any time prior to the expiration of the minimum sentence." Id. The trial court granted such an application over government objection in United States v. Forbes, 113 Wash. D.L Rptr. 305 (D.C. Super. Ct. Jan. 4, 1985) (Board's application indicated that the defendant "has been a model prisoner for many years," "has taken full advantage of the Department of Corrections rehabilitation programs," and "has been a good role model for his fellow inmates").

D. Motions Filed During Appeal

A trial court may entertain a Rule 35 motion while an appeal from conviction is pending. Johnson v. United States, 513 A.2d 798, 801 (D.C. 1986). It does not have jurisdiction to actually correct or reduce a sentence during the pendency of appeal, however. Goins v. United States, 353 A.2d 298, 300-01 (D.C. 1976); Franklin v. United States, 293 A.2d 278, 279 (D.C. 1972) (per curiam). Instead, if the trial court "indicates its willingness to grant the motion, then [the Court of Appeals will] remand the case record for the trial court to grant the requested relief." Johnson, 513 A.2d at 801; Bell v. United States, 676 A.2d 37, 41 (D.C. 1996) (discussing "case remands" vs. "record remands" and their impact on the jurisdiction of Superior Court and the Court of Appeals).

VI. SEALING ADULT ARREST RECORDS

Criminal record sealing is governed by D.C. Code §§ 16-801 through 805. The two methods of sealing a criminal record are claims of actual innocence, governed by § 16-802, and all other eligible cases, governed by § 16-803. Actual innocence claims, under § 16-802, have more stringent requirements, but with the greater reward of complete erasure that is intended to restore the movant to his or her status before arrest. In cases other than actual innocence, under § 16-803, the movant may in some instances have less of an evidentiary burden, but a successful motion does not result in the records of the arrest or conviction being erased as the records are still available for view under certain circumstances described below. A movant may file a motion to seal under §§ 16-802 and 16-803 at the same time or, if the court denies a motion filed under § 16-802 in a claim of actual innocence, the movant is also free to re-file under § 16-803 for the more limited sealing.

A. Claims of Actual Innocence (D.C. Code § 16-802)

A motion filed under a claim of actual innocence, § 16-802, obviously requires that the movant was not convicted of the case he or she seeks to seal. In addition to a verdict or finding of guilty, pleas of nolo contendere and not guilty by reason of insanity are also considered convictions. D.C. Code § 16-801(3). The movant must be able to produce evidence to satisfy the applicable burden of proof to establish that the offense either did not occur or that he or she did not commit the offense. D.C. Code § 16-802(b).

The burden of proof the movant must meet depends on the number of years that have passed since the date the case ended. If the motion is filed within 4 years after the prosecution was terminated, the movant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the offense did not occur or that he or she did not commit the offense. D.C. Code § 16-802(c). If the motion is filed more than 4 years after the prosecution was terminated, the movant must prove by the higher standard of clear and convincing evidence that the offense did not occur or that he or she did not commit the offense. D.C. Code § 16-802(d). An unjustified delay that substantially prejudices the government's response to the motion may cause the court to hold that there is a rebuttable presumption that the motion should not be granted. D.C. Code § 16-802(e).

Movants should file an affidavit to carry their burden of proof in support of their claims of actual innocence.

A successful motion under actual innocence will effectively erase the arrest record. D.C. Code § 16-802(i). Upon granting the motion, the court will order the prosecutor, the police, and other agencies such as the Pretrial Services Agency and Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency to seal all records of the arrest and prosecution. D.C. Code § 16-802(h)(4)-(6). The prosecuting agency, law enforcement, and the court keep a "restricted access" file of the case, but they may only look at the file if granted permission by the court after a finding that there is a compelling need to do so. D.C. Code § 16-802(h)(4)-(7).

2014 Supplement

V.C.B. v. United States*, 37 A.3d 286 (D.C. 2012). Evidentiary hearing appropriate in case where factual record is inconclusive.

B. Motions Other Than Claims of Actual Innocence (D.C. Code § 16-803)

Other than claims of actual innocence, all other motions to seal an arrest record are filed under § 16-803. Both the movant and the arrest record must qualify to be sealed. A movant is disqualified from filing under § 16-803 to seal a record of any arrest if he or she has: (A) a conviction in any jurisdiction after the arrest or conviction for which the motion to seal is filed, (B) a pending criminal case in any jurisdiction, or (C) a conviction in any jurisdiction for a felony other than a Bail Reform Act violation or an ineligible misdemeanor listed under § 16-801(9). D.C. Code §§ 16-803(a)-(c), 16-801(5). The arrest record must also qualify to be sealed by meeting the particular time requirements described below.

Unless waived in writing by the prosecuting agency, the following number of years must elapse prior to filing the motion to seal under § 16-803:

Non-convictions

Eligible misdemeanors – two years must elapse after the termination of the case. D.C. Code § 16-803(a)(1).

Felony and ineligible misdemeanors[32] – five years must elapse after the termination of the case. D.C. Code § 16-803(b)(1).

Convictions

Eligible misdemeanors and felony Bail Reform Act violations – ten years must elapse after the completion of the movant's sentence.[33] D.C. Code § 16-803(c)(1).

A motion pursuant to § 16-803 must seek to seal all of the movant's eligible arrests and convictions or waive in writing the right to request sealing of any omitted arrests or convictions, including any arrests or convictions as to which the required waiting period has elapsed. D.C. Code § 16-803(d). In other words, if a movant files before the waiting period is complete for any arrest or conviction, then he or she must waive in writing the right to ever file a motion to seal that arrest or conviction. Id. A motion filed under § 16-803 may also be dismissed if it appears that the movant has unreasonably delayed filing the motion and that the delay has prejudiced the government's ability to respond. D.C. Code § 16-803(k).

In deciding whether it is in the interests of justice to grant the motion and order the records sealed, the Court, under § 16-803(h)(1), shall consider:

(A) The movant's interest in having the records sealed,

(B) The community's interest in having access to the movant's records (including the interests of potential employers and public safety), and

(C) The community's interest in the movant's rehabilitation and employability.

The Court may also consider:

[32] For a list of ineligible misdemeanors, see § 16-801(9).

[33] No felony convictions other than for Bail Reform Act violations may be sealed. In fact, any felony conviction, other than for a Bail Reform Act violation, disqualifies the movant from filing to seal any conviction under § 16-803.

(A) The nature and circumstances of the offense;

(B) The movant's role in the offense and, if not convicted, the strength of the evidence against him or her;

(C) The movant's history and characteristics, including:

i. Character,
ii. Physical and mental condition,
iii. Employment history,
iv. History of drug and alcohol addiction, and any treatment received,
v. Overall criminal history,
vi. Criminal history, and
vii. Efforts at rehabilitation;

(D) The number of arrests and convictions to be sealed;

(E) The time that has passed since the arrests or convictions;

(F) Whether there have been past records sealed for reasons other than actual innocence; and

(G) Any statement(s) made by the victim(s) of the offense.

The burden of proof to be applied to the motion and who must meet the burden differs depending on the type of case and its outcome. For a motion to seal an eligible misdemeanor that was a non-conviction, the prosecutor has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that sealing the record is not in the interests of justice. D.C. Code § 16-803(i)(1). For a motion to seal a felony or ineligible misdemeanor that was a non-conviction, the movant has the burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that sealing the record is in the interests of justice. D.C. Code § 16-803(i)(2). Finally, for a motion to seal a conviction of an eligible misdemeanor or felony Bail Reform Act, the movant has the burden of establishing by clear and convincing evidence that sealing the record is in the interests of justice. D.C. Code § 16-803(i)(3).

If the court grants the motion to seal filed under § 16-803, the court shall order the prosecutor, the police, and any pretrial, corrections, or community supervision agency to remove from their publically available files all records related to the case. D.C. Code § 16-803(l). The court and prosecutor's office are entitled to retain a copy of the movant's arrest and conviction in a nonpublic file. Id. The sealed record may be made available without the movant's permission for use in civil litigation, by order of the court if good cause is shown, by an agency that issues professional or employment licenses if the case might disqualify the movant from being licensed, by any government employer if the employment is at a senior level, and by any licensed school, day care center, educational facility, or child protection agency. A movant must disclose the case in response to a direct question asked in connection with jury service or employment with any court, prosecutor's office, law enforcement agency, or licensing agency. D.C. Code § 16-803(m).

Type of Claim	Time Period	Burden of Proof	Level of Sealing
Innocence (applies to any offense provided there is not a conviction)	Within four years	Preponderance of the evidence	Sealed for all purposes to restore the movant to status held prior to arrest
	After four years	Clear and convincing evidence
Non-conviction of an eligible misdemeanor	Must wait at least two years after termination of the case	Prosecutor must establish by preponderance of the evidence that it is not in the interests of justice to grant relief	- Sealed from public view by court, police, and all other agencies - Movant must acknowledge case when directly asked for jury service or when applying to work for any court, prosecutor's office, law enforcement agency, or licensing agency - Movant has no duty to inform any other entity of the arrest or prosecution
Non-conviction of an ineligible misdemeanor or felony BRA	Must wait at least five years after termination of the case	Movant must establish by preponderance of the evidence that it is in the interests of justice to grant relief	Same as above
Conviction of an eligible misdemeanor or felony BRA	Movant must wait at least ten years after completion of the sentence	Movant must establish by clear and convincing evidence that it is in the interests of justice to grant relief	Same as above

VII. WRITS

A. Writ of Habeas Corpus

The Constitution secures the availability of the writ of habeas corpus, the so-called "great writ of liberty" of the English common law. U.S. Const. Art. I, § 9, cl. 2. While the motion to vacate sentence or judgment under to D.C. Code § 23-110 is the exclusive means for challenging the validity of a District of Columbia Superior Court judgment through collateral attack, the habeas corpus petition provides the mechanism for challenging the legality of confinement. See, e.g., Coates v. Elzie, 768 A.2d 997, 1000 (D.C. 2001) (habeas corpus reaches not only the fact, but also the form, of confinement) (citations omitted).

The Superior Court exercises habeas corpus jurisdiction over individuals confined in the District of Columbia by D.C. officials under D.C. Code § 16-1901(a). That section provides as follows:

> A person committed, detained, confined, or restrained from his lawful liberty within the District, under any color or pretense whatever, or a person in his behalf, may apply by petition to the appropriate court, or a judge thereof, for a writ of habeas corpus, to the end that the cause of the commitment, detainer, confinement, or restraint may be inquired into. The court or the judge applied to, if the facts set forth in the petition make a prima facie case, shall forthwith grant the writ, directed to the officer or other person in whose custody or keeping the party so detained is returnable forthwith before the court or judge.

D.C. Code 16-1901(b) precludes filing of habeas petition in Superior Court when actions of federal officials are challenged. Owens v. Gaines, 219 F. Supp. 2d 94, 99 (2002).

The federal courts exercise general habeas corpus jurisdiction over D.C. Code offenders serving sentences in federal facilities pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2241. Federal courts have jurisdiction when the remedy under § 23-110 is "inadequate or ineffective to test the legality of [the] detention," or when the suit is against federal employees. § 23-110(g); Swain v. Pressley, 430 U.S. 372, 381 (1977) (upholding constitutionality of § 23-110(g)).[34] Individuals confined in federal facilities or under jurisdiction of federal officials must seek habeas relief under 28 U.S.C. § 2241. Gant v. Reilly, 224 F.Supp.2d 26, 39 (D.C.D.C. 2002) (where offender attacks legality of parole revocation decision made by United States Parole Commission, he must seek relief in federal court, since the alleged due process violation arises from the exercise of federal agency's discretion and not a state-level exercise of discretion); see also Neal v. D.C. Department of Corrections, 684 F.2d 17, 20 (D.C. Cir. 1982) (citing Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 475, 486 (1973)) (federal habeas may also be available to contest an unconstitutional institutional transfer). But see Beard v. Kindler, 130 S. Ct. 612, 618 (2009) ("We hold that a discretionary state procedural rule can serve as an adequate ground to bar federal habeas review.")

Further, those petitions must be filed in the jurisdiction in which the petitioner is confined. Rumsfeld v. Padilla, 542 U.S. 426 (2004) (habeas corpus relief must be directed against the petitioner's custodian – the person with the ability to produce the prisoner's body before the court); see also, Knight v. United States, 892 A.2d 1096, 1098 (D.C. 2006); Alston v. United States, 590 A.2d 511 (D.C. 1991) (on motion to correct sentence, held that D.C. courts cannot grant habeas relief to prisoners not incarcerated in D.C. or held by D.C. correctional facilities).

In order to prevail on a federal habeas claim, a petitioner must assert his or her claims with sufficient particularity. Dye v. Hofbauer, 546 U.S. 1, 4 (2005). These claims must show that constitutional error resulted in a "substantial and injurious effect" on the petitioner's case. Fry v.

[34] D.C. Superior Court judges are fully competent to decide federal constitutional issues; the fact that they do not have the tenure and salary protection of Art. III judges, does not mean that remedy provided by § 23-110 is inadequate or ineffective. See Swain, 430 U.S. at 383.

Pliler, 551 U.S. 112, 121-22 (2007) citing Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619, 631 (1993). A petitioner presenting new evidence in a habeas petition must show that the new evidence renders it "more likely than not that no reasonable juror would have found [him or her] guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." House v. Bell, 547 U.S. 518, 536-37 (2006) (citing to Schlup v. Delo, 513 U.S. 298, 324 (1995).

B. Writ of Error Coram Nobis

The writ of error coram nobis is designed to correct errors not apparent from the face of the record. United States v. Hamid, 531 A.2d 628, 631-32 (D.C. 1987); United States v. Higdon, 496 A.2d 618, 619 (D.C. 1985). It is available only in extraordinary circumstances – "circumstances compelling such action to achieve justice." United States v. Morgan, 346 U.S. 502, 511 (1954); see also Carlisle v. United States, 517 U.S. 416, 428-29 (1996) (writ of coram nobis traditionally only used to correct factual errors "material to the validity and regularity of the legal processing itself" such as defendant's death or not being of age (citation omitted)). The defendant must meet the following criteria:

> (1) the trial court be unaware of the facts giving rise to the petition; (2) the omitted information be such that it would have prevented the sentence or judgment; (3) petitioner be able to justify the failure to provide the information; (4) the error be extrinsic to the record; and (5) the error be "of the most fundamental character"

Hamid, 531 A.2d at 634 (citations omitted) (citing Morgan, 346 U.S. at 512). Hamid is the only case in this jurisdiction to grant such relief in recent years. 531 A.2d 628. In this case, the court found that both counsel and the defendant were under such extreme duress from fear of reprisals by the co-defendant during trial and sentencing that they were unable to present mitigating information at sentencing. The trial court found, and the Court of Appeals agreed, that the situation met each of the five prerequisites, and thus that the writ of error coram nobis was appropriate.

2014 Supplement

Smith v. United States*, 20 A.3d 759 (D.C. 2011). Trial court did not err in denying writ of error coram nobis where defendant voluntarily and intelligently entered unconditional guilty plea and where trial judge plainly stated that "omitted" information would have been insufficient to prevent sentence or entry of judgment.

APPENDIX

TIME LIMITS FOR POST-CONVICTION LITIGATION

A. Within 7 Days after Jury is Discharged

- Motion for Judgment of Acquittal or Arrest of Judgment (see supra Section II) – Counsel should attempt to raise these issues as early as possible; may also make motion for more time because rule allows for "such further time as the Court may fix during the 7-day period."

- Motion for New Trial (see supra Section III.A) – for any ground other than newly discovered evidence; may also make motion for more time because rule allows for "such further time as the Court may fix during the 7-day period."

B. Within 120 Days

After Sentencing

- Motion to Correct Illegally Imposed Sentence (see supra Section VI.A) – court had authority to impose the sentence, but erred procedurally in doing so.

After Sentencing, Probation Revocation, or Final Appellate Disposition

- Motion to Reduce Sentence (see supra Section VI.B) – trial counsel should advise client of motion's availability at the time of sentencing.

After Dismissal

- Motion to Seal Pursuant to Rule 118 (see supra Section VII) – general time period; extended to three years only if there is good cause and "to prevent manifest injustice" (see below).

C. Within 180 Days of Issuance of Mandate in Direct Appeal

- Motion to Recall the Mandate (see supra Section IV.B) – for ineffective assistance of appellate counsel.

D. Within 3 Years

After Verdict or Finding of Guilt

- Motion for New Trial Based on Newly Discovered Evidence (see supra Section III.B) – the defendant must establish that the evidence qualifies as "new" under the 5-part Thompson-Heard test.

After Dismissal

- Motion to Seal Pursuant to Rule 118 (see supra Section VII) – must be for good cause and "to prevent manifest injustice"

E. Any Time

- Motion to Correct Illegal Sentence (see supra Section VI.A) – sentencing court acted beyond its authority in imposing the sentence.

- Motion for Release under D.C. Code § 23-110 – can be brought at any time, by anyone in custody, in order to challenge an illegal detention.

- Motion for a New Trial or to Vacate a Conviction under the Innocence Protection Act (see supra Section V) – must be a claim of innocence based on new evidence.

CHAPTER 12

PAROLE AND SUPERVISED RELEASE

I. INTRODUCTION AND LEGAL BACKGROUND OF PAROLE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

A person who is sentenced in D.C. Superior Court and subsequently placed on parole or supervised release has a right to a hearing before the revocation of such conditional release. Parole revocation is the administrative procedure through which a person, who has been released from a prison sentence on parole or supervised release, is returned to prison for violations of parole. Parole is a constitutionally protected liberty interest; due process requires that a state provide basic rights of fair treatment when it seeks to revoke parole. These fundamental procedures were first explicated in the case of Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972).

In 1997, Congress passed the District of Columbia Self Government Improvement and Revitalization Act ("the Revitalization Act"), D.C. Code § 24-1201 et. seq. Among other things, this legislation abolished the D.C. Board of Parole on August 5, 2000, and transferred the function of parole supervision and parole revocation to the Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency (CSOSA) and the U.S. Parole Commission (USPC), respectively.[1] See D.C. Code § 24-131. The first stage of the transfer occurred in August of 1998, when the U.S. Parole Commission acquired the parole grant functions—making parole grant decisions and re-parole decisions. The final stage occurred on August 5, 2000, when the Commission assumed the authority to issue warrants for parole violations, conduct revocation hearings and modify conditions of parole for D.C. Code offenders.

The U.S. Parole Commission has promulgated regulations to govern, respectively, parole grant and revocation of D.C. Code offenders. Those regulations are found in the Code of Federal Regulations at 28 C.F.R. Part 2, Subpart C. Both the grant and revocation regulations are presently published at 65 Fed. Reg. 19996-20011 (April 13, 2000).

In August 2000, the District of Columbia ended its practice of sentencing defendants to parole terms and began sentencing them to terms of supervised release instead. For most purposes, the two regimes are indistinguishable: the rights of a supervised releasee are the same as those of a parolee, the procedures used at a supervised release revocation are the same as those at a parole revocation, the fact-finding process is the same, and the sentencing guidelines are the same. Nevertheless, there are a few key differences between the two systems, and those will be discussed infra Part V. Aside from those differences, however, you can assume that whatever is said about the parole process in this chapter applies equally to persons on supervised release.

This section of the manual is designed to assist counsel in providing representation before the U.S. Parole Commission. To that end, we will set forth the basic law regarding the fundamental constitutional protections governing parole revocation hearings; we will provide a description of the procedures and rights set forth in the proposed U.S. Parole Commission regulations and provide practice suggestions, including legal challenges to some of the Commission's regulations and practices; and finally, we will address administrative and judicial review available.

[1] The District of Columbia parole statute is found at D.C. Code § 24-401 (repealed). That statute sets forth basic procedures and established the D.C. Board of Parole (D.C. Board) as the body responsible for parole supervision, parole grants, and revocation of D.C. Code offenders. The D.C. Board in turn promulgated rules and regulations governing parole, which are contained in the D.C. Municipal Regulations (DCMR) at 28 DCMR Chapters 1 and 2.

II. CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF A PAROLEE

Due Process: Parole, although a limited liberty, includes the freedom ". . . to be with family and friends and to form the other enduring attachments of normal life." Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 482 (1972). In Morrissey, the leading case on parole revocation, the Court explains that parole is a "liberty interest" that is protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. Id. Since, however, "the revocation of parole is not part of a criminal prosecution . . . the full panoply of rights due a defendant in such a proceeding does not apply." Id. at 480. Still, fundamental due process procedures must be observed when the government seeks to revoke parole. These fundamental protections include:

> (a) written notice of the claimed violations of parole; (b) disclosure to the parolee of evidence against him; (c) opportunity to be heard in person and to present witnesses and documentary evidence; (d) the right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses (unless the hearing officer specifically finds good cause for not allowing confrontation); (e) a 'neutral and detached' hearing body such as a traditional parole board, members of which need not be judicial officers or lawyers; and (f) a written statement by the fact finders as to the evidence relied on and reasons for revoking parole.

Id. at 489.

Hearing: In addition to establishing these rights, Morrissey also makes clear that a parole revocation hearing is a two-step process. First, Morrissey requires a preliminary probable cause hearing reasonably near the time and place of any arrest on a parole violator warrant. The purpose of this hearing is to determine whether probable cause, the minimal showing for imprisoning the parolee prior to the revocation hearing, can be shown. Id. at 485. Second, there must be a final hearing to determine whether parole was violated. The final revocation hearing must be held within a "reasonable time" after the arrest. In Morrissey, a sixty-day delay was found to be reasonable. In cases where a violation is found, the hearing examiner then must decide whether revocation of parole is the appropriate consequence, or if reinstatement is warranted in spite of the violation(s).

The Supreme Court has affirmed the continuing vitality of Morrissey, and expanded it to similar situations. See Young v. Harper, 520 U.S. 143 (1997) (Oklahoma pre-parole program which releases prisoners to reduce overcrowding is sufficiently similar to parole as to require the due process protections outlined in Morrissey). For due process purposes, there is no difference between revocation of probation and revocation of parole. Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778, 782 (1973). Thus, favorable probation revocation cases are applicable to constitutional issues arising in parole cases and counsel should cite to them when appropriate in a parole hearing.

Challenging Due Process:

- ✓ Counsel should cite to favorable probation revocation cases, as there is no difference between revocation of probation and revocation of parole

A. Right to Appointed Counsel

The Morrissey court expressly declined to decide whether there is a right to counsel for indigents facing parole revocation. Morrissey, 408 U.S. at 489. A year later, in Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973), the Court found that there was no inflexible constitutional right requiring appointment of counsel in every probation or parole revocation hearing, but asserted that "there will remain certain cases in which fundamental fairness—the touchstone of due process—will require the State provide at its expense counsel for indigent probationers and parolees." Id. at 790. As a matter of constitutional law, then, whether counsel must be appointed is a decision that should be made on "a case-by-case basis in the exercise of sound discretion by the state authority charged with the responsibility for administering the probation and parole system." Id. In local revocation hearings before the U.S. Parole Commission, however, appointment of counsel is not at issue. The Commission's regulations for Federal Code offenders provides for appointment of counsel pursuant to the Criminal Justice Act. Its regulations for D.C. Code offenders provide for appointment of attorneys from the Public Defender Service for the District of Columbia, and provide that the parolee or supervised releasee be advised of that right at the time of the preliminary hearing. 28 C.F.R. § 2.101.

B. Right to Notice of Hearing

The notice requirement set forth in Morrissey is intended to prevent unfair surprise and to permit the parolee to prepare to contest the alleged violations of parole and present mitigating evidence in the hearing. Morrissey, 408 U.S. at 489. The parolee should be given written notice as to the precise grounds on which evidence will be taken during the hearing. United States v. Webster, 492 F.2d 1048, 1051 (D.C. Cir. 1974). Due process and 18 U.S.C. § 4214 require that a parolee be given a statement of the charges against him, his rights, and the possible outcome when adjudicated by the Commission. Short v. United States Parole Comm'n 549 F. Supp. 118 (D.D.C. 1982); see also Miller v. Hadden, 811 F.2d 743, 747 (2d Cir. 1987) (warrant listing allegations provided sufficient notice); United States ex rel. Carson v. Taylor, 540 F.2d 1156 (2d Cir. 1976) (due process violated by parole board's refusal to grant parolee access to documents considered at his revocation hearing, and by board's failure to provide notice of one of the grounds for revocation). In practice, this function is usually performed by presenting alleged violators with a copy of the warrant issued by the Parole Commission, which sets forth the charges. Parolees are usually asked to sign that warrant upon their arrest, as evidence of notice. In rare cases, however, a failure to properly notify a parolee of the charges against him, or the consequences of his revocation hearing, can amount to a due process violation. See, e.g., Vanes v. United States Parole Comm'n, 741 F.2d 1197 (9th Cir. 1984) (failure to notify parolee that revocation for particular conviction would cause him to lose credit for street time violated due process, even though parolee knew of conviction and admitted to it at revocation hearing).

C. Right to Disclosure of Evidence and File Materials

There is a due process right to disclosure of the evidence against the parolee, prior to the revocation hearing. Morrissey, 408 U.S. at 489. The U.S. Parole Commission interprets the due process disclosure obligation to require only disclosure of evidence of the violation, not disclosure of additional evidence to be considered against the parolee in the dispositional portion of the hearing. This is problematic, as the parolee's entire file is clearly considered by the Commission in making the disposition decision after a violation is found. Although the issue was not specifically addressed in Morrissey, lower courts have held that due process notice requirements apply to both phases of a parole revocation hearing. According to those cases, evidence to be used in the dispositional phase must also be disclosed prior to the hearing. Thus, a parolee was denied due process when examiners at his parole revocation hearing relied upon undisclosed evidence in deciding that parole should be revoked. United States ex rel. Carson v. Taylor, 540 F.2d 1156 (2d Cir. 1976).

D. Right to Preliminary Hearing

When a parolee is arrested on a parole violator's warrant, due process requires that a hearing be held soon thereafter to permit a challenge to the basis for the warrant. Morrissey requires that a preliminary probable cause hearing be held reasonably near the time and place of arrest on a parole warrant. The primary purpose of the hearing is to determine whether the government can make the minimal probable cause showing necessary to imprison the parolee pending the revocation hearing:

> . . . [D]ue process would seem to require that some minimal inquiry be conducted at or reasonably near the place of the alleged parole violation or arrest and as promptly as convenient after arrest while information is fresh and sources are available. Such an inquiry should be seen as in the nature of a 'preliminary hearing' to determine whether there is probable cause or reasonable ground to believe that the arrested parolee has committed acts that would constitute a violation of parole conditions.

Morrissey, 408 U.S. at 485 (internal citations omitted).

In exercising the discretion permitted by Morrissey to write the detailed procedures for parole revocation, states have developed practices that combine the probable cause and the final revocation hearing. Combined hearings are constitutionally permissible when there is no prejudice from delay. Heath v. United States Parole Comm'n, 788 F.2d 85, 90 (2d Cir. 1986) cert. denied, 479 U.S. 253 (1986); Pierre v. Wash. Bd., 699 F.2d 471, 473 (9th Cir. 1983) (no need for separate preliminary hearing where final revocation hearing held 21 days after arrest). What is considered a "prejudicial" delay varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. See Vargas v. United States Parole Comm'n, 865 F.2d 191 (9th Cir. 1988) (40 days between execution of the warrant and preliminary hearing violates USPC regulations).

The purpose of the preliminary hearing requirement is to prevent pre-revocation hearing imprisonment without a prior finding of probable cause. Thus, courts have found that due process does not require a preliminary hearing where the probationer is not imprisoned prior to the revocation hearing. Smith v. United States, 474 A.2d 1271, 1272-73 (D.C. 1983). Courts have approved elimination of the preliminary hearing requirements in other limited circumstances, the most common of which is when the defendant is detained on other charges, or when there has already been a conviction on a new charge, thereby providing sufficient evidence of a parole violation. Moody v. Dagget, 429 U.S. 78, 86 n.7 (1976) (conviction on new charge eliminates need for preliminary hearing, as standard of proof is higher at trial and second hearing would be redundant); Doyle v. Elsea, 658 F.2d 512, 516 (7th Cir. 1981) (detention based on new charge obviates the need for preliminary hearing). However, a grand jury finding of probable cause alone is not sufficient, and a client in that position is still entitled to a preliminary hearing before being detained solely on a parole warrant. United States v. Lewis, 110 D.W.L.R. 1409 (D.C. Sup. Ct. June 23, 1982) (indictment not an adequate substitute for preliminary hearing).

Under the United States Parole Commission regulations for D.C. Code offenders, the preliminary interview serves additional functions beyond assuring probable cause. It is the vehicle for providing the parolee with notice of the allegations and an opportunity to request counsel, witnesses, and disclosure of evidence. In addition, determination of the type, location, and procedural requirements of the revocation hearing is made at a parolee's preliminary interview under those regulations.

E. Right to Present and Confront Evidence

Parolees have a right to appear and testify at their own revocation hearings. United States ex rel. Obler v. Kenton, 262 F. Supp. 205, (D. Conn. 1967). A revocation hearing where a parolee's participation is inhibited is critically flawed. United States ex rel. Hitchcock v. Kenton, 256 F. Supp. 296 (D. Conn. 1966). The inability to present evidence and to confront witnesses limits the effectiveness of counsel in violation of due process. See Green v. Nelson, 442 F. Supp. 1047 (D. Conn. 1977). In Nixon v. Quick, 781 A.2d 754 (D.C. 2001), the court reversed the denial of parolee's petition for habeas corpus that alleged that he had been excluded from his parole hearing during the testimony of his former girlfriend and he had been denied access to a letter from her that was used as evidence against him. The Parole Board urged that the witness was concerned for her safety, but made no finding that excluding the defendant from the hearing was necessary to avoid danger to the witness. The court found the record insufficient to uphold the decision, and deemed the Parole Board's concern for the witness's safety an inadequate basis for curtailment of the parolee's rights.

F. Final Revocation Hearing Decisions

Morrissey requires, as an absolute minimum, that upon revocation, the Commission must issue a "written statement . . . as to the evidence relied on and reasons for revoking parole." Morrissey, 408 United States at 489; see infra Part IV (discusses requirements set forth in the Commission's regulations).

G. Right to a Hearing within a Reasonable Time

The Morrissey requirement of prompt revocation hearings was designed to protect the parolee's liberty interest. Thus, when a parolee is in pre-trial detention on the basis of a new criminal charge, a prompt revocation hearing is not required since the parole warrant has not been executed. This rationale essentially serves to approve the practice of lodging detainers against parolees who are imprisoned for new criminal offenses, rather than forcing the Commission to hold such hearings earlier. Doyle, 658 F.2d at 516. A "detainer" in this context is an unexecuted parole warrant, which is lodged against the incarcerated parolee but does not execute unless and until the pre-existing hold from the pre-trial case is lifted. While the client is in this posture, the timeliness requirements of Morrisey do not apply, as he is not formally detained on the parole warrant, but is instead held on other charges. If and when the hold is released in the pre-trial case, the warrant will execute immediately and the client will continue to be detained. Because the detention is then the result of the parole warrant alone, the ordinary requirements of timeliness under Morrissey are triggered for all subsequent proceedings. The Supreme Court registered its approval for this practice in Moody, 429 U.S. 78. See also infra Part IV.B

Timing Scheme: While the timing scheme set forth in Morrissey is rather vague, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia has set out a much more transparent schedule for the Commission to follow. In Long v. Gaines, 173 F. Supp. 2d 35 (D.D.C. 2001), the court held that the regulations, practices and procedures with regard to revocation hearings violated the parolee or supervise releasee's Fifth Amendment rights. As a result, the court entered a permanent injunction against the U.S. Parole Commission. The U.S. Parole Commission shall fully comply with the following: (1) parolees and supervised releasees arrested for alleged violations will receive a probable cause hearing within five days of arrest; (2) full revocation hearings will occur between 50-65 days from arrest; (3) prior to the revocation hearing, the parolee or supervised releasee will receive all the evidence used in determining whether a violation has occurred and parole should be revoked; and (4) a final determination and notice of action will be issued to the parolee or supervised releasee no later than 86 days after arrest.

Nevertheless, despite the clarity of the court's scheme, in practice, it is not unusual for the Commission to miss these prescribed deadlines. Counsel must take care to note the date on which the parole warrant was executed (not merely issued), and to raise appropriate objections whenever there is an undue delay. A parolee may be entitled to recover damages in a § 1983 lawsuit based upon due process violations where the parolee is imprisoned without a prompt hearing. Wolfel v. Sanborn, 666 F.2d 1005 (6th Cir. 1981) (vacated on other grounds); see also Beck v. Kansas University Psychiatry Foundation, 580 F. Supp. 527, 535 (1984).

The date on which the warrant is issued is also important. In at least two federal cases, probation or parole warrants have been invalidated because of an unreasonable delay between issuance and execution. See United States v. Gernie, 228 F. Supp. 329 (1964) (delay of eleven years); United States v. Ragen, 59 F. Supp. 374 (1945) (delay of fourteen years). This is because "[a] parole or probation violation warrant loses its force, with the result that the initiating agency no longer has jurisdiction over the subject if, considering all the circumstances, service is not had within a reasonable time after issuance." Robinson v. Sartwell, 264 F. Supp. 531, 534 (1967). Factors to be considered in determining the reasonableness of the delay are said to include: "the time lapse between issuance and execution of the warrant, the efforts of the Board to serve it, and the conduct of the parolee in frustrating service." United States v. Kenton, 252 F. Supp. 344 (D. Conn. 1966).

Right to a Hearing within a Reasonable Time:

- ✓ Take note of the date on which the parole warrant was executed (not merely issued)
- ✓ Raise appropriate objections whenever there is an undue delay
- ✓ Parolee may be entitled to recover damages in a § 1983 lawsuit

H. Waiver of Rights

Since parole is a liberty interest protected by the Constitution, waivers of the rights delineated in Morrissey must meet the test for waiver of constitutional rights. They must be knowing, intelligent, and voluntary. See White v. White, 925 F.2d 287, 292 (9th Cir. 1991).

Unlike other constitutional rights, most circuit courts of appeals have held that a Rule 11 type of colloquy is not necessary in order to validate the waiver of Morrissey rights. See United States v. LeBlanc, 175 F.3d 511 (7th Cir. 1999); United States v. Stocks, 104 F.2d 308 (9th Cir. 1997); United States v. Pelensky, 129 F.3d 63 (2d Cir. 1997); United States v. Rapert, 813 F.2d 182, 184-85 (8th Cir. 1987); United States v. Stehl, 665 F.2d 58, 59-60 (4th Cir. 1981); United States v. Johns, 625 F.2d 1175, 1176 (5th Cir. 1980).

Few courts have addressed what sort of test is appropriate to determine whether a waiver is voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. Although the courts concede that "this conclusion does not change the fact that a defendant's waiver must actually be knowing and voluntary," Pelensky, 129 F.3d at 68, most have not defined a test for making such a determination. Most courts have simply reviewed the record and made the waiver determination without explicating the standard. In LeBlanc, however, the court expressly articulated a "totality of the circumstances" standard. Under the totality of the circumstances should include consideration of:

> whether the defendant understands the charge against him and the possible sentence . . . whether the defendant understands the procedures he foregoes when he relinquishes his right to a . . . hearing.

LeBlanc, 175 F.3d at 511.

Even in LeBlanc, the court focused its determination of these factors by examining the record of the parolee's discussion with the revoking judge. Therefore, in order to preserve a voluntariness issue, counsel should be careful to have the parolee's lack of understanding evident in the record of the hearing. Counsel should be aware that waivers have been found valid despite apparently coercive conduct by parole and prison officials. Counsel must be careful to make a clear record – in writing where possible – of all rights asserted, requests made, and government conduct infringing on the assertion of any rights.

2014 Supplement

Morgan v. United States*, 47 A.3d 532 (D.C. 2012). In a probation revocation hearing, the minimum requirements of due process demand a consistent theory where one defendant faces two proceedings concerned with the same offense; however, to violate due process, an inconsistency must exist at the core of the prosecutor's case and must render the findings of the show-cause hearing unreliable.

III. BASES FOR REVOCATION OF PAROLE OF SUPERVISED RELEASE

Parole or supervised release may not be revoked in the absence of a violation by the releasee. The Commission may only revoke because of the releasee's failure to abide by its conditions. The conditions of parole for D.C. Code offenders appear in the regulations at 28 C.F.R. § 2.85. Special conditions may also be added based on the offense and/or the circumstances. There are two broad categories of parole and supervised release violations. The first and most common type of violation is a "technical" or "administrative" violation. Such violations include positive drug tests, failure to keep appointments, or failure to abide by any other condition set forth by the Parole Commission. The second type of violation, known as a law violation, is charged when the Parole Commission believes that a releasee has committed one or more new criminal offenses.

Technical/Administrative Violations: The most common type of alleged violation is a technical, or administrative, violation. Just as in the probation context, a client on parole or supervised release may be required to comply with myriad conditions, including keeping appointments, maintaining employment, frequent drug testing, GPS monitoring, maintaining a curfew, attending specific classes or programs, and more. This combination of conditions is set, modified, and monitored by your client's parole officer. In the District of Columbia, such officers are known as community supervision officers (CSO), and they are employed by CSOSA. The decision of when to initiate revocation proceedings on the basis of technical violations is left largely to the discretion of these CSOs. One or two minor infractions, such as a missed appointment or a positive drug test, will rarely trigger a revocation, but the question of how many infractions are needed before a CSO will request revocation for technical violations depends largely on the disposition of the particular CSO.

When contesting technical violations, counsel should verify that the condition of parole or supervised release alleged to have been violated was an express condition, not merely an implicit understanding. See Resper v. United States, 527 A.2d 1257 (D.C. 1987) (failure of probationer to enter a drug program not a proper basis for revocation where court's order did not require him to reach program by his own efforts and no assistance was provided); Smith v. United States, 474 A.2d 1271, 1274 (D.C. 1983); Carradine v. United States, 420 A.2d 1385, 1389-90 (D.C. 1980) ("mental wellness" not a ground for revocation where it was not an express condition); Humphrey v. State, 428 A.2d 440 (Md. 1981) (where time limit not set on fulfillment of a condition, parolee may not be revoked for failure to enter a drug treatment program within a certain timeframe).

Individuals on parole or supervised release may not be revoked for failing to comply with a condition of parole where it is not within their power to comply with the condition. Accordingly, probationers may not be revoked for failure to access programming that is unavailable to them. See Humphrey, 428 A.2d 440. Similarly, parolees may not be revoked for failure to pay fines unless it is proven that they did not make bona fide attempts to pay. Bearden v. Georgia, 461 U.S. 660 (1983).

A parole authority may not issue a warrant for a violation that has already been disposed of in a previous revocation proceeding. To this end, at least one federal court of appeals has explicitly held that a parole board did not have the authority to issue a subsequent violator warrant citing the same grounds as a warrant which had already been disposed of in the parolee's favor. Maslauskas v. United States Bd. of Parole, 639 F.2d 935 (3rd Cir. 1980).

Law Violations: Courts have addressed a number of issues arising from parole and probation violations that are based upon new criminal offenses. In addressing the quantity of proof necessary to revoke based upon a new arrest, United States v. Webster found that neither an arrest nor a charge alone is a sufficient basis for revocation. 492 F.2d 1048 (D.C. Cir. 1974). The question for revocation purposes is whether the government shows by a preponderance of the evidence[2] that the new offense was in fact "committed." Id. The D.C. Court of Appeals also found that conviction is not required for revocation, but noted that it would be "unseemly" to base revocation on charge resulting in acquittal. In re A.W., 353 A.2d 686, 695 (D.C. 1976); s*ee also Young v. United States*, 863 A.2d 804 (D.C. 2004). Of course, any new violation that results in a conviction, either through a plea or at trial, will automatically constitute a parole violation, as the standard of proof is higher in the former setting than in the latter.

A parole board may, consistent with due process considerations, issue and execute a parole violator warrant and then formally revoke parole based on the parolee's being charged with a new criminal offense, even though the criminal matter has not yet gone to trial. Melson v. Sard, 402 F.2d 653 (D.C. Cir. 1968). The parole revocation hearing on a new charge may be postponed for as long as the parolee is held on another matter and even until the completion of a new criminal sentence when the parolee is sentenced for a new crime. Moody, 429 U.S. 78.

Parolees facing revocation based on criminal allegations have a Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. See United States ex rel. Carioscia v. Meisner, 331 F.Supp. 635, 642 (N.D. Ill. 1971) (recognizing Fifth Amendment implications in parole revocation process). In Melson v. Sard, 402 F.2d 653, the court held a parolee facing pending charges had use immunity precluding affirmative use of his revocation hearing statements in the pending criminal proceedings, due to the compulsion inherent in having to defend against revocation. However, the circuits appear to be split on the issue of immunity. See, e.g., Flint v. Mullen, 499 F.2d 100,

[2] The preponderance standard is not a constitutional mandate per se. No court has prescribed the preponderance standard, although courts have opined that it is clear that parole revocations need not be based upon evidence "beyond a reasonable doubt." However, no court has addressed the preponderance standard on constitutional grounds. Instead, the courts have interpreted state and federal statutory language to require the preponderance standard of proof.

103 (1st Cir. 1974) (per curiam) (no immunity where other evidence sufficient to establish violation); Lynott v. Story, 929 F.2d 228, 230 (6th Cir. 1991) (same); United States v. Brugger, 549 F.2d 2, 4 (7th Cir. 1977) (same); Ryan v. Montana, 580 F.2d 988, 991 (9th Cir. 1978) (same).

The Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule is not applicable at state parole revocation hearings. Pennsylvania Bd. of Prob. & Parole v. Scott, 524 U.S. 357 (1998). Thus, revocation of parole can be based entirely upon illegally obtained evidence. In Barnes v. District of Columbia Board of Parole, 759 A.2d 1073 (D.C. 2000), the court held that the Parole Board could consider facts underlying a murder charge that had been dismissed in deciding to revoke parole and an attack on the merits of the Board's decision is not subject to judicial review. Because Barnes failed to show that the manner in which the revocation hearing had been conducted was unlawful; the denial of his petition for habeas corpus was affirmed.

IV. PAROLE COMMISSION REGULATIONS FOR REVOCATION OF D.C. CODE OFFENDERS

The U.S. Parole Commission regulations governing revocation of D.C. Code offenders, appears in the Code of Federal Regulations at 28 C.F.R. Part 2, Subpart C. Both the grant and revocation regulations are presently published at 65 Fed. Reg. 19996-20011. This section describes those procedures and offers practice suggestions.

A. Parole Supervision, Conditions, and Jurisdiction

When a D.C. Code offender is released to the D.C. Metropolitan Area, the offender will be supervised by CSOSA Community Supervision Officers. When released to another jurisdiction, supervision will be by a U.S. Probation Officer in that area. 28 C.F.R. § 2.91(a). A parolee's sentence continues to run and will expire at the full term expiration date (full term date). The parole term is run concurrently with any other term of parole, probation or supervised release. 28 C.F.R. § 2.92(b). Parole revocation proceedings may by initiated up to the parolee's full term date. 28 C.F.R. § 2.98(c).[3] The issuance of a parole violation warrant tolls the parole sentence, thus preventing the expiration of the parole sentence and preserving the Commission's jurisdiction over the case. 28 C.F.R. § 2.98(d).

Persons on parole or supervised release must adhere to a number of strict rules. The conditions of parole are set forth at 28 C.F.R. § 2.85. In addition to complying with those conditions, parolees must adhere to any additional conditions set forth by the Commission for their individual cases. Parole can be revoked based upon a technical/administrative violation (violating a condition of parole) or allegations of a new criminal offense. As a general proposition, technical violations of parole are not deemed to be as serious as being charged with a new crime.

[3] If the parolee was mandatorily released for an offense committed before April 11, 1987, the parole warrant must be issued earlier – no later than 180 days before his full term date. 28 C.F.R. § 2.98 (c).

B. Steps in the Revocation Process under the Commission's Regulations

The proposed regulations provide for the following steps in the parole revocation process:

1. Warrant Issuance and Execution

a. Regulations

The regulations governing parole summonses and warrants are found at 28 C.F.R. §§ 2.98 through 2.100. The parole revocation process begins with the issuance of either a summons to appear at a parole revocation hearing or a parole violation warrant (parole warrant). 28 C.F.R. § 2.98.[4] A parole warrant may be issued up to the time of the parolee's full term date. 28 C.F.R. § 2.98(c).[5] Issuance of a warrant will prevent the expiration of the parole sentence and preserve the Commission's jurisdiction to decide whether to revoke. 28 C.F.R. § 2.98(d). The issuance of the parole warrant tolls the running of the parole term.

A parole warrant is "executed" when the parolee is taken into custody or arrested on the parole violation warrant. The arrests are generally made by the U.S. Marshals Service. Upon execution of the warrant, a copy of both the warrant and the application for warrant by the Parole/Community Supervision Officer (CSO) is given to the parolee. 28 C.F.R. § 2.99(b). Execution of the warrant obligates the Commission to begin the process of notice and hearing for parole revocation. 28 C.F.R. § 2.99(b). If the parolee is held in custody on another case, however, the parole warrant will not be executed, but will lodge as a detainer (an unexecuted warrant). The warrant will not be executed until the parolee is released from the new charge or sentence. 28 C.F.R. § 2.100; see also supra Part II.G.

b. Practice Suggestions

Implications of Warrant Execution: When and if a parole warrant gets executed is critical in three ways: 1) execution is necessary to initiate the revocation process; 2) execution of the warrant is necessary to ensure that the parolee receives credit in the parole case for time served pending a hearing; and 3) execution of the parole warrant is necessary for any subsequent sentence to be served concurrently with the parole sentence. These areas are important when the parolee is held on new charges that are pending in court.

Five-Day Holds: When a parolee is arrested on a new charge and presented in Superior Court, he will be subject to the "five-day hold" provision of D.C. Code § 23-1322(b)(1)(C). At this five-day hold return date, the court will determine whether there is a parole warrant, and set conditions of release in the new case. Assuming a warrant has been issued and release granted in the new case, if a nominal bond is ordered at the five-day hold return date, it ensures that pretrial credit is awarded against any new sentence. However, the nominal bond also prevents the [4] The process could also be initiated under a summons under 28 C.F.R. § 2.98(1)(i). In practice, however, the Commission does not utilize the summons procedure.

[5] If the parolee was mandatorily released for an offense committed before April 11, 1987, the parole warrant must be issued earlier – no later than 180 days before his full term date. 28 C.F.R. § 2.98(c).

revocation process from going forward, since the parole warrant will not execute. Thus, the client may be prevented from receiving sentence credit in the parole case. When any bond is imposed in the new case, the parole warrant will not be executed because the person is held on the new case. This is because a parole warrant does not execute when another case is holding a parolee. Parole warrants are lodged as detainers when another case holds the prisoner.

Resolution of this issue depends on the facts of your case. If your client could be released in the new case, you should consider with your client the possibility of going forward on the parole revocation prior to resolution of the new case. Obviously, tactical considerations regarding discovery and the difficulties of winning the revocation hearing prior to resolution of the criminal charges are factors to consider. You also should also consider the fact that you will likely be presenting your case without the direct testimony of your client, as it is generally disadvantageous to have clients present testimony in a pending case. This will prevent the U.S. Parole Commission from forwarding these sworn statements to the office of the U.S. Attorney so that the testimony cannot be used against your client at the criminal trial.

Where execution of the parole warrant is a desirable goal, counsel can consider asking for a halfway house release in the new case. Since that is considered a condition of release under the statute, it should serve to execute the warrant, but because pretrial credit is given for time served in a halfway house, it should also ensure pretrial credit in the new case.

Once a parole warrant is executed, the prisoner is thereafter serving the remainder of the parole term. Ali v. District of Columbia, 612 A.2d 228 (D.C. 1992); 28 C.F.R. § 2.100(d)(1) (providing that the parole term commences when parole warrant is executed). The execution of the parole warrant also makes it possible for the judge in the new case to make any new sentence concurrent with the parole term since the parole term is then being served. If the parole warrant has not been executed, however, the new sentence cannot be made to run concurrently with the parole sentence no matter what the judge in the new case orders. This is because there is no requirement that the parole warrant be executed prior to the completion of the new sentence. See Moody, 429 United States, 78; Jones v. Clemmer, 163 F.2d. 852 (D.C. Cir. 1947). In computing the sentence, prison officials will ignore the concurrent part of the order when the parole warrant has not been executed and the parole term will be tolled until completion of the new sentence.

2. Written Notice of Alleged Parole Violations

The regulation addressing the notice requirement identified in Morrissey is 28 C.F.R. § 2.99(b), which requires that the officer executing the parole warrant shall "deliver to [the parolee] a copy of the warrant application stating the charges against the parolee, the applicable procedural rights under the Commission's regulations, and the possible actions which may be taken by the Commission." The regulations further require that the examiner "review the violation charges with the parolee" during the preliminary interview. 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(c).

3. Preliminary Interviews

a. Regulations

After arrest on a parole warrant, the first interaction between the parolee and the U.S. Parole Commission is the preliminary interview or probable cause hearing. 28 C.F.R. § 2.101. The parolee receives notice of the hearing by way of the warrant application, which is served to the parolee at the time the warrant is executed. This notice requires that the preliminary interview be conducted within five days after the arrest. The purpose of the hearing is to determine whether: (1) there is probable cause to believe that the parolee violated parole; and (2) the parolee should be held in custody pending a final revocation hearing. The Public Defender Service has arranged for Parole division attorneys to be present at the preliminary interviews for representation.

The preliminary interview is conducted by a hearing examiner from the U.S. Parole Commission. See 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(a). Since the right to a fair hearing includes the right to a neutral hearing officer, the regulations provide that the officer conducting the preliminary interview cannot be the parole officer who wrote the request for a warrant. 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(a). In practice, this is not a concern because the U.S.P.C. hearing examiners do not supervise any parolees.

At the preliminary interview, the hearing officer is to first ascertain whether the warrant and warrant request were served on the parolee at the time of the arrest. 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(b). The hearing officer will recite the charges against the parolee and find out whether the parolee admits or denies the alleged violations. The parolee is then informed that he may request representation by counsel, witnesses, evidence, and of his right to request a continuance for the same. The parolee also has an opportunity to request a local revocation hearing; failure to do so will be interpreted as a waiver of a local hearing. A request for a continuance will be attributed to the parolee, and could then be used to extend the time limits set out in the regulations for the completion of final revocation hearings. 28 C.F.R. § 2.102(e). If a preliminary interview is continued for counsel or witnesses, the parolee must be given advanced notice of the time and place of the continued hearing. 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(b) and the continuance should be for no more than 30 days.

At the end of the preliminary interview, the hearing officer must: (1) make a recommendation as to whether there is probable cause that the parolee violated a parole condition; and (2) inform the parolee of the recommendation at the end of the preliminary interview. Since the preliminary interview is not recorded or transcribed, the hearing officer must prepare a "digest of the interview," entitled "D.C. Probable Cause Hearing Digest," after the preliminary interview, which is submitted to the Commission along with the recommendation. See 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(d).

If the officer decides that there is no probable cause, a Commissioner must review the opinion and effectuate the parolee's release "without delay." 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(d)(1). If the officer recommends probable cause, the Commission has 21 days to make the final probable cause decision. 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(d)(2).[6] The Commission must decide two things: 1) whether there is probable cause to support the violation; and 2) whether the parolee should be released "notwithstanding probable cause." 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(g).

b. Practice Suggestions

The parolee must make several crucial decisions at the preliminary interview. These include: admitting or denying the charges; whether to request counsel, whether to request a local revocation hearing, whether to request witnesses, if any; and whether to continue the preliminary interview for these purposes. The answers that are given to these questions will determine whether the parolee has a "local" or an "institutional" revocation hearing. This is a crucial question, as there are substantial differences between the two types of hearings.[7]
Counsel should make efforts to interview the client as soon as possible after execution of the warrant in order to prepare for the preliminary interview and make the necessary decisions. In addition to detailing the procedures set forth above, counsel should also use this initial client meeting to addresses witness requests that the client may have. Although defense counsel has no subpoena power in the parole setting, a parolee can request that the Commission subpoena other witnesses. As that request is typically made at the probable cause hearing, it is important to discuss the matter with the client in advance of that hearing.

Counsel should advise the client that the Parole Commission will be providing him with a two-part form, which must be reviewed and signed, and that must be presented to the hearing examiner at the time of the probable cause hearing. Part One of that form explains the notice of procedural rights for the preliminary interview, or probable cause hearing. Part Two of the form explains the procedural rights for the revocation hearing. In order to request a local revocation hearing, which is virtually always preferable to an institutional hearing, it must be indicated on the notice of rights form.

Counsel should make all efforts to complete the forms and make the requisite assertions for the client. For example, counsel could obtain copies of the forms and fill them out with the client before the preliminary hearing. Counsel could send a letter to the Parole Commission asserting his client's rights, and setting forth his reasons for a local hearing. At a minimum, counsel must prepare the client for the preliminary interview, and give clear instructions on what will happen and how the client can assert his rights. We recommend that the client say: I want an attorney who is local; I want witnesses who are local; I want to present other evidence which is local; and I want to mitigate any violation that is found using documents and witnesses which are local.

In an effort to provide the necessary information for parolees (and counsel) regarding the procedures of the Parole Commission, we have developed a number of forms. The objective of these forms is to secure the minimal procedures required – the right to a meaningful and counseled hearing. The forms should create a written record for the parolee at the preliminary interview. They include a signed release form and a form requesting release not withstanding probable cause. If using these, or similar forms, counsel should make all efforts to complete the forms with the client to avoid creating a written record of statements that could be used against the client. Copies of these forms can be obtained from the Parole Division of the Public Defender Service.

In some cases, counsel will need to continue the preliminary hearing. That is the only way of having any meaningful opportunity to contest or mitigate the allegations. One exception would be for warrants with allegations that, on their face, do not constitute probable cause. For example, if the client is alleged to have committed a criminal act but the facts alleged do not constitute a crime. The only other exception would be for extremely minor technical violations with a client whose adjustment is otherwise so good that he may be released pending the final hearing.[8] In those rare occasions, a prompt preliminary hearing would benefit the client by assuring his earliest possible release.

A local revocation hearing should always be requested, as it is the only opportunity to ensure a meaningful hearing. See infra Part IV.B.5. A hearing that combines the preliminary interview or probable cause hearing with the final revocation hearing may be in the client's best interest. The parolee generally has an interest in having a final decision as soon as possible. Since a combined hearing may be the most prompt resolution, counsel should consider requesting a combined hearing when continuing a case to secure witnesses. The Parole Commission is unlikely to oppose combined hearings, since it has an interest in streamlining the administrative process by taking all of the witnesses and evidence at one hearing. 28 C.F.R. § 2.101 (i) (requiring a combined hearing whenever an adverse witness is requested for a preliminary hearing).

In cases where probable cause is found at the preliminary interview and the violations are relatively minor, counsel should always submit a form to the Commission requesting release notwithstanding probable cause pursuant to 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(g). This is particularly true in cases where the parolee was doing well on parole and his or her continued confinement has caused serious disruption to his or her family structure and serves no further penological interest.

Counsel should be prepared to argue both that there is no probable cause for the violations, and that even if probable cause does exist, the parolee should be released to the hearing pending the final hearing.

4. Disclosure of Evidence by the Commission

a. The Regulations

The regulations provide for disclosure of evidence at the preliminary hearing: "the interviewing officer shall review the violation charges with the parolee and shall apprise the parolee of the evidence that has been presented to the Commission." 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(c) (emphasis added). Section 2.103(d) further provides for disclosure of evidence:

> All evidence upon which the finding of violation may be based shall be disclosed to the alleged violator before the revocation hearing. If disclosure of any > information would reveal the identity of a confidential informant or result in harm to any person, that information may be withheld from disclosure, in which case a summary of the withheld information shall be disclosed to the parolee prior to the revocation hearing. The hearing officer or examiner panel may disclose documentary evidence by permitting the alleged violator to examine the document during the hearing, or where appropriate, by reading or summarizing the document in the presence of the alleged violator.

b. Practice Suggestions

In practice, the primary evidence that will often be introduced against your client at a revocation hearing is the CSOSA file, a running record of your client's compliance and/or non-compliance while on supervision. The record is maintained by your client's CSO, and includes drug tests, a running record of office visits (often containing the CSO's own comments and observations), copies of any Alleged Violation Reports filed by the CSO during the supervisory period, and copies of any documents (e.g., pay stubs, proof of housing, etc.) given to the CSO by your client. These records are often quite detailed, and they can be invaluable in litigating technical violations, such as failures to report for testing, as well as in the dispositional phase. These records also include notes from conversations with family members, employers and other persons involved in the client's life while in the community. Unfortunately, the records are not turned over prior to a revocation hearing unless defense counsel requests them from CSOSA pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act. See also infra Part IV.B.4 and Part VII.

Effective representation requires that counsel review and/or copy the client's parole files and all of the evidence against him as early as possible. The disclosure requirements in the regulations are not adequate for those purposes. There are two problems with the disclosure provided in the proposed regulations: (1) by permitting the examiner to "summarize" some documents, 28 C.F.R. § 2.103(d) does not provide for complete disclosure of all of the evidence; and (2) disclosure appears limited to evidence that could be the basis of the violation finding, rather than the revocation and sentencing decisions (i.e., mitigating information contained in the client's parole file, such as doctors' notes, work history, etc.).

In addition to determining whether there was a violation, the Commission must make two dispositional decisions: (1) whether the parolee should be released "notwithstanding probable cause" following the preliminary interview, 28 C.F.R. § 2.101(d)(3); and (2) whether the parolee's parole should be revoked when a violation is found, § 2.105. A decision to revoke does not necessarily mean the parolee must return to or remain in prison. 28 C.F.R. § 2.105(b). When revocation is ordered, the Commission "shall also determine . . . whether immediate reparole is warranted." Id. Since these decisions are based largely upon supervision adjustment, prior criminal conduct, and similar factors, virtually everything in the parole file is relevant to these decisions.

There are strong arguments that the disclosure set forth in the regulations is inadequate disclosure under Morrissey.[9] As a practical matter, however, counsel can obtain most of the file

[9] Disclosure in the revocation context for a U.S. Code Offender is discussed in Kell v. United States Parole Comm'n, 26 F.3d 1016 (10th Cir. 1994). This case states the following with regard to parole revocation proceedings: "The materials pursuant to a request submitted to the Commission under the Freedom of Information Act ("F.O.I.A."). When disputes regarding written notice and disclosure arose with the D.C. Board of Parole, the D.C. Freedom of Information Act was used as an additional means of access to and disclosure of the parole file. Eventually, an agreement was reached where a formal request was not needed and both the parole officer's file and the Parole Board's file were made available for review and copying when authorized by a release of information from the client.

Public Defender Service attorneys have taken a similar approach with the U.S. Parole Commission. Entire parole files can be obtained on behalf of clients by submitting F.O.I.A. requests to CSOSA. If the client is supervised by the office of U.S. Parole and Probation, the request should be made through the U.S. Parole Commission. Counsel should be aware, however, that while the Commission acknowledges that it is subject to the federal F.O.I.A., it has refused to provide documents from its files in a timely manner.

F.O.I.A Requests: Counsel should demand disclosure at the preliminary interview and repeat the request in writing. Counsel should also send a F.O.I.A. request as soon as possible to obtain the information, in addition to making requests under the disclosure regulations. The federal F.O.I.A. statute requires disclosure within twenty days. Counsel can obtain a sample F.O.I.A. request through the Public Defender Service. For more on these F.O.I.A. requests, see infra Part VII.

5. Final Revocation Hearing

a. The Regulations

The proposed regulations set forth two different types of final revocation hearings – "local" and "institutional." 28 C.F.R. §§ 2.101 – 2.103. The substantive differences in local and institutional revocation hearings are significant. They are set forth at 28 C.F.R. § 2.101 (e), §2.102 (b)-(d), and §2.103. A case is generally scheduled for an institutional hearing only where the parolee or supervised releasee has admitted to the alleged violations or if he has a criminal conviction on a charge which is the basis for the violation. Otherwise, the parolee is entitled to a local revocation hearing.

At an institutional hearing, the alleged violator may present documentary evidence and witnesses, but he may not confront any adverse witnesses. The Commission will not assist the parolee in obtaining any witness for an institutional hearing. 28 C.F.R. § 2.103(b). An institutional revocation hearing must be held within 90 days from execution of the warrant. 28 C.F.R. § 2.102(e).

Counsel representing clients in the District of Columbia are most likely to do so in a local revocation hearing. At a local hearing, the parolee may present both witnesses and documentary statute and regulations governing parole revocation proceedings, in contrast [to initial parole determination proceedings], lack provisions requiring the Commission to provide advance access to all evidence that may be used against a parolee." Id. at 1022. The applicable statute, 18 U.S.C. § 4214(a)(2)(D), seems to require that the parolee be apprised of all evidence against him regarding parole revocation determinations. Based on the statute, this applies to preliminary and final hearings.

evidence. 28 C.F.R. § 2.103(b).[10] In addition, the parolee, like the Commission, may also request the presence of adverse witnesses. 28 C.F.R. § 2.103(c). The adverse witnesses who are present shall be made available for questioning and cross-examination in the presence of the alleged violator. Counsel does not have subpoena power, but can present the testimony of voluntary defense witnesses, be they fact witnesses or mitigation witnesses. Local revocation hearings must be held within 65 days of the arrest of the parolee or supervised releasee.

The other significant difference between a local and an institutional hearing is the location of the hearing. Local hearings will be held in the Central Detention Facility (D.C. Jail) or CCA/Correctional Treatment Facility, while institutional hearings may be in the District, but could also be in another jurisdiction. Since the Lorton prison complex is closed, most post-conviction offenders are being transferred to different jurisdictions. As a result, institutional hearings for D.C. Code offenders could be in any federal, state, or private prison under contract with the Bureau of Prisons or the District of Columbia Department of Corrections to house D.C. Code offenders. Thus, in practical terms, the parolee will have difficulty obtaining a lawyer who can appear in a different jurisdiction. In short, the parolee will have limited access to counsel or witnesses and a very limited ability to challenge or mitigate the allegations in an institutional hearing.

Obtaining a Local Hearing: In order to obtain a local hearing, the parolee must request one at the preliminary interview and meet the conditions set forth for obtaining one. Failure to do so will result in an institutional hearing. In order to meet the local hearing requirements, the parolee must: 1) have no new conviction; and 2) either: (a) deny all of the charged violations; or (b) deny "at least one un-adjudicated charge that may be determinative of the Commission's decision regarding revocation and/or reparole and request the presence of one or more adverse witnesses regarding that contested charge." This appears to mean that if there is a serious violation that is contested, admission on a less serious violation will not preclude a local revocation hearing. If the Parole Commission makes a decision to pursue the more serious violation which has been denied, the client is entitled to a contested local hearing. In addition, the Commission retains the ability to certify any case for a local hearing. 28 C.F.R. § 2.102.

b. Practice Suggestions

Two things are clear from the proposed regulations: 1) if a parolee plans to mount any challenge to any of the violations it must be done at a local hearing; and 2) the burden is on the parolee and counsel to make the right representations, otherwise an institutional hearing will be scheduled. Counsel should do everything possible to secure a local hearing. Suggestions for accomplishing that are set forth in the preliminary interview section.

The right to have witnesses present, adverse or favorable, however, is limited in several ways in the revocation context. With regard to any witness (at either the preliminary interview or the final revocation hearing), the regulations provide that "[a]t any hearing, the presiding hearing officer or examiner may limit or exclude any irrelevant or repetitious statement or documentary evidence." 28 C.F.R. § 2.103(b) (emphasis added). Thus, counsel should be prepared to make a record clearly explaining the relevance of each witness, and each witness's individual impact on the evidence.

With regard to the right to confront adverse witnesses, the Commission can excuse the nonattendance of adverse witnesses for "good cause." A finding of good cause "may be based on a significant possibility of harm to the witness, the witness not being reasonably available, and/or the availability of documentary evidence that is an adequate substitute for live testimony." 28 C.F.R. § 2.103(c). It appears that the good cause determination only applies to the exclusion of adverse witnesses. See John v. United States Parole Comm'n, 122 F.3d 1278 (9th Cir. 1997); Egerstaffer v. Israel, 726 F.2d 1231, 1235 (7th Cir. 1984); White v. United States Parole Comm'n, 940 F.2d 1539 (10th Cir. 1991). In John, the court held that petitioner was entitled to call adverse witnesses even after conviction on new charge, for the purposes of providing mitigating circumstances to support request for reparole. The Tenth Circuit held the opposite. See Coronado v. United States Bd. of Parole, 551 F.2d 275 (10th Cir. 1977).

The criteria for establishing good cause differ in the caselaw. Courts have required there to be a potential for harm or danger to an adverse witness to meet the good cause showing necessary to exclude an adverse witness. See Galante v. United States Parole Comm'n, 466 F.Supp. 1266, 1270, n.3 (D. Conn. 1979); Ready v. United States Parole Comm'n, 483 F.Supp. 1273 (M.D. Pa. 1980).

However, other courts have held that the reliability of a report or document sought to be introduced in lieu of live testimony has provided "good cause." See Ball v. United States Parole Comm'n, 849 F.Supp. 328, 330 (M.D. Pa. 1994). The Tenth Circuit held that the Commission need not even demonstrate "good cause" to excuse the absence of adverse witnesses if the record or report possess substantial indicia of reliability. See Egerstaffer, 726 F.2d at 1235; White v. White, 925 F.2d 287 (9th Cir. 1991).

- ✓ Do everything possible to secure a local hearing
- ✓ Be prepared to make a record clearly explaining the relevance of each witness and his or her impact on the evidence

6. Final Revocation Decision

At the revocation hearing one or two decisions are made. The first decision is whether there was a violation of parole. If there is no violation found, then parolee must be re-instated with no loss of time spent on parole ("street time"). If a violation is found, a second decision must be made: whether the parolee should be "restored," or "revoked," and, if revoked, whether the parolee should be "reparoled" or returned to prison until a future hearing date. 28 C.F.R. § 2.105. The parolee is entitled to receive a final written decision within 21 business days of the hearing.

If the Commission does not find a violation under the preponderance of the evidence standard, the parolee is not revoked, and loses no street time. When a violation is found by a preponderance of the evidence, there are three dispositional options available to the Commission at the conclusion of a parole revocation hearing. 28 C.F.R. § 2.105. Disposition decisions require the concurrence of two commissioners.

1. "Restore to parole supervision." Significantly, if restored to supervision, the parolee does not lose any of his street time. See United States Parole Comm'n v. Nobles, 693 A.2d 1084 (D.C. 1997); § 2.105(d). When the Commission restores parole, it may also reprimand, change the conditions of parole or refer to a community treatment center. These options are important when the parolee has relatively minor violations or has been on parole a long time (and loss of street time would be particularly harsh) or when defense counsel is able to secure an appropriate community-based treatment program placement.
2. "Revoke and Reparole Immediately." Parole is revoked and the Commission makes a record that a revocation has occurred. Street time is forfeited, but the parolee is released back into the community, i.e., "reparoled." 28 C.F.R. § 2.105(b). Often the D.C. Board of Parole took the position that this was a disposition that had to be justified with special mitigating information. It is recommended that a similar approach be taken with the U.S. Parole Commission. Counsel should argue that the time spent in prison (prehearing) is adequate punishment for the violation(s) and offer community resources (treatment programs, employment, good family support) as indications of a greater chance of successful parole. The criteria for warrant issuance are a good guide to what points to focus on for this argument. All parole plan information should be documented and verified prior to the hearing.

- ✓ Argue that time spent in prison during prehearing is adequate punishment
- ✓ Offer community resources as indications of a greater chance of successful parole

3. "Revoke and Return to Prison" or "Set Off." In May 2009 the Equitable Street Time Act, codified at §24-404 and §24-406 became effective. This Act provides that anyone on parole who is convicted of a crime punishable by more than one year automatically loses his or her street time. In this case a person loses all street time accumulated since the last release. Anyone convicted of a crime punishable by a maximum of one year or less will lose street time unless, considering the circumstances of the violation, the person's history and characteristics, and other factors, that forfeiture of street time is "not necessary to protect the public welfare." It also provides that anyone who intentionally refuses to respond to or follow the orders of the Parole Commission (of its agents, such as parole officers) will face the loss of their accumulated street time. A person who stops reporting generally loses the entire time during the loss of contact period.

7. Right to Administrative Appeal

Federal Code offenders have the right to appeal adverse decisions by the Commission to the National Appeals Board: "[a] prisoner or parolee may submit to the National Appeals Board a written appeal of any decision to grant . . . rescind, deny, or revoke parole." 28 C.F.R. § 2.26. This appellate right was recently extended to D.C. Code Offenders. An individual must file the appeal on a standard form within 30 days from the date of entry of the decision. The appeal must include the following: 1) an opening paragraph that summarizes the grounds for the appeal; 2) each ground for appeal must be accompanied with the reasons supporting the appellant's position; and 3) the appellant may attach exhibits, but only those exhibits that are not currently in the possession of the U.S. Parole Commission. 28 C.F.R. §2.26(a)(2).

In addition to filing an appeal with the National Appeals Board, counsel may also consider sending a letter in the nature of a request for reconsideration, setting forth any arguments or additional proffers of evidence appropriate. Counsel can also send such a letter to the Commission prior to its final decision to record the arguments and evidence presented at the revocation hearing. 28 C.F.R. § 2.75(e) provides that the Commission may reopen any case for special reconsideration upon the receipt of new and significant information concerning the prisoner.

Appealing Commission Decisions:

- ✓ File an appeal with the National Appeals Board
- ✓ Submit a request for reconsideration to the Commission prior to its final decision to record the arguments and evidence presented at the hearing

V. DIFFERENCES BETWEEN PAROLE AND SUPERVISED RELEASE

In August of 2000, the District of Columbia ended its practice of sentencing defendants to parole and began sentencing them to terms of supervised release instead. In most respects, the new system looks and operates much like the old. Nevertheless, there are key differences between the two that counsel must understand.

Under the parole system, the full-term date (on which a parole sentence expires) is originally fixed by the judge. For example, under the parole system, the sentencing judge might have given a sentence of ten to thirty years, which meant that the defendant would serve ten years in jail, and then serve the remaining twenty years on parole (though that time could be extended in the event of a revocation). In the supervised release regime, in contrast, maximum supervision terms and maximum jail terms upon revocation are fixed by federal regulation according to the offense. Each offense carries a maximum authorized term of supervised release and a maximum authorized term of imprisonment, or "back-up time," in the event of a revocation. For example, someone convicted of Distribution of Cocaine can be placed on supervised release for up to five years. Regardless of the length of that supervisory period (over which the judge still has some discretion), the total jail time that the client can serve in the event of a revocation is fixed at three years. 28 C.F.R. § 2.219.[11] In contrast to parole, then, each and every defendant convicted of the same offense faces the same back-up time while on supervised release, regardless of the sentence imposed by the trial judge.

A second major difference between the two systems relates to so-called "good time" credit. 18 U.S.C. § 3624(b) allows that any prisoner serving a term of imprisonment of more than one year is eligible to receive credit toward the service of that sentence for good behavior while incarcerated. The statute allows for a fifteen percent credit, or fifty-four days per year, toward his sentence. Accordingly, a defendant who is sentenced to thirteen months in prison can expect to be released after roughly eleven months. Importantly, this benefit does not apply to clients on parole. Because clients on parole are in effect still serving their original sentence, and they are given a release date certain upon revocation by the Commission, the good time statute is not triggered. However, clients on supervised release are eligible to receive good time each and every time they are revoked, provided that they are sentenced to a term of imprisonment of more than a year.[12]

A third major difference between the two systems is that a client on parole can refuse to be released from prison onto supervision, while a client on supervised release cannot. As a parolee's release date draws near, he has the option to sign his parole certificate (accepting the terms of his supervision) or to refuse to sign and simply serve the remainder of his sentence. A supervised releasee, however, must be released to supervision on his scheduled release date, regardless of his preference.

There are other small differences between the two systems, but these three are the major ones that counsel are likely to encounter in their practice. The following chart sets forth the differences in a more concise fashion:

	PAROLE	SUPERVISED RELEASE
Back-up Time / Maximum Authorized Prison Term at Revocation	• Determined by judge's original sentence • Same as time on supervision	• Independent of judge's original sentence; fixed by federal regulation • Distinct from length of time on supervision • Maximum of 1, 2, 3 or 5 years, depending on original offense.
Revocation Sentence	• New parole date set by	• New sentence issued [11] In the event that the release in this example is revoked and sentenced by the Commission to less than the full three years, he can be released back on to supervision for the remainder of his supervisory period, plus any applicable extension, but his remaining back-up time is now three years minus the time served on the revocation.

[12] Accordingly, counsel will note that, as in the pre-trial context, a sentence of thirteen months may well be more advantageous to a client on supervised release than a sentence of twelve months. The same is not true for a client on parole.

	USPC • Can be delayed due to poor behavior during incarceration • Re-parole can be refused by client in favor of incarceration	by USPC • Cannot be delayed; Client must be released on new release date • Re-release cannot be refused by client
"Good Time" Credit	• Does not apply	• Does apply
Supervision Period After a Revocation	• Recalculated by BOP based on time remaining on original sentence • Supervisory term is always getting shorter with ever day served	• Resentenced to new term of supervision by the USPC • New supervisory period is based on statutory maximum for original offense • Can become longer than judge's original sentence

VI. CHALLENGES

a. Judicial Review of Parole Decisions

Challenges to revocation hearings are most commonly raised through either a petition for a writ of habeas corpus or mandamus. A sample petition for writ of habeas corpus can be obtained through the Parole Division of the Public Defender Service. Successful challenges to parole decisions are based on the failure to follow constitutional, statutory, or regulatory requirements. In White v. White, 925 F.2d 287 (9th Cir. 1991), the petitioner successfully challenged the Parole Commission's denial of the due process right to confront adverse witnesses at a revocation hearing. Id. at 292. The court in White ruled that admission of some violations did not constitute a waiver of the right to confront and cross-examine adverse witnesses with regard to other violations which were not admitted. Id. at 291. The D.C. Court of Appeals found that the D.C. Board of Parole and its Trustee abused its discretion and acted outside of limits created by the regulations of that agency in issuing parole violation warrants without first making written findings and exercising discretion as required by 28 D.C.M.R. § 217. See Teachey v. Carver, 736 A.2d 998 (D.C. 1999). The U.S. Parole Commission was also successfully challenged when it executed a parole violator warrant by retaking a parolee into custody under warrant and then refusing to have a revocation hearing because the parolee was serving another sentence. The court ruled the Commission must abide by procedural requirements for parole revocation under the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act and cannot avoid those requirements by withdrawing an executed warrant and lodging it as a detainer. Thompson v. Crabtree, 82 F.3d 312 (9th Cir. 1996).

The courts have repeatedly intervened in cases where there is a delay in holding the revocation hearing. Johnson v. Holley, 528 F. 2.d 116 (7th Cir. 1975); Creech v. United States Bd. of Parole, 538 F.2d 205 (8th Cir. 1976). This is particularly true when the delay is prejudicial.

Goodman v. Keohane, 663 F.2d 1044, (11th Cir. 1981). Courts have also intervened where the U.S. Parole Commission issued a parole violator warrant and improperly held the warrant in abeyance pending the outcome of the new case. Cronn v. Burkhart, 830 F. Supp. 946 (N.D. Tex. 1993). See also Long v. Gaines, 173 F. Supp. 2d 35 (D.D.C. 2001).

However, courts are generally hesitant to interfere with the decisions of parole-granting bodies and, as a result, review only for denials of constitutional rights or acts outside statutory or regulatory authority or abuses of discretion. Courts will not review on the merits of whether or not parole should be revoked or granted. See Bennett v. Ridley, 633 A.2d 824, 826 (D.C. 1993); White v. White, 925 F.2d 287, 289-90 (9th Cir. 1991). In fact, the D.C. Circuit has recognized that the Commission's decision of whether or not to revoke or grant parole is "almost unreviewable." Shelton v. United States Parole Comm'n, 388 F.2d 567, 576 (D.C. Cir. 1967) (citing Hyser v. Reed, 318 F.2d at 240, but adding the emphasis). Parole Commission decisions to grant or revoke parole will be reversed only if they are arbitrary, capricious, or constitute an abuse of discretion.

In contrast to review of factual findings, however, the issue of whether the Commission's action lies within the permissible scope of its authority is a question of law to be reviewed de novo. Turner v. United States Parole Comm'n, 934 F.2d 254 (10th Cir. 1991). In Wells v. Golden, 785 A.2d 641 (D.C. 2001), the court remanded for further proceedings on appellant's petition for a writ of habeas corpus. It held that the Parole Board's discretion in setting a parole reconsideration ("set-off") date is not unlimited; it is constrained by the Youth Rehabilitation Act and the statute's twin goals of treatment and rehabilitation. The Board cannot impose a 10-year set-off for one sentenced under the Act, against the recommendation of the youth correction officials, simply because the Board believes 10 years of punishment fits the crime, as it appears to have done here. On remand, the set-off date must be reconsidered if the government is unable to provide evidence that the Board's decision took into account the YRA's rehabilitative goal.

VII. ACCESSING INFORMATION FROM THE U.S. PAROLE COMMISSION AND CSOSA IN PREPARATION FOR PAROLE REVOCATION HEARINGS

In order to determine which community supervision officer is assigned to your client, you should contact the intake unit at CSOSA at (202) 585-7430. Provide your client's D.C.D.C. identification number and you will be informed which officer has been assigned to your client. Although all community supervision officers are located in the D.C. area, they are no longer housed in one central office; they are assigned to various offices throughout the community.

Counsel must submit a written F.O.I.A. request pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552 to CSOSA to obtain access to client file materials. The request should be sent to CSOSA, F.O.I.A. Specialist, 633 Indiana Ave., NW, 12th Floor, Washington, D.C. 20004. If your client is supervised by the U.S. Parole and Probation Office, the F.O.I.A. request should be made through the U.S. Parole Commission.

In order to obtain information from the USPC file beyond the mandatory disclosure items addressed earlier, you will also need to submit a written F.O.I.A. request to the Commission. You should specify what documents you are seeking in your request. The request should be addressed to the attention of the Commission's F.O.I.A. Officer and mailed to: United States Parole Commission, Suite 420, 5550 Friendship Blvd., Chevy Chase, MD 20815. If you want to check on the status of your F.O.I.A. request, call the Commission and ask to speak with a F.O.I.A. Specialist at (301) 492-5990. Note that you will not be permitted to review the file in person.

Making F.O.I.A Request: The F.O.I.A. statute, 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3), requires that a request for records reasonably describe the records requested. In preparation for a parole revocation hearing, you should always make a general request for "all documents maintained in the parole file and the evidence on which such information is based." Specifically, you should request copies of the warrant, warrant application and any supplemental warrant information, action sheet, chronological resume of parole actions, parole determination record, status report, notification of re-arrest, pre-sentence investigation, progress reports, mental health evaluations, preliminary interview and revocation hearing form, summary of preliminary interview/digest and probable cause determination. You should also request from the CSOSA office copies of the community supervision officer's field notes (you may want to specify a range of time if client was on parole for a long time).

Pursuant to the F.O.I.A., the Commission must make a determination within 10 days as to whether it will comply with the request, and the Commission must provide notification of its decision to the person making the request. Note that the Commission is usually behind schedule in responding to F.O.I.A. requests and you may receive a letter stating this and informing you that you will receive the documents at a later date. If you do not receive a response to your F.O.I.A. request, you should file a F.O.I.A. appeal, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(6)(ii). This provision allows the agency to make a determination with respect to any appeal within twenty days after receipt of such appeal.

In order to obtain information from the Parole Commission regarding the status of a client's case, you should speak with the analyst who is assigned to your case. Every D.C. Code offender is assigned to a specific Commission analyst. The analyst is responsible for maintaining client files, gathering case information and forwarding this information to the Commission's hearing examiners. It is difficult to reach the analysts by telephone, but the general Commission phone number is (301) 492-5990. In order to learn of the status of your client, you should send a facsimile request to your specific analyst at (301) 492-5525.

FOIA Requests:

- ✓ Make a general FOIA request in preparation for hearing
- ✓ File a FOIA appeal if you do not receive an adequate response to your request

VIII. APPLYING D.C. LAW OVER FEDERAL LAW

As noted at the outset of this chapter, the Revitalization Act abolished the local D.C. Board of Parole in August of 2000, and transferred its authority to its federal counterpart, the U.S. Parole Commission. Recognizing that this federal agency might take a different approach to parole regulation than its locally-based predecessor, Congress made clear that the Parole Commission must use its new powers within the precepts of D.C. parole law and regulations, which remain intact: "The Parole Commission shall exercise the authority vested in it by this section pursuant to the parole laws and regulations of the District of Columbia." D.C. Code § 24-131(c) (emphasis added).

The distinction is not a hollow one. In addition to the myriad procedural differences explained throughout this chapter, it is also clear that the two systems are rooted in fundamentally different guiding philosophies. In Cosgrove v. Thornburgh, 703 F. Supp. 995, 1003 (D.D.C. 1988), the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia found "significant disparities" between the two approaches. Id. Whereas the District's parole law follows a rehabilitative model, the federal system is primarily concerned with punishment and community safety.[13] These differences are reflected in both the parole grant and revocation processes, and counsel are strongly urged to remind the Commission of this distinction, and its obligation, whenever appropriate.

The Commission explicitly stated its obligation and intention to adhere to D.C. law in drafting the proposed regulations in its prefatory comments to its interim and proposed regulations:

> Under section 11231 of the [Revitalization Act], the U.S. Parole Commission will be given, effective August 5, 2000, the authority presently exercised by the Board of Parole of the District of Columbia. . . . In all respects, the proposed rules have been drafted to conform to District of Columbia law regarding the parole revocation process. See D.C. Code §§ 24-205 and 24-206.

65 Fed. Reg. 20006 (April 13, 2000) (emphasis added).

Although the Commission has professed agreement with this general principle, the proposed regulations do not, in fact, precisely mirror the former District of Columbia rules and regulations governing parole determinations. For this reason, it is of critical importance that counsel be familiar with not only the Commission's most current regulations, but also with the D.C. statutes, cases, and regulations governing revocation before the former D.C. Board. The relevant statutes can be found at D.C. Code §§ 24-401.1-409 and the relevant municipal regulations may be found at 28 DCMR Chapters 1 and 2.[14] Efforts have been made throughout this chapter to call attention to areas where the bodies of law differ substantively, but it is strongly recommended that counsel review both sets of rules with an eye towards preserving a record for possible appeal.

[13] The court went on to find that while the U.S. Parole Commission had been granted substantial authority over D.C. Code offenders, it was not free to disregard District of Columbia regulations and guidelines governing parole, which it found to have "the force and effect of law." Id. at 1003.

[14] Counsel should also review the statutes and regulations governing parole for Federal Code offenders which are set forth at 18 U.S.C.A. § 4201, et seq. and 28 C.F.R. Part 2, Subpart A.

CHAPTER 13

ANTICIPATING AND USING THE APPELLATE PROCESS

Introduction

This chapter has two objectives. First, it offers counsel who primarily practices as criminal defense lawyers in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia a basic understanding of appellate practice and, specifically, practice before the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. The initial portion of the chapter rests on the premise that trial counsel cannot fully protect their client's interests without appreciating the ways appellate law may affect the clients. If defendants always prevailed in the trial court, appellate substantive and procedural law would not interest their attorneys. In reality, a client's fate often depends on the appellate court. In turn, the appellate outcome often depends on how the trial attorney prepared for appellate review. Therefore, trial attorneys must understand both how to protect their client's interests in the appellate court and how to use the appellate court to advance their objectives in the trial court.

Second, this chapter provides an introduction to appellate practice for attorneys actually handling either appeals in criminal and delinquency cases (at the end of the case following sentencing or disposition) or interlocutory appeals, i.e., appeals during the course of trial proceedings. Counsel handling criminal and delinquency appeals must be thoroughly familiar with the Rules of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. The Clerk's Office of the Court of Appeals provides numerous helpful guides to appellate practice. Counsel is also invited to contact the PDS Appellate Division for assistance.

I. PREPARING FOR APPEALS

Appellate judges ask three questions about cases that attorneys generally do not hear in the trial court:

1) "Do we have jurisdiction to hear this case?" Trial counsel do not encounter this question because their clients have been hauled into court for offenses allegedly committed in the District of Columbia; thus, defense counsel are rarely trying to convince a trial court that it should hear a case. Their clients typically would be satisfied if the court concluded it lacked jurisdiction. On appeal, however, the attorney must persuade the court to hear the case if the client has not prevailed in the trial court. Thus, counsel must know how to answer this question in its efforts to convince the appellate court that it has jurisdiction over the appeal.

2) A second question from appellate judges is, "What is our standard of review?" As discussed below, this bewildering question sometimes means, "In deciding whether the trial court's ruling is wrong, how much deference should we give to the ruling of the trial judge?" Sometimes this question also means, "How much prejudice from the alleged error is necessary before we reverse the trial judge?" The answers to these questions often determine the outcome of appeals. And, in turn, the answers to these questions often depend on the actions taken by trial lawyers. Skilled trial lawyers always have an eye on appellate standards of review and strive to make a trial record that presents favorable standards of review if the client should not win in the trial court. Trial counsel's failure to appreciate standards of review may doom the client on appeal and may well constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. On the other hand, a well-made record may facilitate reversal on appeal. Thus, trial counsel must understand appellate standards of review and know how to make an effective record for appeal.

3) The third question from an appellate judge is often, "Counsel, is this information in the record?" Again, this question seems odd to a trial practitioner. Trial judges do not willfully blind themselves to information because it is not "in the record." They may reject information under evidentiary or procedural rules, but they do not ask whether information is already "in the record." The "appellate record" is a legal concept that derives from the relationship between appellate and trial courts. Because appellate courts are principally focused on reviewing the actions of trial courts, they limit their inquiry to events they are confident occurred in the "lower" court. Events matter to the appellate court only if they have found their way into the record. Thus, counsel must know what constitutes an appellate record.

These three questions are addressed immediately below.

A. Jurisdiction and Appealability

Like all other litigants, a criminal defendant may appeal a ruling or decision rendered in the trial court only if the appellate court has jurisdiction to consider the appeal. "Jurisdiction" in this context means "authority" or "legal power." Jurisdiction is determined by statute. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals has jurisdiction to hear appeals from "all final orders and judgments of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia." D.C. Code § 11-721(a)(1). In addition, "a party aggrieved by" a final order or judgment entered in Superior Court "may appeal therefrom as of right to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals." D.C. Code § 11-721(b). In criminal cases, the final judgment is the judgment of conviction, entered at the time of sentencing. West v. United States, 346 A.2d 504 (D.C. 1975). In delinquency cases, the final judgment is the disposition. See In re E.G.C., 373 A.2d 903 (D.C. 1977). Therefore, defendants in criminal cases and respondents in juvenile cases have an absolute right to appeal after sentencing or disposition.[1] On the other hand, absent an exception to this rule, appellate courts do not have jurisdiction in criminal and delinquency cases until entry of the final judgment. Therefore, unless the defendant can invoke an exception to the "final order or judgment" rule, the defendant cannot appeal a trial court ruling until the end of the case. However, the notice of appeal after judgment gives the appellate court an opportunity to review all decisions by the trial court that preceded the filing of the notice of appeal.

Final Orders: In general, an order is final within the meaning of D.C. Code § 11-721, and therefore subject to appeal, only when it "disposes of the whole case on its merits so that the court has nothing remaining to do but to execute the judgment or decree already rendered." In re Estate of Chuong, 623 A.2d 1154, 1157 (D.C. 1993) (en banc) (internal quotation and citation omitted). Criminal sentencings and juvenile dispositions comfortably fit this definition. Most trial court rulings before sentencing or disposition do not fit this standard because they do not dispose of the entire case. However, many orders entered after sentence do satisfy this definition because the "case" no longer means resolution of guilt or innocence and because no further court action is anticipated. For instance, an order revoking or adversely modifying the terms of probation is a final order. Barnes v. United States, 513 A.2d 249 (D.C. 1986). An order denying discharge and expungement under D.C. Code § 48-904.01(e) and entering an adjudication of guilt is an appealable order. Neal v. United States, 571 A.2d 222, 225 (D.C. 1990). The denial of a motion for a new trial is a final order. In re E.G.C., 373 A.2d at 905.

[1] There is an exception for minor criminal cases. Appeal from minor criminal judgments "where the penalty imposed is a fine of less than $50 for an offense punishable by imprisonment of one year or less, or by fine of not more than $1,000 or both" requires an application for allowance of an appeal. D.C. Code § 11-721(c).

Collateral Order Doctrine: Some orders entered during a criminal case, but before the entry of judgment at sentencing, are considered final for appeal purposes under the "collateral order doctrine." Pursuant to the rule of Cohen v. Beneficial Industrial Loan Corp., 337 U.S. 541 (1949), a collateral order is deemed sufficiently final and therefore appealable if it meets three conditions:

> First, it must conclusively determine the disputed question; second, it must resolve an important issue completely separate from the merits of the action; third, it must be effectively unreviewable on appeal from a final judgment.

In re Estate of Chuong, 623 A.2d at 1157 (quotation marks and citations omitted). "[I]nterlocutory orders are appealable if they have a final and irreparable effect on important rights of the parties." Meyers v. United States, 730 A.2d 155, 157 (D.C. 1999).

Examples of "Final" Collateral Orders: Rulings denying pretrial liberty are the quintessential example of "final" collateral orders in criminal cases: an order of confinement conclusively determines whether the person should be at liberty; pretrial liberty is certainly important and decided by factors other than guilt or innocence; and wrongfully imposed pretrial confinement cannot be corrected by a post-trial appeal or in a case where the defendant wins an acquittal. See Stack v. Boyle, 342 U.S. 1 (1951). Motions to dismiss charges on double jeopardy grounds are also appealable pretrial, in accordance with Abney v. United States, 431 U.S. 651 (1977). This is because the Double Jeopardy Clause protects against a second prosecution for the same offense, an important interest that is fully resolved by an order denying the motion to dismiss, an interest that is different from the question of guilt or innocence, and an interest that could not be fully protected by a post-verdict appeal. At the request of either party, the Court of Appeals will expedite pretrial double jeopardy appeals. See Kelly v. United States, 639 A.2d 86, 87 (D.C. 1994). A trial court's orders issued during a neglect proceeding prohibiting communication with the respondent's criminal lawyer and barring that lawyer from the courtroom met the requirements of the collateral order doctrine and were immediately appealable. In re Ti. B., 762 A.2d 20 (D.C. 2000). Similarly, an uncharged person may appeal a pre-arrest, court-ordered lineup. Wise v. Murphy, 275 A.2d 205 (D.C. 1971) (en banc). And while orders compelling discovery are not final and therefore not traditionally appealable unless the party suffers contempt, under the Perlman doctrine, a discovery order directed at a disinterested third party is treated as a final order and is immediately appealable. See Walter E. Lynch & Co. v. Fuisz, 862 A.2d 929 (D.C. 2004) (citing Perlman v. United States, 247 U.S. 7 (1918)).

On the other hand, the Supreme Court has emphasized that for reasons of judicial efficiency, interlocutory appeals in criminal cases are strongly disfavored. Accordingly, it has "interpreted the collateral order exception 'with the utmost strictness' in criminal cases." Midland Asphalt Corp. v. United States, 489 U.S. 794, 799 (1989) (quoting Flanagan v. United States, 465 U.S. 259, 265 (1984) (disqualification of law firm from representing more than one co-defendant)). For examples of interlocutory orders that have been deemed nonappealable, see, e.g., Horton v. United States, 591 A.2d 1280 (D.C. 1991) (granting government motion for inpatient productivity examination when defense has indicated it will interpose insanity defense); Gant v. United States, 467 A.2d 968 (D.C. 1983) (denial of motion to dismiss for prosecutorial vindictiveness); United States v. Harrod, 428 A.2d 30 (D.C. 1981) (en banc) (order requiring witness to undergo psychiatric examination).

In many instances, the "final orders and judgments" rule is easier to state than to apply. Though trial counsel may fairly assume that most interlocutory orders are not appealable, counsel must be vigilant for orders that cannot sit unchallenged until sentencing or disposition. In making an argument that an interlocutory order fits within the collateral order doctrine, counsel may rely on cases construing 28 U.S.C. § 1291 – the statute regulating the authority of federal appellate courts – because the federal statute is similar to D.C. Code § 11-721.

In addition to § 11-721, three statutes provide the District of Columbia Court of Appeals jurisdiction to hear appeals brought by defendants or respondents challenging trial court orders entered before sentencing or disposition. D.C. Code § 23-1324 authorizes appeals from pretrial detention orders. D.C. Code § 16-2328 allows appeals from orders detaining juveniles before trial or orders transferring juveniles to adult court for prosecution. The procedures for taking appeals pursuant to these provisions are discussed later in this chapter. Finally, D.C. Code § 23-704(e) allows appeal from orders of extradition.

Another statute gives the Court of Appeals jurisdiction over interlocutory appeals brought by the government. The government may appeal rulings before or during criminal or delinquency trials in three situations and any such appeal must be expedited. D.C. Code § 23-104. First, it may appeal an order dismissing an indictment or information as to one or more counts if the ruling did not amount to an acquittal on the merits. Id. § 23-104(c); see, e.g., United States v. Rothmeier, 570 A.2d 811 (D.C. 1990). Second, it may appeal an order suppressing or otherwise denying the use of evidence on the ground that it was invalidly obtained, but must certify that the appeal is not undertaken for delay and that the evidence constitutes "substantial proof of the charge." D.C. Code § 23-104(a)(1), (b); see United States v. Williams, 697 A.2d 1244, 1247-48 (D.C. 1997); In re J.W., 763 A.2d 1129 (D.C. 2000); In re I.J., 906 A. 2d 249 (D.C. 2006) (finding substantial compliance and noting that certification requirement is not jurisdictional). Third, with leave of the trial court, the government may appeal during trial a ruling that involves a "substantial and recurring question of law which requires appellate resolution." If a government appeal is taken during trial, the trial must be adjourned for at least ninety-six hours for the appellate court to act; if there is no decision within that period, the trial court will resume trial on the next business day and deem the appeal void. D.C. Code § 23-104(b), (d).

Writ of Mandamus: In exceptional circumstances, criminal defendants can invoke the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals by petitioning for a writ of mandamus. Mandamus is reserved for those rare but important instances where trial judges exceed their lawful powers: when they issue critical rulings yet cannot identify a statute or rule that gives them authority to issue those rulings. Unlike appeals, a petition for a writ of mandamus does not invoke the Court of Appeals' appellate jurisdiction. A petition for a writ of mandamus is considered an original action in the appellate court. Thus, D.C. Code § 11-721 is not the basis of appellate jurisdiction. Rather, the Court of Appeals' authority to issue writs of mandamus derives from the "All Writs Act," 28 U.S.C. § 1651, which authorizes "all courts established by Act of Congress [to] issue all writs necessary or appropriate in aid of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the usages and principles of law."

The function of mandamus jurisdiction is to "confine [the trial] court to a lawful exercise of its prescribed jurisdiction or to compel it to exercise its authority when it is its duty to do so." Anderson v. Sorrell, 481 A.2d 766, 771 (D.C. 1984) (citation omitted). To obtain the writ of mandamus, the petitioner "must show that [the] right [asserted] is 'clear and indisputable,' and that [petitioner] 'has no other adequate means to obtain relief.'" Banov v. Kennedy, 694 A.2d 850, 857 (D.C. 1997); see Kerr v. United States, 426 U.S. 394, 403 (1976). "Abuse of discretion sufficient for reversal in an appeal is not enough to warrant mandamus; for mandamus to issue, a decision must qualify as 'usurpation of judicial power.'" Banov, 694 A.2d at 858. Generally, mandamus jurisdiction lies where review by direct appeal would be useless because the damage to the petitioner would already have been accomplished and could not be effectively remedied. See, e.g., Anderson v. Sorrell, 481 A.2d at 771 (trial court ordered "productivity" examinations of defendant before determining whether defendant intelligently and voluntarily waived insanity defense); Bowman v. United States, 412 A.2d 10 (D.C. 1980) (trial court ordered defendant to disclose nature of defense or be barred from presenting any affirmative defense except through own testimony). But see Horton, 591 A.2d 1280 (declining to invoke mandamus authority to review order requiring defendant, who intended to interpose insanity defense, to submit to inpatient productivity examination). See generally D.C. App. R. 21; Yeager v. Greene, 502 A.2d 980 (D.C. 1985); Helstocki v. Meanor, 442 U.S. 500 (1979); Ex parte Rowland, 104 U.S. 604 (1881).

B. Standards of Review

After an appellate court determines it has jurisdiction over a case, it asks two questions: (1) did the trial court commit error? and (2) if the trial court erred, what remedy is appropriate? The court analyzes each question by applying what are called "standards of review."

1. Did the Trial Court Commit Error: How Much Deference is Owed the Trial Court's Determination?

The question "Did the trial court err?" implicitly assumes that the trial court's action was either right or wrong. This assumption is problematic. On the one hand, some determinations made by a trial judge are either correct or incorrect as a matter of law. For example, a determination that a defendant does not have a constitutional right to cross-examine adverse witnesses for bias is wrong as a matter of law. On the other hand, a determination that the defendant needs a continuance of two weeks, rather than three weeks as requested by defense counsel, cannot easily be said to be right or wrong. This decision is a matter of judgment and judgments are not usually characterized as right or wrong. Consider also a trial judge's decision, after listening to testimony, to believe a certain witness. How would an appellate court decide whether the judge's credibility determination is right or wrong?

Therefore, the question "Did the trial court err?" requires the appellate court to determine the extent to which the trial court decision under review fits within a category of decisions that can be characterized as either right or wrong. Trial court decisions are typically thought to fall into three categories: (1) issues of law; (2) issues of trial court discretion; and (3) issues of fact. Each category lends itself to a "right/wrong" determination in a different way. Roughly put, legal decisions are either right or wrong; discretionary calls are legally acceptable so long as they reflect a reasonable judgment based on a correct understanding of the applicable law and facts; and factual determinations are acceptable so long as there is supporting evidence that a reasonable judge could have decided to credit. Thus, the first question an appellate court asks is whether the alleged error is an error of law, discretion, or fact, as this categorization helps the appellate court understand what it means to say that the lower court erred.

Dividing rulings into these categories is often straightforward. For example, whether an accused has a right to refuse to speak during custodial interrogation is a pure question of law. The same ruling must apply in all trials. Whether the trial judge should give defense counsel 15 or 20 minutes to read Jencks material is a matter of discretion. Different trial judges may appropriately reach different conclusions on comparable facts because "[d]iscretion signifies choice" and "the decision-maker exercising discretion has the ability to choose from a range of permissible conclusions." Johnson v. United States, 398 A.2d 354, 361 (D.C. 1979). Whether the witness at a suppression hearing is believable is a question of fact. "An issue is designated a question of fact if it involves the who, what, where, when and how details of the case; the case specific "historical," "basic," "primary," "discrete," "subsidiary" or "operative" facts." Davis v. United States, 564 A.2d 31, 35 (D.C. 1989) (en banc) (citation omitted).

However, categorizing trial court rulings can be difficult. "[T]he proper characterization of a question as one of fact or law is sometimes slippery." Thompson v. Keohane, 516 U.S. 99, 110-111 (1995). For example, is the determination that an accused gave a statement "voluntarily" a determination of fact or law? Is the trial judge making a decision about a matter of historical fact – i.e., this defendant's "will" was not overborne by the police interrogation? Or is the notion of a "will" capable of being overborne rather fictional, and, if so, isn't the question of voluntariness really a legal question of what tactics are acceptable in certain circumstances?

Functional Analysis: Such concerns have led the courts to acknowledge that the border between "fact" and "law" is sometimes fuzzy and should be drawn, on occasion, by conducting a "functional" analysis. This functional analysis is an assessment of the institutional competence of trial and appellate courts. If the issue is the type that a trial judge is better situated to determine – for example, whether a witness is credible – then it is more likely to be categorized as a question of fact. If the issue is the type that for reasons of uniformity in the law an appellate court is better situated to determine – for example, whether a statute provides certain rights – then it is more likely to be categorized as a question of law. Thompson v. Keohane, 516 U.S. 99 (engaging in functional analysis to determine that custody, for Miranda purposes, is a question of law); Miller v. Fenton, 474 U.S. 104 (1985) (using functional analysis to explain why voluntariness of confession is question of law entitled to non-deferential de novo review); Davis, 564 A.2d 31 (explaining functional distinction between review of law and fact); see In re J.M., 619 A.2d 497 (D.C. 1992) (en banc) (voluntariness of consent under Fourth Amendment is question of fact entitled to highly deferential review).

This functional analysis also helps appellate courts decide whether certain issues should be characterized as matters of trial court discretion. If an appellate court believes that the administration of justice will be advanced by giving trial judges latitude in making certain decisions without fear that those decisions will be second-guessed by appellate judges, then those decisions are likely to be categorized as "discretionary." Johnson v. United States, 398 A.2d 354.

After an appellate court categorizes the issue being reviewed on appeal as legal, factual or discretionary, it can apply an appropriate standard of review. This standard is the product of the two lines of inquiry already discussed: (1) the extent to which the trial court's decision can be characterized as right or wrong; and (2) the extent to which the trial court is better equipped than the appellate court to decide the issue being challenged. These two lines of inquiry coalesce in standards of review which give greater or lesser deference to the trial court's decision depending on whether this decision involves a matter of fact, law or discretion.

(a) A factual finding – for example, "this witness is not credible when she says the police barged into her house without asking for consent" – receives enormous deference. By statute, D.C. Code § 17-305(a), a factual ruling may not be reversed unless it "is plainly wrong or without evidence to support it." Put another way, appellate courts will reverse factual determinations only if they are "clearly erroneous." Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564 (1985) (construing Fed. R. Civ. P. 52(a)). A factual finding "is 'clearly erroneous' when although there is evidence to support it, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." Id. at 573 (quoting United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 333 U.S. 364, 395 (1948)). An appellate court will not reverse a factual finding if the lower court's "account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety" even though the appellate court is "convinced that had it been sitting as the trier of fact, it would have weighed the evidence differently. Where there are two permissible views of the evidence, the factfinder's choice between them cannot be clearly erroneous." Id. at 574.

Although this standard insulates virtually all credibility determinations from reversal:

> This is not to suggest that the trial judge may insulate his findings from review by denominating them credibility determinations, for factors other than demeanor and inflection go into the decision whether or not to believe a witness. Documents or objective evidence may contradict the witness' story; or the story itself may be so internally inconsistent or implausible on its face that a reasonable factfinder would not credit it. Where such factors are present, the court of appeals may well find clear error even in a finding purportedly based on a credibility determination.

Id. at 575; see Tursio v. United States, 634 A.2d 1205 (D.C. 1993) (reversing trial court's credibility finding that prosecutor did not intentionally discriminate in exercising peremptory challenges).

The rationale for the statutory-based deference to trial court factual findings is based in part on the superior position of trial judges – who see and hear witnesses – to determine credibility. However, as the Supreme Court has explained, the rationale extends to matters of fact beyond assessments of credibility because "[t]he trial judge's major role is the determination of fact, and with experience in fulfilling that role comes expertise. Duplication of the trial judge's efforts in the court of appeals would very likely contribute only negligibly to the accuracy of fact determination at a huge cost in diversion of judicial resources." Anderson, 470 U.S. at 574-75.

This same rationale also helps explain another way factual findings are vulnerable to reversal on appeal. "Findings of fact which result from a misapprehension as to the applicable law . . . lose the insulation of the 'clearly erroneous' rule." In re Application of L.L., 653 A.2d 873, 880 (D.C. 1995) (citation omitted).

These principles play out in the following way in the context of a hypothetical factual finding about the color of a traffic light. If one witness testifies that the light was green, and another testifies that the light was red, the judge cannot be clearly erroneous in crediting the first witness and finding as a fact that the light was green. If all the witnesses testify that the light was red, and there is no circumstantial evidence on the question whether the light was green or red, there would not be support in the record for the judge to conclude that the light was green. If the judge credits a witness who says the light was green over a witness who says the light was red, because the judge believes that witnesses who say "red" have a "heavy burden of persuasion," but there is no such principle of law, then the judge is clearly erroneous and laboring under a misapprehension of law. If a judge finds that the light was green, but the appellate court is firmly convinced that the light was red, then it will reverse the trial judge's finding as clearly erroneous.

(b) When a trial judge decides a legal question, he or she is making a determination that receives no deference, because he or she was either right or wrong and because the appellate court believes it has expertise on matters of law. An appellate court accords "de novo" or "plenary" review to a trial court's determination of a legal issue and gives no weight to the trial court's finding. Davis, 564 A.2d at 35.

(c) When a trial judge makes a discretionary judgment, for example, "the defendant is entitled to a continuance of 5 days not 7 days," or "this evidence is more probative than prejudicial," the trial judge is making a determination that receives great deference. Appellate courts show deference in this situation because a discretionary decision is a matter of judgment, and because trial judges must have latitude to run their courts without fear that all of their judgments will be second-guessed. A matter of judgment is not either right or wrong. The trial court is entitled to reach a different decision than the appellate judges think they would reach (if they were trial judges), so long as the trial judge's conclusion is not too extreme and shows a correct understanding of the applicable law and facts. Therefore, trial court discretionary rulings are reviewed under the highly deferential "abuse of discretion" standard. This standard affords the trial judge a limited "right to be wrong." Johnson, 398 A.2d at 361-367.

Review for abuse of discretion has 3 components:

(1) Was the determination committed by law to the trial court's discretion?

(2) Did the trial court recognize this discretion and, if so, did the trial court purport to exercise discretion?

» Failure to exercise choice in a situation calling for choice is abuse of discretion.

» Adhering to uniform policy in a situation calling for case-specific balancing is abuse of discretion.

(3) Did the trial court exercise its discretion erroneously?

» An informed choice among alternatives requires that the trial court's determination be based upon a firm factual foundation; therefore, does the record reveal sufficient facts upon which the trial court's determination was based?

» Did the judge understand and correctly apply the governing law or did the judge rely on an improper factor?

Id.; In re J.D.C., 594 A.2d 70 (D.C. 1991) (abuse of discretion in order permitting media into juvenile trial, when judge misapplied governing legal principles); see Cooter & Gell v. Hartmarx Corp., 496 U.S. 384, 402 (1990).

So long as an appellate court believes that a discretionary ruling is based on the judge's balancing of legally relevant factors, the appellate court will defer to the trial court's determination. For this reason, a claim of abuse of discretion stands a better chance of success if framed in terms of misunderstanding or misapplication of principles of law or misapprehension of the relevant facts. If, for instance, the trial judge weighed probative value against prejudicial impact in deciding to exclude defense evidence, the appellant will fare better by claiming that the court's failure was not in giving more weight to one side of the scale than the other, but in misunderstanding the meaning of prejudice and therefore putting considerations on the prejudice side of the scale that legally did not belong there.

2. What Remedy is Appropriate: How Much Prejudice is Needed for Reversal?

Once it has concluded that a trial court committed error, the appellate court turns to the issue of an appropriate remedy. Appellate courts insist that trial judges be given a fair opportunity to correct their own errors and therefore require litigants to raise their objections in the trial court. They enforce this requirement by penalizing litigants who raise issues for the first time on appeal. In deciding on an appropriate remedy for trial court error, appellate courts look first to whether the error was "preserved," i.e., whether the issue being raised on appeal was previously raised in the trial court.

Appellate courts are also sensitive to the concern that trials cannot be perfect, in the sense of being free of all error. Therefore, the pertinent inquiry is whether the trial was free of error that might have affected the result.

These two interests – enforcement of the defendant's obligation to preserve errors in the trial court and protection of the defendant against prejudicial (but not harmless) error – lead to the following standards of review with respect to the appropriate remedy for trial court error:

(a) When the error being challenged in the appellate court was brought to the attention of the trial court (that is, when the error was "preserved" because the trial court was given an opportunity to consider the party's position in deciding what ruling to make), then the appellate court will use the "Kotteakos standard" to decide whether the trial court's error should produce a reversal of the judgment. This awkwardly phrased standard, also known as the "harmless error rule," attempts to measure the impact of a trial court ruling on the jury's decision-making process.

> [I]f one cannot say, with fair assurance, after pondering all that happened without stripping the erroneous action from the whole, that the judgment was not substantially swayed by the error, it is impossible to conclude that substantial rights were not affected. The inquiry cannot be merely whether there was enough to support the result, apart from the phase affected by the error. It is rather, even so, whether the error itself had substantial influence. If so, or if one is left in grave doubt, the conviction cannot stand.

Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 765 (1946); see Super. Ct. Crim. R.52(a) (requiring that appellate courts consider only errors affecting substantial rights).

If a court finds the record is in equipoise on the question of whether preserved error was harmful (or harmless), then the court must resolve this doubt in favor of the defendant. This is the same as saying that the government bears the burden of persuasion because it is the beneficiary of the trial court's error. See United States v. Olano, 507 U.S. 725, 734 (1993). The Supreme Court believes it is "conceptually clearer" to ask instead whether the record eliminates the appellate court's doubt about whether the error substantially influenced the jury's decision. O'Neal v. McAninch, 513 U.S. 432, 436-37 (1995).

(b) When the claim on appeal involves preserved constitutional trial error, a burden is placed on the government (which benefited at trial from the error) to prove the error harmless beyond a reasonable doubt – the Chapman standard. Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 24 (1967). By its terms, and in application, this stricter standard makes reversal far more likely than under the Kotteakos standard. See Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279 (1991) (applying Chapman standard to introduction of coerced confession); Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673 (1986) (applying Chapman standard to unconstitutional limitation on cross-examination); Bassil v. United States, 517 A.2d 714 (D.C. 1986) (discussing application of Chapman rather than denial of right to challenge credibility of a government witness with affirmative testimony of witness's reputation for untruthfulness). An appellate court might not apply Chapman unless it concludes that the error was preserved as constitutional error (i.e., the defense objected on constitutional grounds).

(c) When the error is brought to the appellate court's attention without first having been presented to the trial court, the appellant must surmount a towering obstacle – the plain error standard –before an appellate court will grant relief. See Super. Ct. Crim. R. 52(b) (permitting appellate review of plain error that was not brought to attention of trial court).

For years, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals has cited the standard in Watts v. United States, 362 A.2d 706, 709 (D.C. 1976) (en banc): "the error complained of must be so clearly prejudicial to substantial rights as to jeopardize the very fairness and integrity of the trial." Olano, 507 U.S. at 732-737, gave a more comprehensive explanation of the plain error standard:

1. an error must exist;

2. the error must be plain (clear or obvious) as a matter of law;

3. the defendant carries a burden of showing the error affects substantial rights (i.e., the opposite of Kotteakos and Chapman which place the burden on the beneficiary of trial error); and

4. the appellate court should exercise its discretion to grant relief only if the error seriously affects the fairness, integrity or public reputation of the proceeding.

(d) In some instances, constitutional error is not capable of being measured under the Chapman test and therefore requires reversal without consideration of prejudice. These errors are called "per se" or "structural" errors. See United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, 548 U.S. 1 (2006) (right to retained lawyer of ones choice); Sullivan v. Louisiana, 508 U.S. 275 (1993) (deficient reasonable doubt instruction); Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963) (total deprivation of the right to counsel); Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510 (1927) (trial by biased judge); McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168 (1984) (right to self-representation).

2014 Supplement

Henderson v. United States*, 133 S. Ct. 1121 (2013). Under prong 2 of Olano, which requires that any error be plain or obvious, it is sufficient that the error be plain at the time of appellate review.

C. The Appellate Record

1. Composition

The Court of Appeals confines its review of trial court actions to matters "in the record." See D.C. App. R. 10. The following items are potentially in the appellate record:

1. The transcript of proceedings. Anything said in a trial courtroom may be part of the appellate record if it is transcribed by a court reporter or recorded by the Superior Court's tape recording system. If a lawyer or judge makes a statement before the tape recorder is turned on or before the court reporter has begun taking notes, the statement will not appear in a transcript of the proceedings and will not be part of the record, unless someone repeats the statement when recording is taking place. Non-verbal events may often be significant. If counsel thinks it important for the appellate court to know about such an event – a gesture or movement by a witness or marshal, a judge's or witness's tone of voice, an interjection by a spectator – counsel must verbally describe the event. See Dyson v. United States, 450 A.2d 432 (D.C. 1982) (during closing argument prosecutor sat in witness chair while mimicking defendant's testimony).

The trial court should not go "off the record." "The Superior Court is a court of record, and as such all proceedings in cases before it must be 'on the record.'" Braxton v. United States, 395 A.2d 759, 767 (D.C. 1978). If this rule is violated, the content of any non-recorded proceedings should be described for the record. So long as words have been recorded during a court proceeding, they can be made part of the appellate record and brought to the attention of the appellate court.

2. The court file. The Superior Court case jacket (with the clerk's entries) and all papers filed in the jacket may be considered by the Court of Appeals as part of the appellate record. If, for instance, counsel has filed a pretrial motion to suppress evidence, that motion can be part of the appellate record. On the other hand, if counsel provides a document to opposing counsel and the judge, but does not file it, the document will not be in the appellate record unless the judge directs the clerk to file the document in the court jacket. For example, defense counsel sometimes submit proposed jury instructions to the prosecutor and judge in open court. If the judge rejects these instructions in whole or in part, the defendant may want to explain to the appellate court why the proposed instructions were superior to the judge's instructions. However, the appellate court will not know the exact content of those instructions unless they were filed in the Superior Court case file. Counsel should ensure that pleadings are filed in the court jacket, either by filing them with the Clerk's office or by asking the judge in open court to have a copy filed by the courtroom clerk.

3. Exhibits and Physical Objects Admitted in Evidence. Any item admitted into evidence may be part of the record on appeal. Because any item admitted into evidence has an identifying notation (e.g., "Gov't Exhibit #1"), the Court of Appeals can be confident that the item it examines is the same item considered by the trial court.

4. Exhibits and physical objects not admitted in evidence but preserved by the court for purposes of the record. Sometimes counsel offer items for evidence that are rejected by the trial court. For instance, the trial court may reject defense photographs as more prejudicial than probative. If, after obtaining the unfavorable ruling, defense counsel simply puts the photographs in his or her personal file, the appellate court will not see them. If counsel hopes to argue on appeal that the trial court erred by denying admission of the photographs, it will be important for the appellate court to see the same photographs that the trial court saw. But see McCoy v. United States, 781 A.2d 765 (D.C. 2001) (government permitted to supplement record on appeal with reconstituted array, identical to the original array, consisting of five original photos and four copies). Accordingly, after the trial court rules, counsel should ask the judge to have the clerk preserve the photographs for purposes of the record on appeal. The photographs should carry a notation such as "Def. Exhibit #1 for Identification." The photographs (or any similar item) will be preserved by the Clerk's office exactly as it preserves items admitted into evidence.

2014 Supplement

Freeman v. United States*, 60 A.3d 434 (D.C. 2013). Convictions for first-degree murder and other armed offenses in connection with road rage incident affirmed where appellate court was able to conduct "independent review" of "exceptionally detailed reconstruction of the record" that included judge's detailed and contemporaneous notes, government exhibits admitted into evidence, and trial counsel's post-trial motion to set aside verdict and grant new trial, identifying several grounds for appeal, but did not include record of jury selection, opening statements, or closing arguments, and where defendant identified no other issue on appeal.

2. Making an Effective Record

The previous discussion about the appellate record and appellate standards of review should demonstrate to defense counsel their unmistakable obligation to make an effective record in three respects: (1) ensure that information relevant to a potential appeal is part of the record, i.e., that the transcript, the court file, or the exhibits preserved for appeal include all the information about the events in the trial court that the appellate court might need to rule in the client's favor; (2) consider framing arguments to the trial court in ways that make the trial court's ruling less likely to receive appellate deference; and (3) present all arguments with specificity to the trial court to prevent review under a plain error standard and, if possible, to obtain review under the standard for constitutional error.

In thinking about how to make an effective record, defense counsel should appreciate the similarity between persuasive lawyering in the trial court and making an effective record. An attorney who wants to persuade a judge to rule her way will explain to the judge why the law is in her favor and why the ruling matters. For example, if she wants to admit evidence, she will explain the legal rules about the right to admit evidence and she will tell the judge what the evidence is, i.e., she will "proffer" the evidence, so that the judge can see how important the evidence is to her client's case. If she is trying to exclude evidence, she will again recite the appropriate rules and explain to the judge how admission will unfairly prejudice her case. A persuasive argument to the trial judge will include both steps.

This two-step argument makes a perfect appellate record. As explained previously, an appellate court cares about both error and prejudice. Error alone will rarely win reversal. Counsel's proffer or explanation to the trial court will help persuade the appellate court that the defendant was truly prejudiced by the trial court's ruling and that defense counsel effectively put the trial judge in a position to understand and evaluate counsel's claim. Moreover, the proffer puts into the record information the appellate court needs to decide whether the trial court's ruling caused prejudice to the defense.

On occasion, defense counsel will find themselves in a position where making an effective record seems inconsistent with winning an acquittal. These situations are rare. Generally speaking, effective trial court lawyering goes hand-in-hand with effective record preservation.

For example, some attorneys fear that by asking for curative instructions, they increase the likelihood of acquittal but decrease the chances of winning on appeal, because the instruction tends to dissipate the harm that warrants the instruction. However, the failure to request a curative instruction will be held against the defendant on appeal as evidence that trial counsel did not perceive the alleged harm as overly prejudicial. If trial counsel is confident that the curative instruction is not powerful enough to cure the harm, counsel should propose a stronger instruction, explaining why it is superior to the court's proposed instruction. If this suggestion is rebuffed, and the uncorrected harm is extremely prejudicial, counsel should consider requesting a mistrial. These steps, which are designed to win at trial (or prevent an unfair defeat), are precisely the steps needed for an effective appellate record.

Arguments must be precise; objections must be timely, clear and specific. Counsel should not rely on objections made by co-codefendant's counsel unless the judge has made clear that an objection on behalf of one defendant counts as an objection for all defendants. Even in that situation, counsel may want to identify specific prejudice that would befall her client if the court ruled adversely. Specificity and precision are the goal, but they are not always attainable. Counsel should not refrain from making objections simply because they are unsure of the precise legal principle or case name to invoke. In situations where an attorney believes her client is being unfairly prejudiced but legal phraseology eludes her, counsel should explain her position in factual terms, explaining why a certain ruling under specified facts is prejudicial to her client.
Good trial advocacy and good record preservation depend on assessment of facts. Case law is great, but not always at hand and not always necessary to persuade the appellate court that defense counsel preserved her claim. See Brown v. United States, 683 A.2d 118, 126 n.9 (D.C. 1996) (claim preserved although defense did not provide trial court with cases to support proposed line of cross-examination).

Counsel should take care not to appear to acquiesce in adverse rulings. Not infrequently, counsel on the losing end of legal arguments, whether in open court or at bench conferences, end the discussion with comments intended to reflect politeness, but which appear in the cold print of appellate transcripts as abandonment of counsel's earlier objection and agreement with the trial court's ruling or rationale. "Thank you, Your Honor" is a prime example. Accordingly, counsel should find ways to be polite while making crystal clear that she has not abandoned her objection. Special care must be taken to make a proper record for appellate review in the following areas:

Rulings admitting or excluding evidence: Federal Rule of Evidence 103 requires that these claims of error be preserved in a particular way. An objection to the introduction of evidence must state the specific ground of objection if the specific ground is not apparent from the context. If the objection is to exclusion of evidence, the substance of the excluded evidence must be made known to the court by proffer, unless it is apparent from the context. Although the Federal Rules of Evidence do not apply in Superior Court, Rule 103 accurately states District of Columbia law.

The requirement that counsel be specific in objecting to evidence can have important ramifications. For example, the government's evidence may be objectionable because it violates both the rule against hearsay and the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confront witnesses. If defense counsel objects on hearsay grounds alone, the defendant may have difficulty persuading the appellate court that the constitutional claim is preserved.

If the court excludes evidence, counsel should proffer what the evidence would be, why it is important to the defense, and why its exclusion would harm the defense. If the court limits cross-examination, counsel should proffer what counsel was attempting to elicit and why it is important. Counsel has a right to make such proffers. See Flores v. United States, 698 A.2d 474, 480-81 (D.C. 1997) (trial court erred by holding counsel to pre-set time limitation on cross-examination; silent record caused by court's refusal to hear counsel's proffers of additional questions left appellate court unable to find error harmless); In re Schwartz, 391 A.2d 278, 281-82 (D.C. 1978) (per curiam) (persistence in attempting to make offer of proof was insufficient to sustain contempt citation against counsel). Counsel is not expected to risk contempt in attempting to proffer evidence after the court has made clear its unwillingness to receive the proffer. See McBride v. United States, 441 A.2d 644 (D.C. 1982).

Rulings that affect defendant's decision to testify: In Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984), the Supreme Court held that a defendant did not preserve an objection to an in limine ruling that he could be impeached with a prior conviction, where the defendant chose not to testify in light of the trial court's ruling. In Bailey v. United States, 699 A.2d 392 (D.C. 1997), the Court of Appeals applied Luce to hold that a defendant who did not testify could not raise on appeal the trial court's ruling that if the defendant testified and raised a consent defense to a rape charge, then the government could introduce evidence that the defendant committed a prior rape. Counsel should study Bailey before making decisions in similar situations.

Discovery and Brady demands: The record must reflect all discovery requests and Brady demands. Copies of all relevant letters should be filed in the case jacket. Prejudice caused by late disclosures (whether during or shortly before trial) should be placed on the record.

Severance: Severance motions must be made as soon as the basis for them becomes apparent, Super. Ct. Crim. R. 12(b), and renewed at any point during the trial when prejudice becomes apparent. See, e.g., Hill v. United States, 600 A.2d 58 (D.C. 1991) (applying plain error analysis to claim involving quantity of Drew evidence where trial counsel initially objected only to admissibility); Wheeler v. United States, 470 A.2d 761 (D.C. 1983).

Batson challenges: If counsel believes that the other party is exercising its peremptory challenges in a racially discriminatory manner, see Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986), and Tursio v. United States, 634 A.2d 1205 (D.C. 1993), counsel must ensure that the record reflects the racial composition of the jury panel, of peremptory challenges made by both parties, and of the petit jury. The record should also reflect the race of the parties and potential witnesses, and any incentive one side may have to empanel a monochromatic jury. A similar record should be made of gender discrimination. See Nelson v. United States, 649 A.2d 301, 310 n.12 (D.C. 1994) (emphasizing importance of creating record for Batson challenge) and Robinson v. United States, 878 A.2d 1273 (D.C. 2005) (error to deny defendant prompt hearing on prima facie showing of discrimination by government in its peremptory strikes of black women from the jury). Finally, counsel should ensure that the Jury Panel Roster is signed by the courtroom clerk and placed in the court jacket.

Motions for judgment of acquittal: Defense counsel should move for judgment of acquittal at the end of the government case. If the defense presents evidence after moving for judgment of acquittal, the appellate court will review the entire record – not just the government's evidence – in determining whether the evidence is sufficient. The motion should be renewed at the close of the defense case. See Wright v. United States, 513 A.2d 804, 809 (D.C. 1986); Washington v. United States, 475 A.2d 1127 (D.C. 1984); Franey v. United States, 382 A.2d 1019, 1021 (D.C. 1978).

Closing argument: Before closing arguments, counsel should ask, on the record, whether counsel may object during the opponent's closing. See Carpenter v. United States, 635 A.2d 1289 (D.C. 1993) (court may require less specificity in objections if contemporaneous objections not permitted). If counsel may object only at the close of arguments, counsel should keep a list and make specific and detailed objections at the bench after the completion of argument. Otherwise, contemporaneous objections must be made. If counsel does not move for a mistrial or request a curative instruction, particularly where counsel's objection has been sustained, the court may adopt the plain error standard of review. McGriff v. United States, 705 A.2d 282 (D.C. 1997); Lee v. United States, 668 A.2d 822 (D.C. 1995); Allen v. United States, 649 A.2d 548 (D.C. 1994).

Jury instructions: Before closing arguments, the court must notify the parties of the instructions it will give; all objections to instructions must be made before the jury retires. Super. Ct Crim. R. 30. Counsel should approach the bench after the jury is instructed, not only to object to any errors but also to renew previous objections or requests. If the court asks whether counsel is "satisfied" with the instructions as given, counsel should say he is satisfied "except for all objections previously made." Also, counsel must recite omitted instructions and modifications on the record or file them in the court jacket. See Derrington v. United States, 488 A.2d 1314 (D.C. 1985). Objections to reinstructions must be made before the jury resumes deliberations. Robinson v. United States, 649 A.2d 584, 586 (D.C. 1994).

Speedy trial: Counsel must move for a speedy trial early and often, in addition to moving for release or a reduction of bond if the client is incarcerated. A motion to dismiss for want of a speedy trial and a motion for reduction of bond are not the equivalent of a demand for a speedy trial. See Graves v. United States, 490 A.2d 1086 (D.C. 1984) (en banc). Before and during trial, counsel should allege specific instances of prejudice or anxiety from delay. See In re D.H., 666 A.2d 462, 475 (D.C. 1995). A motion to dismiss should be renewed post-trial, citing specific instances of harm during the trial, such as a witness's failure of recollection.

II. TAKING AN APPEAL

A. Procedural Steps to Start the Appeal

1. Notice of Appeal

In a criminal case, the judgment appealed from is the judgment of conviction, which is entered by the Clerk of the Superior Court at the time of sentencing, not at the time of the verdict. D.C. App. R. 4(b)(1); Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(d). After pronouncing the sentence in a case that has gone to trial, the court must advise the defendant of the right to appeal and to apply for leave to proceed in forma pauperis; the court does not have this obligation if the defendant has pled guilty or nolo contendere. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(c)(3). Trial counsel also has a duty to inform the client of the right to appeal. See Hines v. United States, 237 A.2d 827 (D.C. 1968); Dillane v. United States, 350 F.2d 732 (D.C. Cir. 1965), aff'd after remand, 384 F.2d 329 (D.C. Cir. 1967). It is trial counsel's responsibility to file a timely notice of appeal with the Clerk of the Superior Court, who must then transmit copies to the other parties and to the Clerk of the Court of Appeals. See D.C. App. R. 3(a), (d); Super. Ct. Crim. R. 32(c)(3).
A notice of appeal must be filed in Superior Court within thirty days of entry of the order or judgment appealed from, unless a different time is specified by statute. D.C. App. R. 4(b)(1). Without a timely notice of appeal, the Court of Appeals has no jurisdiction. See Jackson v. United States, 626 A.2d 878, 879 (D.C. 1993); Barnes v. United States, 513 A.2d 249 (D.C. 1986); United States v. Jones, 423 A.2d 193 (D.C. 1980); Brown v. United States, 379 A.2d 708 (D.C. 1977). That the appellant may have acted in good faith is irrelevant. See Brown, 379 A.2d 708 (notice lost in mail, appellate court without jurisdiction to consider appeal).

The thirty-day limit may be extended by the trial court for a period not to exceed thirty additional days upon a showing of "excusable neglect." D.C. App. R. 4(b)(4); see Jackson, 626 A.2d at 879-81; see also Stutson v. United States, 516 U.S. 193 (1996). A strict standard applies. See Pryor v. Pryor, 343 A.2d 321 (D.C. 1975); McKnight v. United States, 764 A.2d 240 (D.C. 2000).

The Supreme Court has "long held that a lawyer who disregards specific instructions from the defendant to file a notice of appeal acts in a manner that is professionally unreasonable." Roe v. Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. 470, 477 (2000); see Jackson, 626 A.2d at 881-82; Samuels v. United States, 435 A.2d 392, 395 (D.C. 1981); Hines, 237 A.2d at 828-29. Moreover, the Supreme Court has held > that counsel has a constitutionally imposed duty to consult with the defendant about an appeal when there is reason to think either (1) that a rational defendant would want to appeal (for example, because there are nonfrivolous grounds for appeal), or (2) that this particular defendant reasonably demonstrated to counsel that he was interested in appealing.

Flores-Ortega, 528 U.S. at 480; see also In re Sealed Case, 527 F.3d 174 (D.C Cir. 2008) (two to three minute post-sentencing conversation insufficient to constitute "consultation" as used in Flores-Ortega). The appropriate remedy for ineffective assistance of counsel leading to failure to file a timely notice of appeal is for the trial court to vacate the sentence and resentence the defendant in order to permit a timely appeal. See Jackson, 626 A.2d at 881-82.

Only "[u]pon a finding of excusable neglect or good cause" may the Superior Court extend the time within which the notice of appeal must be filed. D.C. App. R. 4(b)(4). Motions for reconsideration of trial court rulings do not toll the time limit. In re Alexander, 428 A.2d 812 (D.C. 1981); Jones, 423 A.2d at 196 n.4; cf. D.C. App. R. 4(a)(2). Nor does a motion to modify sentence pursuant to Superior Court Criminal Rule 35, toll the thirty-day time limit. See Jackson, 626 A.2d at 880-81.

If the judgment or order is decided or entered out of the presence of the parties and without notice to them, the thirty-day period starts to run on "the fifth day after the Clerk of the Superior Court has made an entry on the criminal docket reflecting the mailing of notice." D.C. App. R. 4(b)(4). If the Clerk fails to make that entry, the period starts upon actual receipt of the order. Williams v. United States, 412 A.2d 17, 20 (D.C. 1980).

2. Compilation of the "Record on Appeal"

It is critical that counsel be sure that the record on appeal is complete because this material constitutes all the information about the case that the Court of Appeals will have. The record on appeal at least potentially includes the transcribed portion of trial court proceedings, copies of the docket entries and all papers in the trial jacket, plus any other exhibits introduced into evidence or preserved for appellate review during the trial court proceedings. See D.C. App. R. 10(a). Before filing the brief, counsel must review the actual record in possession of the Clerk of the Court of Appeals. If any item is necessary to appellate review but is not included in the record, it is appellant's responsibility to file a motion to supplement the record or transmit the item. See Hammon v. United States, 695 A.2d 97, 102-03 (D.C. 1997) (because appellant had not arranged for transmittal of documents reviewed in camera by trial judge, appellate review was limited to defense proffer at trial and trial judge's representations).

a. Preparation of transcript

If the appellant is proceeding in forma pauperis, the trial court must consider the notice of appeal as a request for a transcript of the entire trial, except voir dire and opening statements. D.C. App. R. 10(b)(5)(B). Appellant is also entitled on request to a transcript of any pretrial evidentiary hearing on a motion to suppress evidence, and may submit requests for transcripts of other proceedings to the trial court. Id.

Requesting Transcripts: Immediately after appointment, appellate counsel must determine whether all necessary transcripts have been requested. Occasionally, trial counsel will omit important proceedings, such as pretrial motions, from the initial request. Appellate counsel can minimize the delay caused in ordering additional transcripts by making an early and careful review of the court file, docket entries and transcript order, and by consulting with trial counsel and with appellant about various proceedings in the case.

Counsel may request additional transcripts by filing a form request with the trial judge, through the office of the Appeals Coordinator, describing what additional portions are necessary and why. If the judge refuses to authorize preparation of the additional transcript, counsel should file a motion with the trial court and then, if necessary, with the Court of Appeals, explaining with greater specificity why the additional transcript is needed to represent the appellant effectively. See Gaskins v. United States, 265 A.2d 589 (D.C. 1970). A defendant has the right to have trial court proceedings transcribed and made available to appellate counsel and the Court of Appeals to the extent necessary to facilitate appellate review. Cole v. United States, 478 A.2d 277 (D.C. 1984). Without question, appellant has the right to a transcript of the trial. See Gaskins, 265 A.2d at 592; Williams v. Oklahoma City, 395 U.S. 458 (1969). But see Legrand v. United States, 570 A.2d 786, 791 (D.C. 1990) (for purposes of collateral attack, appellant entitled to transcript only upon showing of particularized need).

Retained counsel has more specific responsibilities regarding preparation of the transcript. Within ten days of filing the notice of appeal, counsel must order from the reporter the transcript not already on file that counsel considers necessary for the appeal, and file a statement with the Clerk of the Superior Court and the Clerk of the Court of Appeals indicating that counsel has ordered the transcript, the reporter's estimated date of completion, and that counsel has made satisfactory arrangements with the court reporter for payment. See generally D.C. App. R. 10(b).

Appellate counsel should check periodically with the court reporter's office regarding preparation of the transcript, which will usually have begun by the time of appointment. The supervisor of the Court Reporting and Recording Division should be able to give an estimated timeframe for completion of the transcript.

Incomplete Records or Transcripts: If all or part of a transcript cannot be prepared, the parties should request leave from the Court of Appeals to prepare a statement of the evidence or proceedings in accordance with D.C. App. R. 10(c). Cole, 478 A.2d 277, found that, despite the appellant's inability to proffer specific prejudicial errors, the statement submitted in lieu of the missing transcript did not protect the appellant's due process right to meaningful appellate review, and reversed the conviction. Therefore, if counsel finds that all or part of a transcript cannot be prepared, she should consider filing not only a statement of proceedings in the trial court pursuant to D.C. App. R. 10(c), but also a motion to vacate the conviction, if applicable, citing Cole. Lucas v. United States, 476 A.2d 1140 (D.C. 1984), on the other hand, found that the appellant's due process rights were not prejudiced by the partial loss of trial transcripts. Although noting that reversal may be warranted if the court cannot ascertain whether a claimed error is prejudicial or if appellate counsel cannot review a "substantial or crucial portion" of the transcript, Lucas found that neither situation existed. The standards set forth in Cole and Lukas have been applied in a number of cases involving incomplete transcripts that resulted from the malfunction of recording devices in Superior Court. See Egbuka v. United States, 968 A.2d 511 (D.C. 2009) (reversing due to inadequate record on appeal); Romero v. United States, 956 A.2d 664 (D.C. 2008) (reconstructed record sufficient to provide meaningful appellate review); David v. United States, 957 A.2d 4 (D.C. 2008) (same); Williams v. United States, 927 A.2d 1064 (D.C. 2007) (remanding for Rule 10 procedures).

b. Preparation of record

The Appeals Coordinator's Office prepares the remainder of the record on appeal. Where the appellant is represented by court-appointed counsel, the office prepares a copy of the entire original Superior Court file including Courtview docket entries and forwards it to the Clerk of the Court of Appeals. If appellant is represented by retained counsel, the office prepares only that part of the record designated for appeal and retains the Superior Court file while the case is pending on appeal.

Physical exhibits are not automatically transmitted to the Court of Appeals. If any of these are necessary for proper consideration of the appeal, counsel should file a motion for inclusion in the record. See D.C. App. R. 10(e)(2). It is the appellant's responsibility to insure that the Court of Appeals has before it all materials necessary to its determination of the issues presented. Hammon, 695 A.2d at 102-03.

Exhibits are maintained in the Property Clerk's Office on the fourth floor of the courthouse. If any exhibits are not found in the Property Office, counsel should file a motion in the trial court to reconstitute the record. See D.C. App. R. 10(e). The party who removed the exhibits must return them to the custody of the Property Office and establish the chain of custody and where and under what conditions the exhibits have been maintained. Frequently the parties can agree as to the authenticity of exhibits that were retained by a party and an unopposed motion to supplement the record can be filed in the Court of Appeals. If the exhibits cannot be located or the record cannot be sufficiently reconstituted and their absence denies meaningful appellate review, under Cole, the conviction should be reversed.

3. Transmission of Record and Docketing Appeal

Once the record is complete, the Appeals Coordinator transmits it to the Clerk of the Court of Appeals. See D.C. App. R. 11. An appellant who is not proceeding in forma pauperis must pay a fee to the Clerk of the Superior Court, see D.C. App. R. 11(a), and a docketing fee to the Clerk of the Court of Appeals, see D.C. App. R. 12(a). The Clerk of the Court of Appeals then files the record, dockets the appeal, and gives notice to all parties of the date the record was filed. See D.C. App. R. 12(b). Appellant's brief is due forty days after docketing. See infra Section IIC1.

If the record is incomplete or inaccurate, counsel should file a motion to supplement the record in the trial or appellate court. See D.C. App. R. 10(e). The parties may stipulate to an addition to or correction of the record. If the transcripts are not complete and the case is docketed prematurely, counsel should file a motion in the Court of Appeals to stay the briefing schedule.

B. Investigation and Other Preliminary Steps

1. Contact with Appellant

Appellate counsel should contact the client promptly after appointment. This contact will likely be the first information the appellant receives regarding the appeal; in most cases, the appellant will not even have learned of counsel's identity. Thus, counsel should explain counsel's role and how counsel was appointed to the case. Because many people have misperceptions about the appellate process, counsel should carefully explain the meaning and goals of the appeal, and encourage the client to participate in the appellate process.

If the client is on probation or on bond pending appeal, counsel may obtain a current address from trial counsel, the trial court jacket, the Pretrial Services Agency, or the client's probation officer. Probation officers can be identified by calling (202) 508-1900 for adult clients and (202) 879-4742 for juveniles.

If an incarcerated client is still at the D.C. Jail, counsel should attempt a prompt visit, as the client will likely be transferred quickly. Clients can be located with a PDID or DCDC number through the Records Office at the jail (202) 673-8257. Clients in federal custody can be found through the inmate locator at the Bureau of Prisons (202) 307-3126, or on the BOP website, www.bop.gov. Juveniles are held at the New Beginnings Youth Center in Laurel, Maryland (202) 299-3200. Clients can be visited at the New Beginnings facility. Travel expenses incurred in visiting a client may be claimed under the Criminal Justice Act.

Numerous appellate clients are in federal, state, county and private facilities in other jurisdictions. Such transfers make it difficult to have meaningful attorney-client contact. Because virtually any incarcerated client may be transferred without notice at any time, at least one prompt meeting with the client is critical.[2]

Counsel must periodically apprise the appellant of the progress of the appeal. A copy of the trial transcript should be sent to the client promptly, if the client requests it. Counsel must advise and consult with the client on the issues to be raised, provide copies of all briefs and other pleadings filed by both sides, and inform the client about the oral argument of the case.

2. Contact with Trial Counsel

Appellate counsel should interview trial counsel and review trial counsel's materials to evaluate the case and understand its procedural history. Trial counsel's name and address can be obtained from the Superior Court file.

3. Motions for Bond Pending Appeal

Standard: To obtain an appeal bond, counsel must show by clear and convincing evidence that: (1) the person is not likely to flee or to pose a danger to any other person or to the property of others; and (2) the appeal raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in a reversal or an order for a new trial. D.C. Code § 23-1325(c).

The trial court must rule on a motion for bail pending appeal before it will be considered by the Court of Appeals. See D.C. App. R. 9(b); D.C. Code §§ 23-1324, 1325(d). If trial counsel has not already filed a motion for bond pending appeal, appellate counsel may file a motion in Superior Court, serving a copy on the United States Attorney's Office. The trial court retains jurisdiction to rule on the motion, even if a Notice of Appeal has already been filed. Lofton v. United States, 926 A. 2d 1104 (D.C. 2007).

[2] The Bureau of Prisons no longer honors orders issued pursuant to Super. Ct. Crim. R. 38(b), which authorizes the trial court to "recommend to the Attorney General that the defendant be retained at, or transferred to, a place of confinement near … the place where [his] appeal is to be heard, for a period reasonably necessary to permit the defendant to assist in the preparation of [his] appeal." (Emphasis added.)

Counsel must gather information about the client just as for a pretrial bond review motion, after reviewing the trial jacket for any matters related to bond, such as Pretrial Services Agency reports and bond motions. Counsel may also wish to contact the Pretrial Services Agency to review any other reports they prepared or updated on the client.

The trial court need not find that it committed reversible error before granting bond. See United States v. Giancola, 754 F.2d 898, 900 (11th Cir. 1985). Rather, the inquiry is in two parts: first, whether the issue raised on appeal is "substantial," that is "one which is either novel, . . . has not been decided by controlling precedent, or . . . is fairly doubtful," id.; and second, whether the issue is critical enough to warrant reversal of the conviction if it is resolved in favor of the defendant. United States v. Powell, 761 F.2d 1227, 1231 (8th Cir. 1985); United States v. Handy, 761 F.2d 1279, 1280 (9th Cir. 1985); United States v. Hicks, 611 F. Supp. 497, 499 (S.D. Fla. 1985).

If the trial court denies the motion for bond pending appeal, counsel should promptly move the Court of Appeals for release. See D.C. App. R. 9(b); D.C. Code § 23-1324. If a notice of appeal has already been filed in the case, no notice of appeal from the order denying bail is necessary. The motion for review of the trial court's order must be accompanied by an affidavit conforming to Form 6 of the appellate rules. D.C. App. R. 9. See generally Villines v. United States, 312 A.2d 304 (D.C. 1973) (outlining procedures for seeking bail pending appeal). The appellant must follow the relevant procedures governing expedited appeals in D.C. App. R. 4(c)(1).

The standard of review of the trial court's determinations of flight and danger is whether the action is supported by the evidence. D.C. Code § 23-1324. The trial court's evaluation of the merits of the issues raised on appeal receives de novo consideration. D.C. Code § 23-1325(d).

4. Examination of the Record

Assessment of an appellate case requires thorough review of the record, including the transcripts, court file and docket entries, and exhibits. A photocopy of the original court file and docket entries may be borrowed from the Office of the Clerk of the Court of Appeals for copying. With the "E" number from the exhibit summary sheet in the case file, the trial docket number, and dates of the trial, the Property Clerk will retrieve the exhibit for counsel to examine. (The item will not be released without written authorization of the trial court; forms can be obtained from the Property Clerk.)

5. Claims of Ineffective Assistance of Trial Counsel

Counsel on direct appeal has a duty to make a reasonable inquiry into the possibility of ineffectiveness of trial counsel, especially if requested by the client or if counsel perceives a possible basis for that claim. Doe v. United States, 583 A.2d 670, 674-75 (D.C. 1990). Full presentation of this issue on appeal generally will require that an additional factual record be made in the trial court.[3] To develop the record, appellate counsel must file a motion and seek a hearing before the trial court under D.C. Code § 23-110. It is vital that counsel files his or her motion under § 23-110 while the direct appeal is pending. Shepard v. United States, 533 A.2d 1278, 1280 (D.C. 1987), held:

> [I]f an appellant does not raise a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the pendency of the direct appeal, when at that time appellant demonstrably knew or should have known of the grounds for alleging counsel's ineffectiveness, that procedural default will be a barrier to this court's consideration of appellant's claim.

See also Brown v. United States, 656 A.2d 1133, 1135 (D.C. 1995); Simpson v. United States, 576 A.2d 1336, 1338 (D.C. 1990) (reiterating importance of developing factual record through hearing before trial court). The Shepard rule does not apply when the same attorney represents the client at trial and on direct appeal. Little v. United States, 748 A.2d 920, 923 (D.C. 2000).

Pursuant to an administrative order issued in 2005, the Court of Appeals has indicated that it will no longer routinely grant requests to stay criminal appeals pending the resolution of D.C. Code § 23-110 motions. "Counsel may, in an appropriate case, file a motion showing good cause for staying the appeal to await the outcome of the trial court motion." District of Columbia Court of Appeals, Order No. M-225-05 (September 27, 2005). Whether or not the direct appeal is stayed, counsel must file a separate notice of appeal if the § 23-110 motion is denied; the two appeals can be consolidated if the direct appeal is still pending. See Hall v. United States, 559 A.2d 1321 (D.C. 1989).

6. Stay Pending Appeal

Requirements: If a client will suffer irreparable injury during the time that an appeal is being litigated, counsel should contemplate requesting a stay of the trial court's order pending appeal. The procedural rules for stays pending appeal are found in D.C. App. R. 8. Ordinarily, the appellant must request a stay from the trial judge before seeking a stay in the Court of Appeals. The substantive requirements for a stay pending appeal are comparable to the requirements for an injunction. Appellant must show that: (1) he is likely to prevail on the merits of the underlying appeal; (2) he will be irreparably injured if a stay is not granted; (3) a stay would not substantially harm other interested parties; and (4) a stay would serve the public interest. Virginia Petroleum Jobbers Ass'n v. Federal Power Comm'n, 259 F.2d 921 (D.C. Cir. 1958); Barry v. Washington Post Co., 529 A.2d 319 (D.C. 1987).

7. Expedited Appeals in Adult and Juvenile Cases from Pretrial Detention Orders

Both juveniles and adults can appeal from pretrial detention orders before trial. D.C. Code §§ 16-2328, 23-1324. "[P]atently unreasonable or unlawful conditions of release" can be challenged pursuant to the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651. Walls v. United States, 364 A.2d 154 (D.C. 1976).

[3] Other issues, such as the government's failure to produce Brady material, or the recantation of a key witness, may also require that an additional factual record be made in the trial court pursuant to § 23-110 and/or Super. Ct. Crim. R. 33.

It can be advantageous to ask the court to reconsider the initial decision on conditions of release before pursuing an appeal. Denial of such a motion to reconsider is appealable. Blackson v. United States. 897 A. 2d 187 (D.C. 2006). In juvenile court, however, a respondent who chooses this route loses the statutorily-mandated expedited time frame. See In re K.H., 647 A.2d 61, 62 (D.C. 1994) (juvenile expedited appeal process applies to original order only). In denying the motion to reconsider, the court must provide reasons for not modifying conditions of release that result in the defendant's incarceration. D.C. Code § 23-1321(c)(4); see In re M.L. DeJ., 310 A.2d 834 (D.C. 1973). By seeking reconsideration, the defendant can obtain the record needed for appeal. If the initial bond decision was made by a magistrate judge, it must first be appealed to a judge. See D.C. Code § 11-1732(k); Arlt v. United States, 562 A.2d 633 (D.C. 1989).

Appeals from pretrial detention orders are considered emergency appeals and are expedited. D.C. App. R. 4(c)(2), 9(a). The appeal takes the form of a motion for summary reversal with a supporting memorandum of law and any other supporting documents, accompanied by an affidavit executed by the client or attorney giving the personal information about the appellant required by D.C. App. R. 9(b), Form 6.

Counsel should advise the Court of Appeals promptly by telephone (202) 879-2700 when planning to file an expedited appeal and notify opposing counsel. D.C. App. R. 4(c)(2)(B). Counsel should immediately file the notice of appeal with the Clerk of the Superior Court and then advise the Clerk of the Court of Appeals that the appeal has been filed, giving counsel's telephone number, the name, address and telephone number of opposing counsel, and an indication of what transcript is required. Id. A full transcript of all proceedings after arrest is not required; the only items that must accompany a request for review are a copy of the order, if any, from which the appeal is taken, and any other transcripts or documents filed in Superior Court which counsel believes essential for the court's consideration. D.C. App. R. 9(c)(2)(B). When transcripts are needed, and certainly if the court made only oral findings, counsel should order expedited or "daily" production of the transcript. A motion for summary reversal should be filed, setting forth the relevant facts and the legal claim.

In an adult detention appeal, the court will not necessarily hear oral argument. See D.C. App. R. 4(c)(2)(D). The standard of review in a bond appeal is narrow: the order resulting in pretrial detention is to be affirmed if it is "supported by the proceedings below." D.C. Code § 23-1324(b).

A juvenile who has been ordered transferred for criminal prosecution or detained or placed in shelter care has a statutory right to an expedited, interlocutory appeal. Id. § 16-2328. A notice of interlocutory appeal must be filed within two days of entry of the order to invoke the expedited process. The expedited appeal process applies to the original order of detention, not to subsequent orders denying reconsideration of the detention order. See In re K.H., 647 A.2d at 62. A motion for summary reversal must be filed by no later than 4:00 p.m. on the next calendar day after the filing of a notice of appeal. D.C. App. R. 4(c)(2)(E). The Court of Appeals must hear argument within three days of the filing of the notice of appeal (excluding Sundays) and dispense with the requirement of filing briefs, resolving the appeal on the papers submitted to the lower court. The court must render its decision on the day after argument. D.C. Code § 16-2328.

8. Remands, Motions for New Trials and Motions for Sentence Reduction

"As a general rule, once a notice of appeal has been filed, the trial court loses the power to take any substantive action with respect to the order or judgment on appeal." Bell v. United States, 676 A.2d 37, 40-41 (D.C. 1996) (footnote omitted). Therefore, the trial court cannot grant a motion for a new trial or grant a motion for sentence reduction while the case is on appeal because those rulings would affect the judgment on appeal. See id. On the other hand, the trial court retains jurisdiction to entertain and deny a motion for new trial during the pendency of the appeal, Smith v. Pollin, 194 F.2d 349 (D.C. Cir. 1952), or to entertain and deny a motion for reduction of sentence despite a pending appeal. Johnson v. United States, 513 A.2d 798, 801 (D.C. 1986).

The trial court's denial of the motion for a new trial or the motion for sentence reduction qualifies as a final order. If the defendant wishes to challenge either order, he must file a notice of appeal within thirty days of entry of the order. See In re E.G.C., 373 A.2d 903, 905 (D.C. 1977). The Court of Appeals will consolidate the direct appeal and the appeal from the order denying a new trial or the order denying a sentence reduction.

If, however, the trial court indicates a willingness to grant either form of relief, it should indicate its willingness on the record, and the appellant should then move the Court of Appeals for a remand. The Court of Appeals then remands the case, which closes the appellate case and returns jurisdiction to the trial court. If the new trial order merits an appeal, or if the client is convicted after a retrial, the appellant must file a new notice of appeal from the new trial court judgment to reinstate the direct appeal. Bell, 676 A.2d at 41. In some instances, the Court of Appeals remands the record in a case, most frequently to enable the trial court to make additional factual findings. In such circumstances, jurisdiction remains in the appellate court and "[n]o new notice of appeal is required" to challenge trial court rulings. Id.

C. Procedural Steps to Prepare and File Brief

1. Briefing Deadlines

Counsel has forty days from the docketing of the appeal (the date the case record is filed with the Clerk of the Court) within which to file the appellant's brief. The appellee's brief is due within thirty days of the date of service of the appellant's brief. A reply brief may be filed within twenty-one days of the date of service of the appellee's brief; it must be filed at least seven days before oral argument. D.C. App. R. 31(a). Counsel should carefully review D.C. App. R. 26, which governs the computation of time. Counsel must file an original and three copies of each brief with the Court, and serve a copy on each party to the appeal. D.C. App. R. 31(b).

Counsel may move for an extension of time within which to file briefs. D.C. App. R. 26(b). The United States Attorney (202) 514-7088 and the D.C. Attorney General (202) 727-9813 or (202)

727-6252 generally do not oppose reasonable requests for additional time. Prior to filing any procedural motion, counsel must attempt to secure the consent of each party. D.C. App. R. 27(b)(4). The movant must state the opponent's position at the beginning of the motion. Id. The court does not favor requests for extensions, and counsel should request only as much extra time as is needed, stating explicitly why it is needed.

The court is reluctant to grant multiple extensions. The order granting the first extension may state that no further extensions will be granted. If counsel has no choice but to seek a further extension, counsel must be prepared to make a specific and convincing showing of need. If a brief is filed beyond its assigned deadline, counsel must also file a motion for leave to late file. D.C. App. R. 27(b). If counsel fails to file a timely brief, the court may order counsel to show cause why the brief has not been filed, and may refer the attorney to Bar Counsel if the response is unsatisfactory.

2. Issues to be Raised

After consulting with the client, appellate counsel must make difficult decisions on what issues to raise. The most effective appeal generally focuses on a few key claims rather than outlining a number of weak issues along with two or three strong ones. Although failing to include all nonfrivolous issues pressed by the client is not ineffective assistance, see Johnson v. United States, 513 A.2d 798, 801 (D.C. 1986); Jones v. Barnes, 463 U.S. 745 (1983), counsel should strive to satisfy the client that all potentially successful claims have been raised. See Head v. United States, 489 A.2d 450 (D.C. 1985) (failure to raise issue on direct appeal ordinarily forecloses review of that issue); see also Berg v. United States, 631 A.2d 394, 396 n.8 (D.C. 1993) (points not urged in brief treated as abandoned).

3. Motions to Dismiss Appeals

On occasion, appellate counsel may believe that no non-frivolous issues exist in a particular case. If the defendant agrees with counsel's assessment, he may decide to waive his right to appeal and voluntarily dismiss the appeal. A motion for voluntary dismissal under these circumstances should include a statement by the appellant satisfying the requirements for a knowing and voluntary waiver of the right to appeal set out in Johnson v. United States, 513 A.2d at 803. This statement should reflect that the appellant "knows of the appeal right, has discussed with counsel the possible issues he can raise and the possible remedies, and notwithstanding that he has freely decided to dismiss the appeal he previously noted." Id. (footnote omitted).

In some circumstances, however, the client will disagree with counsel's conclusion that there are no nonfrivolous grounds for appeal. In these cases, counsel must file a motion to withdraw as counsel and file an Anders brief, as discussed below. Counsel should therefore not conclude that the appeal is not viable until carefully exploring both the facts and the law and consulting with the client, taking throughout the view of a zealous advocate. See id. at 801 (appellate counsel is vigorous advocate for client, not a friend of the court). Appointed counsel should not ask to withdraw unless counsel would also insist on withdrawal if retained in the same case. If there are any arguable issues, appointed counsel should remain in the case, even though counsel may be subjectively unimpressed with the merits. See Johnson v. United States, 360 F.2d 844 (D.C. Cir. 1966); McCoy v. United States, 370 F.2d 224 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

Counsel who decide to file an Anders brief, Anders v. California, 386 U.S. 738 (1967), must file in the Court of Appeals a motion to withdraw as counsel, stating that after careful examination of the record, counsel finds the case wholly frivolous. Counsel must accompany the motion with a brief, identifying the issues that the appellant seeks to assert and all other conceivable issues that counsel has considered as a possible basis for appeal. Counsel should send a copy of the pleading to the client, who may oppose the motion to withdraw; counsel must not serve government counsel. Bell v. United States, 457 A.2d 390 (D.C. 1983); see Smith v. Robbins, 528 U.S. 259, 265 (2000) (stating that courts are "free to adopt different procedures [from those in Anders], so long as those procedures adequately safeguard a defendant's right to appellate counsel").

The Court of Appeals will not grant a motion to withdraw as counsel without first reviewing the record on appeal, including the reporter's transcript. D.C. Ct. App. Internal Operating Procedures IV.D (1991). Sometimes, the court finds nonfrivolous issues exist and appoints new counsel to file an advocate's brief. See Bell, 457 A.2d at 391; cf. Streater v. United States, 478 A.2d 1055 (D.C. 1984). If the Court of Appeals agrees that no nonfrivolous issues exist, it will grant the motion to withdraw and may dismiss the appeal.

4. Preparation of the Brief

The form and service of briefs are governed by D.C. App. R. 28, 30, 31 and 32. Except by special order of the court, the brief may not exceed fifty pages, and the reply brief may not exceed twenty pages. D.C. App. R. 32(a)(6). Counsel should file the original and three copies with the Clerk unless the case is to be heard en banc, in which case an original and nine copies are necessary. D.C. App. R. 31(b). A copy must be served on counsel for each party separately represented, and the brief should contain a certificate of service. Counsel should send a copy of the brief to the client.

D.C. App. R. 30 governs the preparation and filing of an appendix to appellant's brief. No appendix is required in cases in which a party has been permitted to proceed in forma pauperis or counsel has been appointed to represent the party. In these cases, however, the appellant "must file with the brief 4 copies of any opinion, findings of fact, and conclusions of law, whether written or set forth orally in the transcript, that relate to the issues raised on appeal," and "may … file with the brief 4 copies of any additional portions of the record to be called to the court's attention." Id. This limited appendix must be served on all parties. Id.

All facts set forth in the brief should include citations to the record. Each page of the entire record of the case, including the transcript, will have been numbered for use by the court. Counsel may refer to the transcript by the page number as recorded by the reporter who prepared it. Page numbers for other portions of the record must be ascertained by checking the appellate record in the clerk's office of the Court of Appeals.

In a juvenile appeal, the record of the case, including the briefs, is sealed and only counsel of record may see it without a court order. D.C. App. R. 12(c). The case is identified by the respondent's initials and the case number in the trial court. Id.

When resolution of a dispositive issue is very clear, a party may move for summary reversal or affirmance. D.C. App. R. 27(c). The moving party has a heavy burden to show that "the merits of his claim so clearly warrant relief as to justify expedited action." In re M.L. DeJ., 310 A.2d 834, 836 (D.C. 1973); see United States v. Allen, 408 F.2d 1287 (D.C. Cir. 1969).

5. Reply brief

A reply brief is not mandatory, D.C. App. R. 31(a)(1), but is an excellent opportunity to answer the appellee's arguments before oral argument. Counsel should not simply repeat the original arguments, but should use the reply brief to respond to the appellee's points and, if necessary, refocus the appellant's arguments. A reply brief should be filed within twenty-one days after service of the appellee's brief; it cannot be filed later than seven days before oral argument.

D. Oral Argument

1. Calendaring Cases for Hearing

Each month, the Clerk of the Court prepares and posts a calendar of cases scheduled for oral argument the following month, listing the cases, docket numbers, counsel, and dates for argument. The calendar is also posted on the DCCA's website, at www.dcappeals.gov. While a copy of the calendar or a letter containing the date of argument is generally mailed to each attorney with a case scheduled for argument that month, failure to receive the calendar, which is also published in the Daily Washington Law Reporter, does not excuse failure to appear when the case is called for hearing. D.C. App. R. 33(a). Counsel may apply to the court for a change of the scheduled date, but must show "good cause." D.C. App. R. 34(b).

All docketed cases, except original cases and those interlocutory appeals that must be decided within statutory guidelines, are screened and placed on either the regular or summary calendar of the court. When a case is on the regular calendar, counsel must appear for oral argument. On the consequences of failing to appear, see D.C. App. R. 34(e). The summary calendar includes any case that will not establish or alter a rule of law, involves no novel fact situation or legal issue of continuing public interest, and is unlikely to involve any error of law. See D.C. Ct. App. Internal Operating Procedures; D.C. App. R. 34(b). A case on the summary calendar will not be set for oral argument unless one of the parties moves, within the period provided in the calendaring notice, for leave to present oral argument. D.C. App. R. 33(c). If argument is allowed, it will be heard on the date specified in the summary calendar.

2. Conduct of Argument

Arguments in cases on the regular calendar are limited to thirty minutes per side, unless the Court sua sponte or on motion enlarges the time. D.C. App. R. 34(g)(1). Arguments in cases on the summary calendar are ordinarily limited to fifteen minutes per side. Id. Appellant's counsel is entitled to open and close the argument. D.C. App. R. 34(c). Where the cases of more than one appellant have been consolidated on appeal, the appellants are treated as one and must divide the allotted time for argument. D.C. App. R. 34(g)(2).

Except in a truly extraordinary case, the court will not rule from the bench; the case is taken under advisement following argument, and a written opinion is issued later.

E. Procedures Following the Court's Decision

Counsel should notify the client promptly of the court's decision and send the client a copy of the opinion. Counsel's obligation to the client does not end there. In the event of a reversal and remand for a new trial, counsel may file a motion to expedite the mandate so that the client can have release conditions promptly determined. If the conviction is affirmed, counsel should consider whether to seek rehearing, rehearing en banc, or a writ of certiorari from the Supreme Court, and must explain the court's decision to the client. If counsel decides not to pursue the case further, counsel must advise the client expeditiously of that decision and of the client's right to do so pro se or to request other counsel. Detailed procedures that counsel is required to follow are spelled out in Qualls v. United States, 718 A.2d 1039 (D.C. 1998) (per curiam); see infra. Counsel should explain the relevant time limitations and advise the client that a motion to recall the mandate based on ineffectiveness of appellate counsel must be filed within 180 days of issuance of the mandate. D.C. App. R. 41(f).

1. Petitions for Rehearing

If a petition for rehearing or rehearing en banc is warranted, counsel should prepare and file it. The Court of Appeals will not appoint new counsel to file a petition for rehearing en banc if appellate counsel has concluded that the petition would be frivolous, and if the appellant is unable to show that this assessment is wrong. Wise v. United States, 522 A.2d 898 (D.C. 1987).

The petition cannot exceed ten pages; it must be filed, or additional time requested, within fourteen days of entry of judgment. D.C. App. R. 40. Rehearing is granted by a vote of at least two of the judges who decided the case; rehearing en banc may be ordered by a majority of the active judges of the court. D.C. App. R. 35(a). Rehearing en banc "will not be ordered unless: (1) en banc consideration is necessary to secure or maintain uniformity of the court's decisions; or (2) the proceeding involves a question of exceptional importance." D.C. App. R. 35(a). A petition for rehearing or rehearing en banc "must begin with a statement that either: (A) the decision of the division conflicts with controlling authority (with citation to the conflicting case or cases) and consideration by the full court is therefore necessary to secure and maintain uniformity of the court's decisions; or (B) the proceeding involves one or more questions of exceptional importance, each of which must be concisely stated. D.C. App. R. 35(b)(1). See generally Kirk v. United States, 510 A.2d 499 (D.C. 1986); Angarano v. United States, 329 A.2d 453 (D.C. 1974); M.A.P. v. Ryan, 285 A.2d 310 (D.C. 1971).

2. Petitions for Certiorari

Any petition for certiorari must be filed in the Supreme Court within ninety days of the entry of judgment, Sup. Ct. R. 13, or denial of a timely petition for rehearing in the Court of Appeals. Id. Issuance of the mandate is not a prerequisite to the filing of a petition of certiorari. West v. United States, 659 A.2d 1260, 1263 (D.C. 1995). A justice may provide a sixty-day extension "for good cause shown," but extensions are not favored. Penry v. Texas, 515 U.S. 1304 (1995).

The Supreme Court will not devote its limited resources to the claims of petitioners who have abused the certiorari process. Attwood v. Singletary, 516 U.S. 297 (1996).

An indigent appellant has the right to have counsel appointed for preparation of a petition for a writ of certiorari in the Supreme Court provided that there are nonfrivolous issues which can serve as grounds for the filing of the petition. Qualls v. United States, 718 A.2d 1039, 1040 (D.C. 1998) (per curiam). This right to appointed counsel does not require counsel to file frivolous petitions. Id. Qualls set forth detailed procedures which counsel must follow when counsel determines that there are no non-frivolous issues to present to the Supreme Court in a certiorari decision. It is imperative that counsel follow these procedures. As the Court makes clear, counsel's appointment will not terminate until the written notification required by Qualls is filed with the Court. The opinion states:

> [W]e direct that, upon final disposition of an appeal before this court, appointed appellate counsel shall notify his or her client of this court's decision, inform the client of the available options, including the right to file a petition for writ of certiorari, and then determine whether there is a non-frivolous basis for filing such a petition. By "a non-frivolous basis" we mean that, in counsel's professional judgment, there are reasonable grounds for seeking Supreme Court review. If counsel determines that there are no such grounds, counsel shall immediately notify the client in writing of his or her intent not to file a petition for certiorari and the reasons underlying that decision.
> The written notice shall include instructions on how the client can file a pro se petition for writ of certiorari and a motion to proceed in forma pauperis, notice of the deadlines for their filing, copies of the pro se forms provided by the Supreme Court, and information about how to file a request for extension of time to file a petition for certiorari. The notice shall also state that the client has the right to file a motion for appointment of new counsel for the purpose of filing a petition for certiorari. In addition, counsel shall file with this court a copy of the written notification to the client. Counsel's appointment will terminate upon the filing of that notification with this court.

718 A.2d at 1041 (footnotes omitted).

3. Issuance of the Mandate

The mandate is the order from the Court of Appeals directing the trial court to act in conformity with the Court of Appeals' decision in the case. See Willis v. United States, 692 A.2d 1380, 1382-83 (D.C. 1997). The mandate – which normally is sent only to the lower court, not to the parties – issues twenty-one days after the entry of judgment, unless the time is shortened or extended by order. D.C. App. R. 41(b). Issuance of the mandate is essentially a ministerial and procedural step. West, 659 A.2d at 1263. The timely filing of a petition for rehearing or rehearing en banc will stay the mandate; if the petition is denied, the mandate will issue seven days later unless otherwise ordered. D.C. App. R. 41(b).

A party may move the court to stay issuance of the mandate for up to ninety additional days pending application for a writ of certiorari in the United States Supreme Court. D.C. App. R. 41(d)(2). If counsel files the petition for certiorari and notice of the filing is provided to the Clerk of the Court of Appeals, the mandate will be stayed until disposition of the petition.

Appellate courts have the inherent power to recall a mandate for "good cause." This "good cause" requirement is a showing of a need to avoid injustice. Greater Boston Television Corp. v. FCC, 463 F.2d 268, 277-80 (D.C. Cir. 1971). Other instances of "good cause" include: (1) correction of clerical mistakes and clarification of the mandate and opinion; (2) fraud on the court or other misconduct affecting the integrity of the judicial process; (3) avoiding different results in cases pending at the same time; (4) the need to revise an unintended instruction to the trial court that produces an unjust result; and (5) other grounds of injustice rendering it "manifestly unconscionable" that a judgment be given effect. Id.; see Calderon v. Thompson, 523 U.S. 538 (1998) (recall of mandate in habeas case was abuse of discretion).

A motion for recall of the mandate should be addressed to the deciding division. Derrington v. United States, 509 A.2d 605, 605-06 (D.C. 1986) (per curiam). A motion to recall the mandate is the appropriate vehicle for raising claims of ineffectiveness of appellate counsel. See Head v. United States, 626 A.2d 1382, 1383-84 (D.C. 1993); Watson v. United States, 536 A.2d 1056 (D.C. 1987) (en banc). A motion to recall the mandate based on ineffective assistance of appellate counsel must be made within 180 days from issuance of the mandate. D.C. App. R. 41(f).

A party may also move to expedite issuance of the mandate if, for example, the mandate on an interlocutory appeal would otherwise issue after a scheduled trial date. See In re J.D.C., 594 A.2d 70, 79 n.15 (D.C. 1991).

4. Publication of Opinions

An unpublished Memorandum Opinion and Judgment is used when a unanimous panel determines to affirm the judgment below, and agrees that the appellate decision does not (1) establish a new rule of law, (2) alter an existing rule, (3) involve a novel fact situation, (4) constitute the only recent precedent, (5) involve an issue of continuing public interest, or (6) find any error of law. Internal Operating Procedures. These opinions may not be cited as precedent except when relevant under the doctrines of law of the case, res judicata or collateral estoppel. A party may make a timely motion to have a memorandum opinion published, stating why publication is merited. See D.C. App. R. 36(c).

A "per curiam" opinion may be issued if the law is relatively clear but fuller explanation of the court's action is needed than in a memorandum decision. Per curiam opinions, like signed opinions, are published and may be cited as precedent.

5. Motions for Reduction of Sentence

A motion to reduce or modify the sentence, if not filed during the pendency of the appeal, see Johnson v. United States, 513 A.2d 798, 801 (D.C. 1986), may be filed within 120 days after receipt by the Superior Court of the mandate from the Court of Appeals or denial of review by the Supreme Court. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 35(b). See Bell v. United States, 676 A.2d 37 (D.C. 1996) (trial court had jurisdiction to grant motion to reduce sentence following appeal where the motion was timely filed after trial court belatedly received case-remand mandate). The trial court must then decide the motion "within a reasonable time." Super. Ct. Crim. R. 35(b).[4] Appellate counsel should communicate with trial counsel and agree on which one, if either, will assist the client with a Rule 35 motion. Whether or not counsel has agreed to assist the client in connection with any Rule 35 motion, counsel must compute the time period carefully and explain to the client that any such motion must be timely filed.

6. Steps Following Successful Appeals

If the decision on appeal is in the client's favor and further proceedings in the Superior Court are involved, appellate counsel is not obligated to continue to represent the client, but may enter an appearance on the client's behalf in the Superior Court if the original trial counsel is no longer in the case. In any event, appellate counsel should advise the client of the nature of the further proceedings in the Superior Court and the right to request appointed counsel, and should remain in the case until new counsel is appointed. Appellate counsel should notify the Defender Services Office, Room C-215, 500 Indiana Avenue, N.W., (202) 824-2830, of the outcome of the appeal and of appellant's need for new counsel.

If the conviction is reversed and the client is incarcerated under sentence, counsel should file a motion to expedite issuance of the mandate pursuant to D.C. App. R. 41(b). Counsel who will represent the defendant in further proceedings in the Superior Court should ensure that the defendant is returned to court for a determination of whether the government will continue to prosecute the case and, if so, what conditions of release should be set. If a conviction is reversed on the ground that the evidence was insufficient, the trial court must immediately vacate the conviction and sign a release order, if appropriate.

F. Compensation under the Criminal Justice Act

Appointed counsel for an indigent appellant is entitled to compensation, D.C. Code § 11-2601, paid at a rate of $90 per hour to a maximum of $5000.[5] See D.C. Code § 11-2604; 18 U.S.C., 2006A(d)(2). The court may not always approve counsel's voucher even if the voucher demonstrates that counsel spent enough time on the case to meet the maximum fee. Payment in excess of the maximum may be made for extended or complex representation when the judge

[4] Before its amendment in 1984, Rule 35 was interpreted as requiring the trial court to act on the motion within 120 days after the issuance of the appellate mandate or denial of review by the Supreme Court. United States v. Nunzio, 430 A.2d 1372 (D.C. 1981).

[5] Appellate counsel is entitled to compensation for work in pursuing post-conviction relief on the grounds of ineffective assistance of trial counsel. See Doe, 583 A.2d at 675.

who presided over the panel certifies that the amount is necessary to provide fair compensation and the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals approves the payment. Id. § 11-2604(e).

Counsel's ability to be compensated depends in large part on whether counsel has kept accurate time records and can be specific in reporting how the time was used. The official voucher (EO Form 10) requires a detailed report of time spent, including itemization of: (a) interviews and conferences; (b) obtaining and reviewing records; (c) legal research and brief writing; and (d) other, with explanation. Time spent by associates or partners assisting assigned counsel is compensable, but must also be detailed. Counsel is entitled to reimbursement of expenses reasonably incurred in representing the client, such as travel, duplication, and long distance telephone expenses, which must be itemized on the voucher. The payment voucher provided by the Court of Appeals must be filed within sixty days after the conclusion of counsel's representation of the client.

CHAPTER 14

JUVENILE COURT

INTRODUCTION

This chapter provides an overview of the juvenile system in the District of Columbia. Juvenile court practice differs significantly from practice in criminal court. New practitioners in juvenile court must familiarize themselves with the law as it pertains to juvenile court, the Attorney Practice Standards[1], the professionals who work with delinquent youth, and the programs available for youth in the juvenile system.[2]

The history of juvenile court provides the practitioner with insight into the current philosophy of juvenile court. Prior to the statutory creation of juvenile courts in America, children, if competent, were generally prosecuted in the same manner as adults. In the late 19th century, reformers sought to change the system whereby children were commingled with adults in prison. The reformers believed that medical, social, and psychological factors should be examined when determining motivating factors for youthful offenders. Ultimately, the reform movement led to the creation of non-criminal juvenile courts. The first juvenile courts emphasized rehabilitation and acting in the best interest of the child. The courts relied on the doctrine of parens patriae with the judge in the role of the parental figure. "The problem for determination by the judge is not, has this boy committed a specific wrong, but what he is, how he has become what he is, and what had best be done in his interest and in the interest of the state to save him from a downward career." Mack, The Juvenile Court, 23 Harv. L. Rev. 104 (1909).

In its early years, juvenile court focused exclusively on rehabilitation and treatment. Children were committed to social services agencies or industrial schools based on hearsay evidence presented to the judge by a probation officer. Generally, lawyers were not present and juvenile proceedings were not recorded. The language of juvenile court reflected the non-criminal nature of the proceedings.[3] The informal practices in the early years of juvenile court relied on the benevolence of individuals in the system to assure fairness in the proceeding. The result was arbitrary treatment of juveniles and lengthy commitments to industrial schools that were, in essence, prisons.

In 1967, the Supreme Court recognized a liberty interest for children in the delinquency system:

Amsterdam (Philadelphia, PA: ALI-ABA, 2008); The District of Columbia Practice Manual (annual) (District of Columbia Bar) (Juvenile Law and Practice chapter).

[3] Superior Court continues to use non-criminal terminology in juvenile court. See D.C. Code § 16-2301. The child is referred to as the respondent. A trial is an adjudicatory hearing or fact-finding hearing. A conviction is an adjudication. An adjudication of guilt or finding of involvement results in a disposition rather than a sentencing.

> [W]e confront the reality of . . . the Juvenile Court process . . . A boy is charged with misconduct. The boy is committed to an institution where he may be restrained of liberty for years. It is of no constitutional consequence – and of limited practical meaning – that the institution to which he is committed is called an Industrial School. The fact of the matter is that, however euphemistic the title, a "receiving home" or an "industrial school" for juveniles is an institution of confinement in which the child is incarcerated for a greater or lesser time. His world becomes "a building with whitewashed walls, regimented routine and institutional hours . . ." Instead of mother and father and sisters and brothers and friends and classmates, his world is peopled by guards, custodians, state employees, and "delinquents" confined with him for anything from waywardness to rape and homicide.

In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 27 (1967).

The Court in Gault held that juveniles in delinquency proceedings are entitled to Due Process protections in the fact-finding phase. These protections include notice of the charges, an opportunity to prepare a defense, representation by counsel, an opportunity to confront and cross-examine witnesses, and the privilege against self-incrimination. States revised their juvenile codes to reflect the holding in Gault. The Court in Gault, however, noted that unique aspects of juvenile court, such as individual treatment plans, a focus on rehabilitation, and the confidential nature of the proceedings, need not be affected by introducing Due Process protections in the fact-finding phase. In a later opinion, the Supreme Court held that juveniles do not have a right to a jury trial. McKeiver v. Pennsylvania, 403 U.S. 528, 533 (1971).[4] Thus, juvenile court developed as a civil proceeding with criminal aspects to it.[5]

In the District of Columbia, a delinquent child has a statutory right to rehabilitation. The goals of the juvenile justice system "are to provide measures of guidance and rehabilitation for the child and protection for society, not to fix criminal responsibility, guilt and punishment. The State is parens patriae rather than prosecuting attorney and judge." Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. 541, 554-55 (1966); see In re D.H., 666 A.2d 462, 472 (D.C. 1995). The juvenile rules "embrace the principle that each child is an individual entitled, in his own right, to appropriate elements of due process of law, and also adopt the principle that, when a child is removed from his own home, the Division will secure for him custody, care and discipline as nearly as possible equivalent to that which should have been provided for him by his parents." Super. Ct. Juv. R. 2.

The delinquency proceeding is a two-stage proceeding: (1) a determination of guilt or finding of involvement; and (2) a disposition or imposition of a treatment plan. In the first stage, a trial is held before a judge assigned to handle juvenile matters. The child has a right to challenge the government's case just as in adult court. In this stage of the proceeding, the lawyer's role is the same as that in adult court. Counsel must investigate the case, file motions, subpoena witnesses, and ensure all of the client's rights are protected. If there is a finding of involvement by the judge, then counsel must advocate for the youth at disposition. Juvenile delinquency cases are prosecuted by the Office of the Attorney General, formerly known as the Office of the Corporation Counsel. In the District of Columbia, the disposition options are prescribed by D.C. Code § 16-2320. The most common outcomes in delinquency cases are the judge placing a child on probation with conditions or committing the child to the Department of Youth Rehabilitative Services for an indeterminate period not to exceed the youth's 21st birthday.

I. THE JURISDICTION OF THE FAMILY COURT

The Family Court (formerly known as the Family Division of the Superior Court) has jurisdiction in neglect and abuse, delinquency, and status offense (PINS) matters. Delinquency cases are governed by D.C. Code §§ 16-2301 through 2340 and the Superior Court Juvenile Rules. A delinquent youth is defined as "a child who has committed a delinquent act and is in need of care or rehabilitation." D.C. Code § 16-2301(6) (emphasis added). A delinquent act is defined as an act designated as an offense under the law of the District of Columbia; traffic offenses are not deemed delinquent acts unless committed by an individual who is under the age of sixteen. The traffic cases of individuals over 16 are certified to Family Court when there is a "companion" delinquency case,[6] but this practice should be challenged in appropriate cases. Section 16-2301(8) defines a status offender, or a child in need of supervision. Section 16-2301(9) sets forth the criteria for a neglected child.

The judge presiding over a delinquency case also has jurisdiction over the parent for the purposes of enforcing the rehabilitation of the child. The court can hold the parent responsible for restitution to their child's victim, as provided in § 16-2320.01, or can order attendance at hearings or at treatment, as provided in § 16-2325.01.

II. THE ROLE OF THE DEFENSE ATTORNEY

The attorney's first role in representing juveniles is to successfully defend his or her client; the same role as that of the attorney representing an adult.[7] The attorney must focus on the government's allegations separate and apart from his or her client's need for treatment and rehabilitation. Counsel must remember that the client has a liberty interest at stake. Due to the nature of juvenile sentencing, even cases involving minor offenses may result in lengthy incarceration at a secure detention facility such as New Beginnings Youth Development Center or the Youth Services Center.

Counsel has an ethical obligation to zealously represent his or her juvenile clients. Counsel must keep in mind that the parent is not the client. It is the youth who must make informed decisions about whether to contest the allegations or accept a plea bargain, waive certain constitutional rights, and testify on his or her own behalf. It is the attorney's role to carefully explain to the juvenile the legal issues and the proceedings so that the client can make informed decisions.

At the disposition phase, probation officers, judges, and juvenile prosecutors will attempt to determine what is in the "best interest" of the child. As in an adult case, counsel has an ethical obligation to explain the process to the client and to aid in developing options for the client. Counsel in a delinquency case is not a "guardian ad litem" (GAL). Counsel may advise the client as to what he or she believes is in the objective best interests of the child, but counsel cannot substitute his or her judgment, or that of parents, counselors, teachers, or anyone else, for that of the client. Counsel should try at every stage to avoid court intervention for the child or mitigate its impact.

The Family Court has the authority to commit a child to the Department of Youth Rehabilitative Services (DYRS) (formerly known as the Youth Services Administration, a division of the Department of Human Services) for an indeterminate period not to exceed his or her 21st birthday.[8] The defense attorney is obligated to represent the juvenile until the child is free of supervision. The attorney must remain in close contact with both the client and the institution(s) that have custody of the child.[9] Counsel should communicate frequently with juvenile clients; explanations about proceedings often must be repeated several times. Counsel should provide the client with copies of pleadings and always read documents to the youth.

2014 Supplement

In re M.H.*, 86 A.3d 553 (D.C. 2014). Declining to determine constitutionality of DYRS's policy regarding shackling of juveniles.

[8] Legal custody is defined by D.C.Code § 2-1515.01(5); D.C.Code § 16-2301(21).

[9] An attorney who stays closely involved throughout all stages of a case, particularly post-disposition, when a child may be waiting for placement at a residential treatment facility, may be able to expedite placement and the provision of other services. Once a child is placed at a facility, counsel should contact the facility regularly to monitor the client's status and request reports be sent directly to counsel.

Role of Attorney:

- ✓ Counsel must remember that the youth, not the parent, is the client
- ✓ Counsel must thoroughly investigate case and focus on the allegations, ensuring that the client's rights are protected
- ✓ Counsel must serve as an advocate for youth at disposition
- ✓ Counsel must carefully explain legal issues so that the client can make informed decisions
- ✓ Counsel should remain in frequent communication with the client
- ✓ Counsel should provide the client with copies of pleadings and read documents with the client

III. THE CONFIDENTIAL NATURE OF THE PROCEEDINGS

Juvenile proceedings in the District of Columbia are confidential and closed to the public. Only persons necessary to the proceedings may be admitted to hearings, except that in delinquency cases, the victims, eyewitnesses, and the immediate family members and custodians of the victims and eyewitnesses shall have a right to attend several types of hearings. § 16-2316(e)(4); see also Sup. Ct. Juv. R. 53. The admission of victims and eyewitnesses and their families is subject to the rule on witnesses as well as Superior Court Juvenile Rule 53. Id. All others must apply for admission to the proceedings in accordance with procedures outlined in D.C. Code § 16-2316 and the rule.[10] The Omnibus Juvenile Justice Act of 2004 and Superior Court Juvenile Rule 55 broadened the categories of individuals with access to juvenile case records, social records, and law enforcement records. These records are confidential and not open to inspection except by authorized individuals. For juvenile case records, these authorized individuals are Family Court personnel, the respondent, the guardians, defense counsel, the prosecutor, any other court in which the respondent is charged, D.C. Public Schools, the Child and Family Services Agency (CFSA), the Children's Advocacy Center (CAC), law enforcement personnel, and certain other persons interested in the respondent's welfare and rehabilitation, if authorized by the court. D.C. Code § 16-2331.[11] Victims and eyewitnesses also have access to certain information from the case records, at the discretion of the Office of the Attorney General. Id. Access to social files and law enforcement records was also increased, though less broadly, in revisions to §§ 16-2332 and 2333. See Super. Ct. Juv. R. 55; In re J.D.C., 594 A.2d 70 (D.C. 1991) (statute accords primacy to juvenile's right to anonymity; pretrial disclosure of respondent's name warrants closure to media of all further proceedings). Violation of the confidentiality provisions is a misdemeanor, punishable by ninety days imprisonment and a $250 fine. D.C. Code § 16-2336.

[10] Members of the bar are allowed into Family Court proceedings, as a general rule, In Re Ti.B. 762 A.2d 20 (D.C. 2000), but are limited in their ability to disclose information barred by Rule 55.

[11] Counsel may apply to the Family Court to inspect juvenile records. Applications are available in the Juvenile Clerk's office.

Presence of Media in Court: If the press is in court at an initial hearing, counsel should request that the court invoke Rule 53 to exclude all persons present, with specific reference to the media. Counsel should argue that the presence of the media forces counsel to choose between a full-blown hearing and protection of the child's privacy rights. In some cases, information available to the public has already compromised a child's anonymity, and counsel should therefore argue that any further details released could be attributed to the child, compromising his right to confidentiality. This would be the case, for example, if the child or his house has been shown on television, or if a family member or teacher has identified the child in the news. If the media representatives are allowed to remain, counsel should ask that the lawyers, Court Social Services representative (P.O.), and client approach the bench for a sealed discussion of any social factors relating to the pretrial placement decision. Because the P.O.'s position on placement, and the facts relating to it, are usually the first item discussed at the initial hearing, the motion to exclude the media and request for bench discussions must be made as soon as the case is called (or sooner, by contacting the chambers of the Presiding Judge of the Family Court). For a discussion of media presence and its impact later in the proceedings, see In re J.D.C., 594 A.2d 70 (D.C. 1991).

IV. THE ASSIGNMENT OF JUVENILE CASES

The Public Defender Service (PDS) has a Juvenile Unit that handles juvenile cases. Matters that are not assigned to PDS are assigned to private panel attorneys under the Criminal Justice Act or to law students through clinical programs at Georgetown Law School and Law Students in Court, a clinical consortium of law schools. Attorneys who seek appointment to juvenile cases must apply to the Superior Court for admission to the Family Court Juvenile Panel. The application and information about deadlines can be located on the court's web site. Attorneys may contact the Defender Services Office (DSO) office at (202) 824-2830 for information about the current procedures for assignment of cases for juvenile court panel attorneys. The Public Defender Service provides training and resources to private attorneys.

Lawyers are appointed to cases the day the youth is scheduled for his or her first appearance in court at the initial hearing. Counsel may be appointed to a community case or a lock-up case. The case will come in as a community case if the child was released after arrest with a summons to return to court.[12] The DSO office will provide counsel with the child's name, date of birth, and social file number. Counsel should write down all available information and locate the child and his or her parents in the probation intake office or outside the New Referrals courtroom (JM-15).

If the child was held in detention pending an initial hearing, the case will be referred to as a lock-up case. The DSO office staff will provide counsel with a copy of the PD 379. The PD 379 is a police department arrest form completed in every juvenile case. It contains a minimal amount of [12] The police may release a child from the police station before an initial hearing is conducted with a summons to return to the intake unit at Room 4206 of the D.C. Superior Court in two days for a preliminary investigation. A child who is not released at the police station will be taken to the Central Processing Facility at YSC. Children who are eligible for release but whose parents cannot be contacted, or who are not eligible for release and not brought to court by 3:00 p.m., are held overnight and brought to court the next morning for an initial hearing. CSS uses a Risk Assessment Instrument (RAI) to determine if a child is eligible for release pending an initial hearing.

information about the case and client. Detained children are held in the juvenile cellblock located on the JM level of the courthouse. Children younger than 13 with special needs, injuries, or other medical issues are held in the at-risk room next to the main cellblock. D.C. Code § 16-2310.01.

V. THE INITIAL INTERVIEW

Counsel must interview the client and his or her parent or guardian before the initial hearing. The first interview with the client will be a difficult one. The detained child will have spent the night at the Youth Services Center (YSC) and probably will have had little food or sleep. The purpose of the first interview is to begin to establish a rapport with the client, determine if the child has any immediate medical or other needs, obtain contact information for family members, and gather information to argue for the child's pretrial release. Counsel should explain to the child that the purpose of the initial hearing is to determine where he or she will stay until the trial. Counsel should explain to the child that they will have the opportunity to talk about the case in private after the hearing. Counsel should also explain to the child that anything he or she says to anyone except his or her lawyer, including parents, can be used at trial and counsel should instruct the client not to speak with anyone, including other children in the cellblock and co-respondents, about the case. Counsel should check with the marshals in the cellblock for interview times and procedures.

Counsel Should Carefully Explain the Following to her Client:

- ✓ The nature of the allegations; what the government must prove; and the likely and maximum potential consequences
- ✓ The role of counsel; the defense function; the attorney-client privilege, including the limits to privileges covering the client's communications with counsel, therapists, case workers, social workers, and other relevant individuals; and the consequences of the client discussing the facts of the case without first consulting with the attorney
- ✓ The procedures that will be followed in setting the conditions of pretrial release, if applicable to the particular client
- ✓ The type of information that will likely be requested in any other interview the client may have (e.g., with court social services personnel, detention staff, and forensic or mental health evaluators)
- ✓ A general procedural overview of the progression of the case, where possible
- ✓ Information regarding how counsel can be readily reached generally within one business day
- ✓ Schedule for the next client meeting
- ✓ Realistic answers, where possible, to the client's most urgent case-related questions
- ✓ Arrangements to address the client's most critical needs, e.g., medical or mental health attention, request for separation during detention, or contact with family or employers

Confidentiality at initial interview: Counsel should record a physical description of the child[13] and the child's clothing. Generally, counsel will not be able to have a confidential conversation with youth in the cellblock. Counsel must be careful not to ask the child about information relating to the facts of the case. However, counsel can ask basic questions to gather information for the probable cause hearing such as where and when the arrest took place, if the police said they recovered any items from the child, and whether or not there were any people who saw what the police say happened. Counsel should tell the child that if the judge is thinking of keeping the child locked up before trial, a police officer will testify about what the government said happened. Counsel should tell the child that he or she will have the opportunity to talk at the trial, but not at the first hearing.

Counsel should speak to the parent or guardian after speaking to the client. Counsel should explain the process and inquire about the child's school placement and behavior in the home. Counsel should also explain to the parents that the child has been told not to speak to anyone about the offense, including them. Counsel should ask the parents to sign a release of information so that counsel may obtain the educational, medical, and mental health records of the child, and obtain all insurance information.

Counsel should verify the client's age, address, telephone number(s), and parents' names as they appear on the PD 379. Counsel should also obtain the names of family members, along with their addresses and phone numbers, information concerning school and after school programs, and review the client's court record. Counsel can check the client's court record at the juvenile clerk's office.

A. Stand-In Cases

Counsel may be assigned some cases as a stand-in attorney for the initial hearing only. The Family Court has a "single representation" rule that means that if a child has a pending case, the attorney who already represents the child is assigned to any new case the youth picks up. Counsel will act as a stand-in for the child's previous counsel. Counsel should attempt to find the attorney of record in the courthouse and encourage that attorney to handle the initial hearing if possible. Otherwise, counsel must notify the attorney of record of the new charge, provide the attorney with information about the initial hearing, and transfer all paperwork, including the discovery packet, to the attorney of record. If there is a probable cause hearing, counsel should pass along notes of the hearing and sufficient information about the time of the hearing and the parties present so that the attorney of record can order a copy of the transcript of the proceedings.[14] Typically there are no court reporters at the probable cause hearing, so it is essential that counsel record the time of the hearing to facilitate obtaining a transcript of the proceeding.

---

[13] If the child is injured, counsel must seek a court order to photograph the child to preserve evidence. Cameras are not permitted in the courthouse and are not allowed into detention facilities without a court order. Counsel must prepare an order for the signature of the judge conducting initial hearings to permit a photograph to be taken at the detention facility if the child is detained.

[14] CJA attorneys have folders in the filing cabinets in the DSO office, where counsel can place the paperwork. The DSO staff has a list of all CJA attorneys' phone numbers and addresses.

VI. THE INITIAL HEARING

Prior to the Initial Hearing Counsel Should be Familiar with:

- ✓ The elements of the offense and the potential punishment
- ✓ The legal criteria for determining pretrial release and the procedures that will be followed in making that determination
- ✓ The different pretrial release and detention options and conditions the court may set
- ✓ The procedures available for reviewing the trial judge's determination of level of detention and/or conditions of release

The initial hearing is the first court appearance for the juvenile subsequent to arrest. The initial appearance is a mechanism to provide the youth and his or her parent(s) notice of the charges. The judge will provide counsel with a copy of the petition and advise the child and parents of the contents of the petition or charging document and of the child's right to counsel. See D.C. Code § 16-2308. Typically, counsel will waive a formal reading of the petition, enter a plea of not guilty on behalf of the child, and set a date for the next hearing. In some cases, at the initial hearing stage, the client will be offered the opportunity to enter a diversion program or resolve the case by way of a consent decree. See D.C. Code § 16-2314. Upon the request of defense counsel, counsel will be provided with a discovery packet at the conclusion of the hearing (some judges believe that Rule 16 requires the prosecutor to turn over the discovery packet, upon request, before the hearing). If the judge decides to detain the child pretrial, either at a youth shelter house or in secure detention, a probable cause hearing will be held at the time of the initial hearing. A status date and trial date will be set in detention cases.

A. The Petition

Formal charges are brought against a juvenile by way of petition. D.C. Code § 16-2305 mandates that complaints alleging delinquency be referred to Court Social Services in the first instance. Court Social Services must make a recommendation as to whether petitioning is appropriate. The preliminary investigation occurs either at probation intake in the courthouse or by Court Social Services (CSS) intake staff at the Youth Services Center

An intake worker from Court Social Services (CSS) will interview the child and parents, and make a recommendation regarding petitioning based on the nature of the alleged act, prior police or court contact, and any mitigating circumstances. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 103. The report, called the Report of Preliminary Investigation, is forwarded to the Attorney General's office for final decision. If CSS does not recommend petitioning the case, the Attorney General, on request of the complainant, may review the facts and petition the case if the OAG believes such action is necessary to protect the community or the interests of the child. D.C. Code § 16-2305(c). A copy of the recommendation of Court Social Services should be in the child's social file and available for review by counsel.

The petition states the specific statute on which the charge is based. In a delinquency case, the petition must also allege that the child appears to be in need of care and rehabilitation. The petition must be filed within seven days after the complaint is referred to Court Social Services, except as provided by D.C. Code § 16-2312(g) (five-day holds). D.C. Code § 16-2305(d); see In re T.G.T., 515 A.2d 1086, 1090 (D.C. 1986). A petition may be amended with permission of the court upon request by the prosecutor or respondent's counsel at any time prior to the conclusion of the fact-finding hearing, as long as no new offense is charged and if substantial rights of the respondent are not prejudiced. D.C. Code § 16-2305(e); Super. Ct. Juv. R. 7(e).

The nature of the charges to be brought will be determined by an Assistant Attorney General assigned to papering. The assistant will speak with the police officers and may talk to the complainant to determine what, if any, charges will be brought. Once the petition has been typed up in the Attorney General's office, the paperwork will go to the initial hearing courtroom and be placed in the court jacket. Counsel will be given a copy of the petition just prior to the initial hearing.

B. Five-Day Hold

In some cases, the petition will not be filed on the day of the initial hearing and the government will request a five-day hold. The government requests up to five days to determine what, if any, charges will be brought in the petition. The hold is on the filing of the petition, not on the placement or detention decision. For good cause, the court may grant the government's request to delay the filing of a petition. The court cannot, however, delay the detention decision. D.C. Code § 16-2312(g). The government must make "a clear showing that the continuance will serve a legitimate government objective," and give "reasonably specific notice of the nature of the charges." T.G.T., 515 A.2d at 1090. Counsel should inquire through the court about the reason for the postponement. In some cases, a delay will result in the government deciding not to paper the case; thus, in many cases counsel will not vigorously oppose the petitioning delay. However, counsel should oppose detention if requested by CSS or the OAG, and the likelihood of detention should be a factor in deciding whether to oppose the 5-day hold request. As in any other case, a probable cause hearing and finding are required before detention can be ordered. Id. At the further initial hearing, if the case is petitioned, counsel must remind the court that the detention decision was made at the initial hearing and counsel must have notice and an opportunity to prepare if the government seeks to increase the level of detention.

In Preparation for the Initial Hearing, Counsel Should:

- ✓ Interview the child
- ✓ Interview parents and potential caregivers
- ✓ Consult with intake probation CSS staff
- ✓ Prepare probable cause questions
- ✓ View and obtain copies of relevant documents, including copies of charging documents, law enforcement reports and recommendations, and reports made by the court social service representatives concerning pretrial release

C. Community Cases

In a community case, the initial hearing itself is very brief. The child is formally advised of the charges and enters a plea of not guilty, and a status hearing date is set. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 10. Detention should not be an issue at the hearing. Pursuant to Super. Ct. Juv. R. 10(b), "[u]pon entry of a plea of not guilty in a case where the respondent was released prior to the filing of the petition, the judicial officer shall set conditions, if any, of release" (emphasis added). The Rule refers to § 16-2308. Counsel should be prepared to argue against detention using the factors under Super. Ct. Juv. R. 106 and be ready for a probable cause hearing should the government request detention.

D. Detention Cases

In lock-up cases, pursuant to D.C. Code § 16-2312(a)(2), when a child is held after arrest, "a detention hearing shall be commenced not later than the next day (excluding Sundays) after the child has been taken into custody or transferred from another court" (emphasis added).[15] "A child shall not be placed in detention prior to a fact-finding hearing or a dispositional hearing unless he is alleged to be delinquent or in need of supervision and unless it appears from available information that detention is required (1) to protect the person or property of others or of the child, or (2) to secure the child's presence at the next court hearing." D.C. Code § 16-2310(a). In addition, the court must have probable cause to believe that an offense was committed and that the respondent committed the offense. Juvenile Rule 106 enumerates factors relevant to this determination.

Relevant factors include the respondent's previous offenses and pending charges. The rule refers to offenses not arrests, thus the judge should not consider charges that did not result in adjudications. Moreover, the rule specifies offenses that relate to each theory of detention. See In re I.C.B., No. 14019 (D.C. Oct. 20, 1978) (unpublished) (respondent may not be detained based on record of offenses against the person, where prior adjudications were for UUV and possession of marijuana).[16]

[15] A judge may attempt to hold a child without an initial hearing for a variety of reasons (scheduling difficulties, an attempt to "teach a lesson" to a child, the unavailability of a police officer needed for a probable cause hearing, or pursuant to a custody order). See infra n.26. Counsel must object if the court attempts to hold a child in violation of the statute and should take an immediate appeal if this occurs.

[16] There is support for the argument that detention must be supported by factors that are proven to exist by "clear and convincing evidence." Detaining children is pretrial detention. See Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253 (1984). But unlike the situation in Schall, children in D.C. are detained for significant periods of time, they may be mixed in with committed juveniles in the same facility, and there are no rehabilitative services for detained children. For these reasons, children are in the same position as adults who are detained pretrial. United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739 (1987), upheld the Bail Reform Act because the statute required the court to find detention was necessary by "clear and convincing" evidence. Interpreting the adult detention statute, Lynch v. United States, 557 A.2d 580, 581 (D.C. 1989), held "[o]n authority of [Salerno], ... where pretrial detention is sought … the government must prove 'dangerousness' by clear and convincing evidence." Relying on Lynch, the court has further held, with regard to adult detention, "[I]n the absence of a standard of proof in the statute itself (or in its legislative history), we concluded that clear and convincing evidence was required to justify pretrial detention based on danger, in order to be sure the statute was constitutionally applied." Kleinbart v. United States, 604 A.2d 861, 869 (D.C. 1992). Kleinbart called the "clear and convincing" standard a constitutional precaution, if not a prerequisite. Id. at 870.

Under Rule 106(a)(5), "[i]f detention appears to be justified under the factors listed [in] . . . this Rule, the person making the detention decision may nevertheless consider whether the respondent's living arrangements and degree of supervision might justify release pending adjudication."[17] Most importantly, the child must be placed in the "least restrictive alternative." In re Michael McK., 108 D.W.L.R. 1613, 1618 (July 16, 1980) (Schwelb, J.).

Initial hearings are held in the new referral courtroom, JM-15. Although juvenile cases are closed to the public, attorneys may sit in. Before picking up, counsel should observe the process in JM-15. At the initial hearing, the case is assigned to a calendar judge. Further proceedings will be held before that calendar judge.[18] Notice of the charges will be provided to counsel in the form of a petition. Counsel will enter his or her appearance on behalf of the client, waive a formal reading of the petition, enter a plea of not guilty, and request a speedy trial. The judge will ask the probation intake worker to make a recommendation regarding release pending trial. Counsel should speak with the probation intake worker before the hearing and address the concerns of the worker with the court. For example, the worker may be concerned about the child staying out late at night. Counsel can suggest the court impose a curfew. A worker will check on the child's curfew and report to the court any curfew violations

A parent's presence may be essential in obtaining release. If counsel cannot contact parents at home or work, counsel should look for them in the Court Social Service intake office (Room 4206)[19] or outside JM-15. When the parents arrive, counsel should explain the nature of the proceedings and determine if the parents are willing to take the child home. If necessary, counsel should make counseling referrals to help the parents maintain the child in the home. If the court orders that the child be released to his or her parent, or if social services recommends release and a parent is not present, the child still may be released to the parent. The typical procedure is that the child is held until the end of the day at the courthouse and is then brought to Central Processing to wait for a parent. If no parent arrives, the child is taken home or to a shelter house.

If the child has other matters pending in the neglect or delinquency systems, the intake worker will attempt to contact the workers in those cases for information about adjustment and compliance and a recommendation for the release status in the new case. Prior to the hearing, counsel should contact these workers to discuss the child's status.

The juvenile's prior contacts with the system will be very important to the judge in determining placement of the youth prior to trial. The intake probation officer will have a record of the child's court history. Counsel should check the client's record in the juvenile clerk's office so

From these adult cases there is an argument that the courts in the juvenile division must find the factors in Super. Ct. Juv. R. 106 exist by clear and convincing evidence.

[17] In re M.L. DeJ., 310 A.2d 834, 836 (D.C. 1973), limits the court's power to detain children pretrial, holding that an order citing the "nature and circumstances" of the offense charged is, without more, insufficient to justify pretrial detention of the respondent.

[18] Motions to reduce levels of detention are generally heard by the judge who presided over the initial hearing, see Super. Ct. Juv. R. 107(c), or by a designee of the presiding judge of the family court – frequently the calendar judge.

[19] Counsel can check the sign-in sheet in room 4206 to see if parents have arrived at the courthouse.

that counsel can be sure the information the probation officer relates to the judge is accurate.[20] Counsel should determine if the client has any open charges, is on probation, or is under commitment in another case. Counsel should get the names and phone numbers of all attorneys, probation, and DYRS case managers. This social information is crucial in both making effective arguments for pre-trial release and in formulating trial strategy and dispositional plans.

Familiarity with community based resources is as important at the initial hearing as it is at disposition.[21] Often, the most important aspect of counsel's presentation at an initial hearing is to provide the court with appropriate alternatives to detention. It is difficult to persuade the court to release a child on the basis of a legal argument alone. Legal arguments about the statute and rules must be made to remind the court of the constraints on its discretion and make a record where an appeal is indicated. However, release most often follows from practical suggestions that satisfy the court's concerns about the child.

Before the initial hearing, juveniles are tested for drug use and questioned about their health, including drug and alcohol abuse. The court is informed of the test results, and may use this information to order specific release conditions and placement. Drug test results and the results of physical and mental examinations cannot be used by the government at trial, but if the child is adjudicated delinquent, the court can use that information in fashioning a disposition. D.C. Code § 16-2315(d), (e).

E. Pre-trial Placement Options

The judge has several options for placement prior to trial. The court can release the child to a parent or any other appropriate adult. Straight release, although not commonly imposed, sets no conditions on the youth. The judge can also release the child with conditions of release such as regular school attendance, a nightly curfew, periodic drug-testing, electronic monitoring of curfew, and an order that the child stay away from complainants, co-respondents, and scenes of alleged offenses. Counsel should consult the child to identify activities such as evening school activities or employment and have these incorporated into the order as necessary. Counsel should be familiar with the current community placement options available for youth. In addition to the ORD juvenile resource manual, a licensed social worker, the duty day PDS ORD staff member, is available for phone consultations with counsel on placement options and resources for youth.[22]

If the parent or other responsible relative refuses to take the youth and the youth consents, counsel should explore whether or not the youth would more appropriately be in the neglect system and whether the parent's conduct falls within the definition of neglect. See D.C. Code § 16-2301(9).

[20] On the day of pick-up, counsel will generally rely on a computer criminal history check. As soon as possible, counsel should check each court jacket for the outcome because the information in the computer may be inaccurate or incomplete. There are two juvenile clerk's offices; while case jackets are stored in the clerk's office on the fourth floor of the courthouse, filings and applications to inspect records are made at the clerk's office on the JM level.

[21] The juvenile and adult ORD resource manuals are available on the PDS website at www.pdsdc.org.

[22] Counsel should call the main number for PDS, (202) 628-1200, and ask for the ORD duty day staff member.

The judge may also place the youth in a third party supervision program or in a youth shelter house. The court may order detention in shelter care "to protect the person of the [child], or because the [child] has no suitable parent, guardian, custodian, or other person or agency able to provide supervision and care for [him] and the [child] appears unable to care for himself." Rule 106(b). Youth are placed in shelter houses according to the child's sex and age. Children attend school or work during the day and return to the shelter house in the evenings. Weekend home visits may be permitted. Rule 106(b) enunciates specific criteria relevant to whether shelter care is required.[23] Rule 106(b)(3) proscribes secure detention for a child who is in need of shelter care, unless detention would be justified under Rule 106(a). Space in shelter care is almost never available immediately and judges often order secure detention pending space, in violation of the rule. Counsel should be prepared to offer a safe alternative pending placement.[24] Counsel should request information from the probation intake workers about the available pretrial programs.

If the court orders secure detention, the youth will be held at the Youth Services Center (YSC) in DC. The Youth Services Center houses boys and girls detained pre-trial, as well as children detained overnight between arrest and the initial hearing. Youth who are detained and committed on previous cases may also be held at the YSC. New Beginnings houses committed boys. There is no committed secure facility for girls.

VII. THE PROBABLE CAUSE DETERMINATION

If the judge determines that detention is warranted, the court "shall then hear evidence presented by the Attorney General to determine whether there is probable cause to believe the allegations in the petition are true." D.C. Code § 16-2312(e). The Assistant Attorney General (AAG) will have a police officer present testimony. The hearing is the juvenile equivalent of a preliminary hearing in adult court. Counsel will have the opportunity to cross-examine the officer. Counsel should never waive the probable cause hearing. The hearing can provide counsel with basic information about the offense alleged, identification procedures, evidence obtained from the client, and information about the arrest. It affords an opportunity to demonstrate to the client counsel's commitment to zealous advocacy of the child's rights. Many of the considerations discussed in connection with preliminary hearings in adult cases apply with equal force in the juvenile context.[25]

A judge cannot detain a child pretrial without a probable cause determination. If, after the initial hearing, the calendar judge determines that a child presently released in the community is violating his or her conditions of release, the judge cannot detain the child unless there has [23] Factors relevant to protecting the child are abusive or threatening conduct by someone in the family or household; dangerous conduct or threats by someone in the environment or neighborhood; whether the parents, guardian, or custodian cannot protect the child; and danger to the health or welfare of the child for which additional supervision is required short of secure custody. For a child without parental supervision, the court may find inability to care for self based on age, adequacy, length of and adjustment to current living arrangements, and any evidence or likelihood of serious harm resulting from current arrangements.

[24] Space availability can be determined from JM-15 personnel, or a DYRS representative. Counsel can check with the courtroom clerk or PDS ORD staff for current contact information.

[25] See Chapter 4, The Preliminary Hearing.

already been a probable cause determination on the substantive charge or the judge conducts a probable cause hearing and finds probable cause. In re S.J., 686 A.2d 1024 (D.C. 1996).[26]

A. Custody Orders

If the child was arrested pursuant to a pre-petition custody order,[27] counsel must obtain a copy of the supporting affidavit from the court jacket. Typically, copies of the affidavit are in the court jacket by the time of petitioning, and counsel is given a copy with the petition before the hearing.[28] If the court holds a probable cause hearing, the officer may adopt the facts in the affidavit for his or her testimony. Counsel must read the affidavit before beginning cross-examination.

When a child fails to appear for a court date, a custody order will typically be issued. A custody order is the equivalent of a bench warrant in the adult system. In juvenile court, however, failure to appear is not a crime with which a child may be charged and for which a child may be detained. A child cannot be held on a custody order alone, because it is essentially only a showing that a child has violated a condition of release, i.e., not appearing for court. Moreover, a child may be detained only when probable cause has been found with respect to the charge in the underlying petition, not probable cause to believe that the child did not appear. See D.C. Code § 16-2312(e), (f).

If detention is requested when a child is returned on a custody order – based on the custody order alone – counsel should argue, as stated above, that a child can be detained only when probable cause has been found with respect to the charge in the underlying petition. See § 16-2312(e). Because failure to appear is not a crime in juvenile court, a child cannot be detained without a finding of probable cause on the charge in the petition. The child must appear in front of the judge who signed the custody order in order to have the custody order quashed. Unfortunately, if that judge is not sitting, the child is likely to be detained until he or she can appear in the front of the judge. If this is going to be longer than one night, counsel should argue that, given § 16-2312(e), this is an unconstitutional restraint on the child's liberty and that either (1) the child should be released pending appearance before the judge who signed the order or (2) another judge should quash the custody order for the issuing judge. If a child is committed and picked up

[26] The Attorney General's office, relying on dictum from S.J., has sought detention without live testimony where a child is returned on a custody order or where a child is violating a condition of release. Counsel should argue that any detention must be based upon evidence presented through testimony heard by the court. See D.C. Code § 16-2312(e); see also In re R.D.S., 359 A.2d 136 (D.C. 1976). Moreover, counsel should also argue that S.J. does not provide authority to detain children with Gerstein affidavits. The Court of Appeals expressed "no view whether the court would be authorized to order the detention of a juvenile for a shorter period, or whether some substitute for a probable cause evidentiary hearing such as an affidavit…would suffice," S.J., 686 A.2d at 1026. The Court specifically refrained from authorizing the government to detain juveniles with a Gerstein affidavit only. Moreover, in contrast to the juvenile court rules, Super. Ct. Crim. R. 5(c), the adult counterpart, explicitly allows for the court to make a probable cause determination at an initial appearance without conducting a hearing.

[27] A custody order, similar to an adult arrest warrant, may be issued when a judge has determined, on the basis of a sworn affidavit, that there is probable cause to believe a child has committed an offense. D.C.Code §16-2306; Super. Ct. Juv. R. 9(4).

[28] A copy of the Affidavit in Support of a Custody Order is usually provided with the petition before the initial hearing. If it is not provided, counsel should request it from the courtroom clerk in JM-10.

on a custody order based on absconding from a placement, the court will quash the custody order and return the child to the custody of DYRS. See infra Section XXIII F.

VIII. CONSENT DECREES

A consent decree is a court-approved agreement between a child alleged to be delinquent and the Attorney General's office through which the child is placed under court supervision for six months. The child enters the agreement without admitting guilt. If the supervision is successfully completed, the case is closed without an adjudication of delinquency.[29] D.C. Code § 16-2314; Super. Ct. Juv. R. 104. If the child does not comply with the conditions of the consent decree, or is rearrested on a new matter, the case will be reinstated and the child will be brought back to court. Counsel must explain the proceedings to the client and investigate the case so that potential witnesses are not lost in the event that the case is reinstated.

The Attorney General has discretion to offer a consent decree, and usually does so upon the recommendation of the probation intake worker. A consent decree should not be offered where the Attorney General knows that the offense charged is not supported by available evidence sufficient to establish a prima facie showing of guilt.

Counsel can request the current guidelines for eligibility for a Consent Decree from CSS and OAG intake staff. The OAG determines eligibility independent of Court Social Services, but will often approve a consent decree if approved by Court Social Services. If necessary, the prosecutor can re-petition the case to a lesser offense so that it fits within the guidelines.

If the child is petitioned on a new charge, or violates the consent decree, the petition can be reinstated. D.C. Code § 16-2314(c); see In re C.Y., 466 A.2d 421 (D.C. 1983). The client should be fully informed of the consequences of failure to comply with all the conditions.

IX. DIVERSION

Diversion refers to any program that will ultimately divert the youth out of the juvenile justice system. The probation intake workers can familiarize counsel with the various diversion programs. Prior to petitioning the case, probation may offer the youth a chance to enter a program to avoid the case entering the system. To participate in pre-petition diversion, youth are required to waive their right to counsel.

Diversion also may be offered to certain youth as an option after the case has been petitioned. The probation intake worker screens for eligibility. Children who do not successfully complete program obligations are returned to the court system. If a child is rearrested while participating in the program, the charge is likely to be reinstated. Successful completion of the program, which averages six months, results in dismissal of the charges by the government.

[29] A consent decree may contain any term or condition that could be imposed in an order of probation. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 104(a). The court may extend the term of supervision beyond six months. Counsel and the client should report to room 4206 (Probation Intake) after the hearing at which the consent decree is signed. The child will be assigned to a probation field unit close to home.

Counsel can also try to negotiate with the OAG to fashion creative dispositions that meet the needs of the child and the community. For example, the child might do volunteer work or pay restitution to the complainant in exchange for dismissal.

X. MENTAL HEALTH AND PHYSICAL EXAMINATIONS

On motion of the Assistant Attorney General, counsel for the child, or its own motion, the judge may order a child to be examined to aid in determining his physical or mental condition. D.C. Code § 16-2315(a). Whenever possible, a physical or mental examination is to be done on an outpatient basis. The judge may, if it deems necessary, order the child to be admitted as an inpatient to a suitable medical facility for the purpose of examination. The judge may, however, only order a child to a facility for a mental health examination after a psychiatrist or qualified psychologist examines the child and makes a written finding that an inpatient examination is necessary.[30] The court can order an inpatient evaluation for up to 21 days. That period may be extended for an additional 21 days if the psychiatrist or qualified psychologist certifies that a mental health examination has not been completed and cannot be effectively provided on an outpatient basis. § 16-2315(a), (b). Counsel should note that these procedures do not apply if the child is subject to the emergency hospitalization provisions of D.C. Code § 21-521.

A request for a mental health examination may be made for a number of reasons at the initial hearing stage. If the government or court believes the youth may not be competent to stand trial, a request for a forensic screening may be made. The initial hearing will be put off until the late afternoon and a psychiatrist will screen the child. If the psychiatrist finds the child is in need of a further evaluation on an inpatient basis, he or she will recommend the youth be held at a psychiatric hospital for further evaluation. There is no state psychiatric in-patient facility for children, thus the child would be placed at a private facility such as the Psychiatric Institute of Washington. Counsel should be familiar with the options currently available. If the child is detained, the court must conduct a probable cause hearing.

If, as a result of the competency evaluation, the judge finds that the child is incompetent to proceed and unlikely to attain competence in the reasonably foreseeable future, the judge must suspend further proceedings and the OAG must, if appropriate, initiate civil commitment proceedings under Chapter 5 or 11 of Title 21. § 16-2315(c)(1). If the judge finds that the child is presently incompetent to proceed, but is likely to attain competence in the reasonably foreseeable future, the judge must order that the child receive treatment to render him competent. § 16-2315(c)(2)(A). This treatment must be outpatient, unless a psychiatrist or qualified psychologist certifies (and a judge finds) that inpatient hospitalization is the least restrictive setting in which the treatment can be provided. Id. If hospitalization is unwarranted, the child may be released or ordered into shelter care or secure detention under § 16-2310. § 16-2315(c)(2)(B). If a child becomes competent or no longer requires hospitalization, the psychiatrist or qualified psychologist shall send a report stating so to the judge. § 16-2315(c)(4). Any child ordered into a hospital, detention, or shelter care while receiving treatment can be held only up to 180 days, with a possible extension of up to 180 days under certain circumstances.

[30] The court will call the forensic screening division within the courthouse and have a psychiatrist examine the child at the courthouse.

After 360 days, any further necessary treatment can only be on an outpatient basis. § 16-2315(c)(7)(A). If at any time the judge determines the child is unlikely to attain competence in the reasonably foreseeable future, the judge must suspend further proceedings and the OAG must, if appropriate, initiate civil commitment proceedings under Chapter 5 or 11 of Title 21. § 16-2315(c)(8).

In considering whether to raise the competence of a juvenile client to stand trial, counsel should use extreme caution and remember that the consequences of a competency hearing can often be worse than the consequences of a delinquency case. For example, a child with a shoplifting case who is a good candidate for probation might be through the system in a matter of a few months, but if her competency is put at issue, the case could be delayed for years.

The OAG may request forensic examinations for reasons other than competency purposes. If the request is made at the initial hearing stage and competency is not an issue, counsel should object and invoke his or her client's Fifth Amendment rights. If the issue is treatment considerations for the youth, the determination is not appropriately made until after a finding of guilt.

Juveniles are not entitled to raise an insanity defense. In re C.W.M., 407 A.2d 617 (D.C. 1979). Moreover, the purpose of a pretrial mental examination is to determine not the mental state as it relates to criminal responsibility, but competence to participate in the proceedings. D.C. Code § 16-2315(c)(1).[31] At the initial hearing, counsel can ask the court to preclude the government from using any information derived or produced from the mental examination or forensic screening at any time, including disposition. It may be in the respondent's interest to undergo in-patient examination at PIW (Psychiatric Institute of Washington), particularly if the alternative is detention at YSC. Before requesting a pre-adjudication examination, counsel should consider the client's desires and competence to make such a decision. If the screening psychiatrist recommends in-patient evaluation, the respondent is transported to a hospital and a status hearing is set. If the client may have been abused, it may be more appropriate to request that the Child Protection Unit do the evaluation at Children's Hospital.

The Omnibus Juvenile Justice Act of 2004 also created a provision for the HIV/AIDS testing of a juvenile defendant. If a judge finds that there is probable cause to believe that a victim or eyewitness has been put at risk for the HIV/AIDS virus as a result of witnessing or being the victim of the delinquent act alleged to have been committed by the respondent, the judge must order the respondent to be tested. The results of that testing are provided to the OAG or a designee, who will then disclose the results to the respondent and the victim or witness. § 16-2315(f).

XI. RUNAWAYS AND THE INTERSTATE COMPACT ON JUVENILES

The Interstate Compact on Juveniles governs any transfer of juveniles between states. D.C. Code §§ 24-1101 et seq. This statute applies to children who are runaways from home or institutions in other states. It also covers youth who are sent out of state for placement and supervision.

As in adult court, the only challenge at an extradition hearing (sometimes called a "fugitive from justice" hearing or "fugitive from parent") is to the identity of the individual. Thus, an extradition hearing may merely delay the inevitable. If the runaway child wants to return home voluntarily, the prosecutor has a form for voluntary return and the court issues a standard order. Transportation arrangements should be made by counsel in conjunction with the Interstate Compact Office. If the child wishes to resist return, extradition proceedings under the Compact should be demanded. For more information, see Kimberly J. Winbush, Validity, Construction, and Application of Juvenile Escape Statutes, 46 A.L.R.5th 523 (1999); Phillip E. Hassman, Extradition of Juveniles, 73 A.L.R.3d 700 (1998).

XII. STATUS OFFENDERS OR PERSONS IN NEED OF SUPERVISION (PINS)

Counsel should determine if there is a diversion program available for a child charged with a status offense, or if the conduct of the parents would warrant a neglect matter rather than a PINS petition. An alleged PINS may not be securely detained unless detention is necessary to protect the child. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 106(a)(7); see also R. 106(a)(3). This limitation is consistent with the statutory provision that, even if adjudicated, a person in need of supervision may not be committed to secure detention facilities provided for delinquent youths, such as New Beginnings, unless the respondent has a prior PINS adjudication. D.C. Code § 16-2320(d). But see In re W.L., 603 A.2d 839 (D.C. 1991) (not reversible error for child in need of services to be placed at receiving home because child was segregated from general population of detained youth).

XIII. DRUG COURT

Juveniles charged with non-violent offenses may be eligible for the Superior Court Juvenile Drug Court Program. Youth can be referred for a screening for eligibility at the initial hearing stage or at a probation revocation hearing. Counsel should contact a drug court treatment supervisor (202) 508-1788 for current eligibility requirements, programming information, and sanction guidelines. A preliminary screening indicating drug treatment is warranted will be followed by a referral for a more in-depth screening test. If the drug court supervisor determines that the child is appropriate for drug court, a referral is then made to the AAG assigned to drug court (202) 727-3500 to determine whether the charge makes the child ineligible. Participation in drug court requires youth to complete a rigorous program that includes many hours of court hearings, therapy sessions, and treatment-related activities. One juvenile calendar judge is assigned to drug court and that judge receives frequent reports on the progress of the youth in the program. Drug court reviews are held regularly, and sanctions are imposed for non-compliance. Sanctions can include periods of incarceration at YSC.

Counsel must be familiar with current drug court practice and procedures so that he or she can explain carefully to the youth the expectations of the drug court program and the sanctions for non-compliance. Counsel must carefully review the required written waivers and explain the non-confidential nature of the process to the youth and his or her parents.

XIV. PROSECUTION OF JUVENILES IN ADULT COURT

Two mechanisms allow for prosecution of juveniles in adult criminal court. First, the U.S. Attorney has discretion to charge anyone at least 16 years old who is charged with one of the statutorily-enumerated offenses.[32] See United States v. Bland, 472 F.2d 1329 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (upholding executive discretion against constitutional attack). Counsel's only recourse is to try to persuade the prosecutor not to assume jurisdiction over the client and refer the case back to the Family Court. See Montgomery v. United States, 521 A.2d 1150 (D.C. 1987).

The second method is judicial transfer, which is only available if the child was at least 15 at the time of the alleged offense and the offense is a felony; at least 16 and already committed as a delinquent; at least 18 and allegedly committed a delinquent act before becoming 18; or charged with having a firearm within 1,000 feet of a D.C. public school building, property, or event. D.C. Code § 16-2307(a). The Attorney General's Office has 21 days after the filing of the petition to move for transfer. The burden is on the government to show that the transfer is: (1) "in the interest of the public welfare and protection of the public security and (2) there are no reasonable prospects for rehabilitation." § 16-2307(d)(2) (emphasis added). There is a rebuttable presumption that transfer is in the interest of public welfare and the protection of public security for a child 15 through 18 who has been charged with murder, forcible rape, first-degree burglary, robbery while armed, or assault with intent to commit any such offense. This presumption applies only to the first prong of the test, namely whether the transfer is in the interest of the public welfare and protection of public security. The statute enumerates the factors the court shall consider in determining whether a child has reasonable prospects for rehabilitation. § 16-2307(e)(1)-(6).[33]

A juvenile contesting the transfer of a delinquency case is entitled to a hearing, counsel, access by counsel to the juvenile's social and other relevant records, and a statement of reasons for the ruling juvenile court's decision that is sufficient to permit meaningful scrutiny by a reviewing

[32] The term "child," for the purposes of treatment in the juvenile justice system, excludes anyone who is at least 16 years old and charged by the U.S. Attorney with murder, forcible rape, first-degree burglary, armed robbery, or assault with intent to commit any of these offenses. D.C. Code § 16-2301(3); see United States v. Hobbs, 594 A.2d 66 (D.C. 1991). Other charges joinable with the enumerated offenses will also be brought in criminal court, as will any charges based on acts allegedly committed while the criminal charges were pending. Conviction on a lesser charge included within one of the enumerated charges does not return the person to "child" status. Acquittal on an enumerated charge, even if it is the charge that authorized the prosecution of a juvenile as an adult, does not terminate the jurisdiction of the Criminal Division. Partlow v. United States, 673 A.2d 642 (D.C. 1996). In Partlow, a juvenile was prosecuted as an adult on a charge of assault with intent to murder while armed [AWIMWA] and related charges. The jury acquitted the appellant of AWIMWA but was unable to reach verdict on the remaining charges. The court declared a mistrial and appellant moved to have his case transferred back to the Family Division, arguing that the acquittal removed him from the jurisdiction of the Criminal Division. The court denied appellant's motion. The Court of Appeals affirmed the denial, holding that the acquittal did not deprive the Criminal Division of jurisdiction. The court reasoned that just as a mistrial resulting from a hung jury would not terminate jeopardy, neither did it terminate the pendency of the "charge" within the meaning of the Title 16 transfer statute. Rather, the "charge" remains alive as long as any portion of it is not finally resolved.

[33] The law omits the nature of past treatment efforts, but requires the court to consider the child's response to past treatment efforts, including whether the child has absconded from custody. Counsel may argue that the quality and quantity of past treatment efforts remain an inherently relevant fact in determining the child's prospects for rehabilitation.

court. In re W.T.L., 656 A.2d 1123, 1130 (D.C. 1995). A probable cause determination as a predicate to transfer is not required. Id. at 1132 (Due Process challenge based upon this issue denied). Once the OAG has moved to transfer the case, a hearing must be held within 30 days, with one 30-day extension possible if good cause is shown. § 16-2307(d)(1)(A).

Children transferred to adult court face all the penalties available under the criminal code and will receive none of the rehabilitative services available in the juvenile system. Thus, the transfer hearing is critical, and counsel must be thoroughly prepared. Counsel should copy the child's social file and previous court jackets (including PINS and neglect cases); subpoena all institutional records; retain at least one expert to testify to the child's amenability to treatment; and consult a social worker to thoroughly investigate the child's social background and assist in locating appropriate treatment placements in the juvenile system.[34] At least three days before the transfer hearing, counsel should submit a written opposition to the government's motion with a proposed treatment plan, explaining how and why the child can be rehabilitated in the juvenile system. See Super. Ct. Juv. R. 109.

Transfer under either mechanism terminates the jurisdiction of the Family Court over the child with respect to any subsequent acts unless two conditions are met:

> (1) the criminal prosecution is terminated other than by a plea of guilty, a verdict of guilty, or a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity, and (2) at the time of the termination of the criminal prosecution no indictment or information has been filed for criminal prosecution for an offense alleged to have been committed by the child subsequent to transfer.

D.C. Code § 16-2307(h); see In re C.S., 384 A.2d 407 (D.C. 1977). For the purpose of determining a "subsequent delinquent act," a person's status as a "child" is determined by reference to the date on which the charge is filed, not the date of the offense. In re M.R., 525 A.2d 614 (D.C. 1987).

Follow-up Client Interview:

Counsel should make every effort to arrange for a follow-up meeting with the client within 48 hours of appointment to a case.

Counsel should gather additional information relevant to preparation of the defense, including:

- ✓ The facts surrounding the allegations against or affecting the client;
- ✓ Any possible witnesses who should be located;
- ✓ Information about how the client was treated in the custody of police or other investigative agencies, juvenile or mental health departments or the prosecution;
- ✓ Information relevant to potential motions issues;
- ✓ Evidence that should be preserved;
- ✓ Evidence of the client's competence to stand trial or mental state at the time of the offense, where appropriate;
- ✓ The client's physical and mental health, and education records; and
- ✓ The client's past juvenile record, if any, including arrests in this and other jurisdictions; whether the client has any pending charges or is on probation; the history of the client's compliance with orders to appear in court; and the client's past or present performance under supervision.

XV. MOTIONS

In juvenile court, just as in adult court, counsel must carefully consider what motions should be filed in every case. The substantive law applicable in criminal court generally applies to delinquency cases. In addition, counsel must be familiar with motions unique to juvenile court, such as motions to dismiss pursuant to Super. Ct. Juv. R. 48 (b) and motions to reduce the level of detention pursuant to Super. Ct. Juv. R. 107.

Super. Ct. Juv. R. 12 and 47-I require that motions be filed within ten days of the status hearing; most judges set motions deadlines at the first status hearing. Counsel should check with the judge's law clerk to determine current practices. Motions are generally heard by the assigned judge on the day of trial. Because the judge is also the fact-finder, recusal may be appropriate if information learned or credibility determinations made during the hearing warrants a request for recusal.

Many family court judges will incorporate admissible testimony from a motion hearing into the trial so that a witness does not have to repeat the same facts twice. Counsel should be mindful of several issues when faced with incorporation: first, incorporation does not mean that there should not be a separate motions hearing, with a ruling on the motion before opening statements in the trial; second, hearsay objections must be made in order to preserve the issues for appellate review of the trial, despite the admissibility of hearsay at the motion; and finally, that incorporation may not be feasible in all cases, including for example a case in which the client is excused during the identification portion of the motion hearing but wants to exercise his right to be present during all trial testimony.

The Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500, requires that the government turn over to the defense any statement of a government witness that relates to the substance of the witness's testimony. This is an effective tool for defense counsel to obtain prior statements for cross-examination or, if not produced, for seeking sanctions against the government. Reverse-Jencks, the obligation of defense counsel to provide prior statements of defense witnesses, applies in juvenile court. See Super. Ct. Juv. R. 26.2. The government is entitled, upon request, to prior statements taken from defense witnesses called at a hearing or trial.[35]

A. Suppression of Evidence or Statements

Unreasonable search and seizure issues raised by the Fourth Amendment are complex. Counsel should refer to Chapters 20, 21, and 22 for the general principles of law relating to suppression claims, and for a comprehensive examination of the law as it relates to juvenile court practice, counsel should review Chapter 23, Trial Manual for Defense Attorneys in Juvenile Court, Randy Hertz, Martin Guggenheim, & Anthony G. Amsterdam (Philadelphia, PA: ALI-ABA, 2008).[36]

The totality of the circumstances standard is the same for juveniles as for adults; however, in reviewing the voluntariness of any statements or purported Miranda waivers by a juvenile, relevant issues include age-specific factors. In voluntariness determinations, "the burden is on the government to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that a defendant's statements were made 'freely, voluntarily, and without compulsion or inducement or any sort.'" In re J.F., 987 A.2d 1168 (D.C. 2010) (internal citations omitted). The child's individual characteristics, which indicated susceptibility to coercion, required the court "to more carefully scrutinize the police interrogative tactics." Id. at 7. In J.F., the court found the child's statement to be involuntary and took into consideration the child's prior experience with the criminal justice system, his vulnerable mental condition, the length of interrogation, and the fact that no adult was present at the interrogation. Id. at 8. An involuntary statement is inadmissible at trial for any purpose.

When the child challenges the admission of a statement on Miranda grounds, the government must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the police complied with the warning requirements of Miranda if the child was in custody at the time of the interrogation.[37] "Custody for Miranda purposes, is present when there has been a formal arrest or restraint of movement of the degree associated with a formal arrest…Thus custody requires an inquiry into whether given [the] circumstances,[] a reasonable person [would] have felt he or she was not at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave." Id. at 5. (citation omitted). In J.F., the court held that although the child was not in custody during the first part of the interrogation, the interview became custodial during the course of the interrogation and Miranda warnings were required.[38] The court noted the change in the attitude and language of the police officer.

In order to use statements made during the course of custodial interrogation, the government must prove the child knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently waived his or her Miranda rights. Counsel for juvenile respondents must carefully consider factors relating to the client's cognitive abilities and educational level when considering a basis for a motion to suppress statements. Counsel should obtain the child's school records, particularly the special education records, and carefully review the child's previous contacts with law enforcement officers. Counsel must consider in every case whether or not an expert in child development would assist counsel in determining the child's level of understanding.

B. Severance

If it appears that a respondent is prejudiced by a joinder of offenses or respondents, the Division may grant a severance of respondents or provide whatever relief justice requires. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 14. Although the prejudice from improper joinder may be somewhat less where a judge sits as the trier of fact, the juvenile provisions recognize the possibility of prejudice if inadmissible information comes to the attention of the court. Cf. D.C. Code § 16-2312(j) (judge who conducted detention or shelter care hearing cannot conduct fact-finding hearing on the same petition over the objection of the child or the parent).[39]

C. Motions to Reduce the Level of Detention

Court orders for secure detention, shelter care placement, or release on conditions may be modified upon application for reconsideration or modification, or may be appealed. A written motion to reconsider may be filed at any time with the judge who entered the order. A written decision and statement of reasons are to be rendered within five days of filing. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 107(c).[40]

A motion to modify or reduce the level of detention is appropriately filed in all cases where a youth is detained. Counsel should ask that the court hold a hearing on the motion in every case. A hearing allows the youth to participate in the proceedings and hear from the judge the requirements of release or the reasons for continued detention. Counsel should include information about conditions that have changed since the initial order was entered and information that counsel was not able to verify before the initial hearing that might have a positive impact on the detention decision. If parents were not present at the initial hearing, counsel should indicate that the parents could not be reached in time for the initial hearing, but that they would be available for a hearing on the motion. Even if no new information is available since the initial detention decision, counsel may be able to report favorably on the child's progress in secure detention. Moreover, the judge may simply reconsider the original decision in light of the fact that the child has spent some time incarcerated since the arrest. Two or three days at a maximum-security facility with older adjudicated boys can have a significant impact on a detained youth. Counsel should also refer the youth to third party custody programs to offer an alternative to detention to the court.

D. An Increase in the Level of Detention

Counsel should be aware that occasionally the court may seek to enforce provisions of orders in other cases involving the same child by ordering detention at the initial hearing, on the theory that the new arrest violates probation or conditions of release. However, the initial hearing judge arguably lacks the legal authority to determine and respond to violations of other orders. There is no power to hold a child in contempt of court unless "the judge certifies that he saw or heard the conduct constituting the contempt and . . . it was committed in the actual presence of the Court." Super. Ct. Juv. R. 42(a). Due Process requires, at a minimum, notice of a hearing and of the alleged violations before deprivation of liberty may result from non-compliance with judicial orders. See, e.g., Gagnon v. Scarpelli, 411 U.S. 778 (1973) (probation revocation); Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972) (parole revocation). Adult criminal defendants on release cannot be held in contempt for an arrest alone. Parker v. United States, 373 A.2d 906 (D.C. 1977).

The government may seek to increase the level of detention; however, the government is required to file a motion and state the reasons for the request. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 107(c). Counsel is entitled to notice and an opportunity to prepare for a hearing on the motion.

E. Review of Magistrate Judge's Detention Decisions

Rule 107(d) provides for a review of a magistrate judge's (formerly known as hearing commissioner) detention decision. Counsel must make the request for review to a judge designated by the presiding judge of the family court within twenty-four hours. The time taken for review may be extended for no more than an additional twenty-four hours (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays). An extension requires good cause and notice to all parties. No written motions or oppositions are required under R. 107(d).

F. Holiday and Temporary Release

Children who are detained may request temporary release for holidays, interviews with programs, funerals, or other community activities. The calendar judge is the recipient of motions for temporary release.[41] The presiding judge of the family court establishes deadlines and other procedures for holiday motions.[42]

[41] The motion may be heard by the presiding judge of the family court.

[42] DYRS staff at YSC may recommend youth for home visits. While inclusion on their list may increase the likelihood that the court will rule favorably on the motion, counsel should file holiday motions for all their detained

G. Expedited Appeal Process

An expedited appeal may be taken from a ruling on detention by filing a notice of appeal within two days after the order is entered. D.C. Code § 16-2328(a). The Court of Appeals must hear argument within three days (except Sundays) after the notice is filed and must render its decision by the day after argument. § 16-2328(b). Expedited appeal may also be taken from denial of a motion to reconsider. A non-expedited appeal may be taken from any order of pretrial detention or conditional release without complying with the two-day requirement. In re M.L. DeJ., 310 A.2d 834, 835 (D.C. 1973).

Deciding whether to apply for reconsideration or to appeal requires a balancing of interests. On the one hand, an expedited appeal produces a decision within four days of filing the notice. On the other hand, the respondent bears the heavy burden of demonstrating that "the merits of his claim . . . clearly warrant relief." Id. at 836. The court has encouraged litigants to seek reconsideration before pursuing an appeal. In re R.D.S., 359 A.2d 136, 138 (D.C. 1976). The decision may be assisted by knowledge of the practice of the particular judge. Some judges initially detain significant numbers of children and then frequently grant motions to reconsider. If the detention order was entered because certain information was unknown or unverifiable at the initial hearing, reconsideration is probably the appropriate route. On the other hand, if the order involved rejection of a legal argument, the question may appropriately be placed before the Court of Appeals.

H. Dismissal in the Interest of Justice: 48(b) motion

Super. Ct. Juv. R. 48(b) is unique to juvenile court. Motions made pursuant to this rule are sometimes referred to as motions to dismiss for social reasons or in the interest of justice. In every delinquency matter, the judge is obliged to consider whether the child is in need of care or rehabilitation. If not, the judge must discharge the child from the jurisdiction of the court. D.C. Code §§ 16-2301(6), 2317(d). The determination of whether a child is in need of care and rehabilitation may only be made at or after the dispositional hearing, unless the judge has found the respondent incompetent to proceed. § 16-2317(d)(2). The motion requires the court to decide, even if the juvenile committed an offense, whether it is in the interests of justice to continue the delinquency proceedings, In re M.C.F., 293 A.2d 874 (D.C. 1972); however, there is a rebuttable presumption that a delinquency adjudication is sufficient to sustain a finding of need for care or rehabilitation. § 16-2317(c)(2). To overcome that presumption, the judge must find by clear and convincing evidence that the child is not in need of care or rehabilitation before terminating the proceedings. § 16-2317(d)(3). If possible, counsel should present the testimony of witnesses at a hearing on the motion. A motion that is denied at one stage of the proceedings may be reconsidered and granted at another stage.

A motion to dismiss may be filed in any case and for any client. The reasoning given to the court will depend upon the circumstances of each client. If the child is a first offender, has excellent social factors, and is receiving adequate support at home and in the community, he is clients regardless of the facility's position on the motion. Counsel should request a hearing on the motion and provide his or her client with a copy of the motion.

not in need of care and rehabilitation in the delinquency system. After arrest, a child may voluntarily enter a community program that provides care and rehabilitation. Thus, the child would not need care and rehabilitation in the system. If the child is already committed to DYRS in another delinquency case, he will receive care and rehabilitation in that case; another conviction simply to create a record is punitive. If the child is in the neglect system, the child is eligible for more appropriate and often better care and rehabilitative services under the neglect case than the delinquency case, and the delinquency case should be closed. See Super. Ct. Juv. R. 2. Be aware, however, that the fact that a child is receiving care and rehabilitation in another case cannot be the only grounds for dismissal. § 16-2317(d)(4). If the client's problem has been the school system's inability to meet his special education needs, counsel should obtain those services and then seek dismissal because the client is receiving the necessary educational services and is not in need of further care or rehabilitation. Finally, if the client has an adult case pending, or has been convicted in adult court or in another jurisdiction, further care and rehabilitation within the juvenile system may no longer be appropriate.[43] Judges must consider victim impact statements if submitted in making a determination. § 16-2317(d)(5).

XVI. INVESTIGATION AND DISCOVERY

Counsel must meet with the client the day after the initial hearing, or as soon thereafter as possible, to conduct a confidential, in depth interview. Counsel should explain to the child that the conversation is private and that counsel will not tell anyone what the child says. If the child is reluctant to talk, counsel should inquire about what the government says the child did and whom the government might bring to court to say the child was involved. Counsel must explain to the child that the government does not tell counsel who the witnesses are in the case and should explain that counsel will investigate the case and talk to the witnesses before the trial.

Counsel must promptly and thoroughly investigate juvenile cases, write Rosser letters, and file motions to compel discovery if the government does not disclose information in a timely manner.[44] In juvenile court, a discovery packet is prepared with copies of the police forms, statements by the client, a list of the physical evidence, and an indication of other discoverable material. The packet should be obtained from the Assistant Attorney General immediately after the initial hearing, before leaving court. The case may not be assigned to an AAG for up to two weeks after the initial hearing. If counsel does not obtain the discovery packet in court, counsel must ask that a supervisor in the Office of the Attorney General locate the packet. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 16 governs discovery in juvenile court and tracks the adult rule.

[43] Counsel should first seek to persuade the U.S. Attorney's Office to dismiss the adult case so that the child will remain in the juvenile system where services are available.

[44] See generally supra Chapter 2: Investigation; Chapter 5: Discovery.

Case Investigation:

Counsel has a duty to conduct a prompt and diligent independent case investigation regardless of the client's admissions or statements to defense counsel or others or of facts constituting guilt, or the client's stated desire to plead guilty.

Counsel should:

- ✓ View all evidence in the case, including visiting the scene(s) of the alleged offense(s), under circumstances similar to those existing at the time of the alleged incident (e.g., weather, time of day, and lighting conditions), and identify and hire experts if warranted
- ✓ Secure relevant information in the possession of the prosecution and law enforcement authorities, including: law enforcement notes (field notes); client, victim or witness records, such as school, mental health, drug and alcohol test results and criminal records, with appropriate releases and/or subpoenas; 911 tapes, inter-officer radio transmissions and dispatch reports; and civilian police officer complaints and internal affairs files, and other investigation records
- ✓ Interview potential witnesses
- ✓ Review client's records including educational, psychological, psychiatric, medical, substance abuse treatment, law enforcement, and court files; and execute necessary authorizations for releases of information

XVII. THE STATUS HEARING

The status date will be set at the initial hearing. Generally, status hearings will be scheduled within ten days of the initial hearing. Although practices vary, most judges will inquire as to the status of discovery. Some judges will set motion and opposition deadlines at the status hearing. The law clerk can advise counsel of the judge's practice. The judge generally will inquire of the government the anticipated length of a trial and set a date for the trial.

Counsel should inform the court at status whether or not discovery is complete. If the government is slow to turn over discoverable material in a timely manner, counsel will have a stronger argument for a motion to compel discovery, a motion to dismiss, or to have a continuance of the trial charged to the government if counsel raised the issues at status. Counsel should file discovery letters in the court jacket.

The government may offer a plea bargain that expires at status. In adult court, a quick plea often results in a substantial saving to the government in terms of time and effort spent in grand jury proceedings. In juvenile court, the government does not have similar considerations. Thus, the timing of the plea is generally of no consequence to the government. Counsel may not have had time to investigate the case thoroughly by the status date. Moreover, it takes several meetings with juvenile clients to establish a rapport and to advise them fully about their rights and trial proceedings. Children cannot process all of the issues involved in understanding the strength of the government's case and the rights they waive in a plea proceeding in one session with an attorney. Counsel should ask for more time for the client to consider the plea. Ultimately, and perhaps just as importantly, because social factors are so important in juvenile court, it is often of no consequence whether or not the child pleads with respect to the disposition. Counsel should avoid entering pleas in juvenile cases at the status hearing.

XVIII. TRIAL AND PLEA PROCEEDINGS

Trial preparation must be undertaken in every juvenile case. Counsel cannot provide effective advice to a client until counsel has completed the investigation, discovery, and motion practice necessary for an accurate and complete assessment of the client's chances of a successful defense. Counsel should refer to Trial Manual for Defense Attorneys in Juvenile Court, Randy Hertz, Martin Guggenheim, & Anthony G. Amsterdam (Philadelphia, PA: ALI-ABA, 2008), and Chapters 25-33, for in depth discussions relating to trial preparation and practice.

Notices are usually sent by the clerk's office to counsel and to the client before each scheduled hearing. Counsel should, however, meet with the youth in advance of the hearing to explain the nature of the proceeding. In addition, counsel should contact the youth the day before to remind the youth of the date, time, and place for the hearing. Counsel should take particular care to make sure they have on-going communication with their clients in shelter houses and detention, and inform them of all proceedings and dates.

Counsel should contact the calendar judge's law clerk to determine the judge's courtroom procedures. Cases set for trial are generally called in the morning to determine whether or not the parties are ready to proceed to trial. Motions to continue the trial must be requested two days in advance of the trial date. Super. Ct. Gen. Fam. R. G. If the motion is unopposed, defense counsel and the AAG should sign a continuance form. The forms are available in the juvenile clerks' office. Should a last-minute continuance be necessary, counsel should seek the government's consent before the case is called. The government is also obligated to request continuances in advance of trial, and counsel should be prepared to object to a late request if the grounds were or should have been known earlier.

If the government is not ready for trial, counsel should move for dismissal for want of prosecution. If the respondent is detained and the case is continued on government request or because no judge is available, counsel should ask that the level of detention be reconsidered.[45]

A judge who presided at a detention or shelter care hearing shall be recused from a fact-finding hearing on the same charge on objection by the child, parent, guardian, or custodian. D.C. Code § 16-2312(j).[46] Similarly, § 16-2307(g) provides for recusal of the judge who presided at a transfer hearing. The statute does not provide for disqualification of a judge who granted a consent decree or heard a pretrial motion, though a similar argument can be made based upon the judge's knowledge of social information. See supra Section IV.

[45] The length of detention is a primary factor the court should consider in a motion to reduce or reconsider the level of detention. Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253, 269 (1984). Conditions of detention are also important. Id. at 270.

[46] The Court of Appeals has interpreted § 16-2312(j) to permit a judge to try a juvenile in an assault case even though he had held a detention hearing on a different assault charge involving the same youth three weeks earlier, admonishing, however, that the "better course" would have been recusal. In re W.N.W., 343 A.2d 55, 58 (D.C. 1975).

The substantial differences between criminal and juvenile court sentencing possibilities affect considerations in determining whether the child should proceed to trial or consider a plea bargain.[47] First, unlike adult court where the possible penalty varies with the offense, the maximum sentence in juvenile court is potentially the same regardless of the charge – namely an indeterminate commitment until the child's 21st birthday. See D.C. Code §§ 16-2320, 2322. The sentence actually imposed is generally influenced more by the child's home environment, record and other social factors than by the adjudication itself. As a practical matter, then, it makes little difference, for example, whether in a burglary case the child is adjudicated guilty of second-degree burglary and theft I or pleads guilty to misdemeanor receiving stolen property. Counsel should carefully consider whether a plea to a lesser-included offense is beneficial.

Counsel must be familiar with, and apprise his or her client of, possible collateral consequences of a plea or adjudication at trial. The child's access to school placement options, future jobs, and military service may be limited as a result of involvement in a delinquency matter. If the child is found involved in a drug case, there may be an impact on her ability to obtain a driver's license. Moreover, juvenile adjudications can be used to increase adult sentencing guidelines. Counsel should also be aware of the future ramifications of being found involved in an offense involving a sexual assault. Counsel should contact a juvenile supervisor at PDS for more information about potential collateral consequences for specific offenses (202-628-1200).

Charging policies and the range of alternatives available in juvenile court are very different from their adult counterparts. Negotiations differ strikingly as a result. In adult court, the government will acknowledge the differences in criminal activities and sometimes exercise its discretion to bring charges according to the real seriousness of the offense. In juvenile court, because the same penalty applies to all charges brought, the Attorney General's Office rarely breaks down a charge. For example, the U.S. Attorney's Office will virtually never paper a case as "ADW shod foot" unless it involved stomping or serious injury; petitions in juvenile court routinely charge "ADW shod foot" based on allegations that the respondent was involved in a school-yard fight and, while wearing tennis shoes, kicked another teenager in the shins. Other assaults with relatively harmless objects, and involving no real injury, are routinely charged in criminal court as simple assault and possession of a prohibited weapon; the OAG routinely files ADW charges whether the weapon is a gun, a board, a stick, or a pencil. Even more serious charges such as robbery are sometimes broken down in criminal court based on the defendant's lack of any criminal record or relationship with the complainant; generally, the OAG will file the most serious charges available.

The charge filed at papering in a juvenile case thus sets the starting point for negotiations at a much different place. Because the charge is usually a felony rather than the misdemeanors that would be filed in adult court, the "ante" is automatically higher at the time of papering. Routine filing of felony charges against first offenders makes many children ineligible for a consent decree unless the prosecutor is willing to reduce the charge, forcing the respondent to plead guilty or go to trial.

[47] See supra Chapter 6 on plea-bargaining in criminal cases.

The rehabilitative goal of the juvenile system often means that the focus of plea-bargaining is not primarily on charge reduction, but instead on dispositional alternatives. To illustrate, a child who wants residential placement and is charged with armed robbery might be able to negotiate a plea to taking property without right because of potential weaknesses in the government's case. However, plea-bargaining should not end there. Counsel should attempt to secure an agreement that the government will not oppose residential placement in general or, if the child wishes, a short period of commitment, such as an indeterminate commitment not to exceed 2 years.

Even though respondents who plea bargain in juvenile court often end up with adjudications for much more serious offenses than their first-offender counterparts in the adult criminal system, important benefits may be gained through a plea that may make it preferable to a trial.[48] Other pending cases may be dismissed, thereby limiting for future reference the record of adjudications; the government may waive its rights to request detention pending disposition and to allocute at disposition, important concessions if there is a real risk of incarceration; the parties may bargain to have the case retained in juvenile court rather than referring it for prosecution in adult criminal court; the judge taking pleas may be more lenient than the possible trial judge;[49] the government may agree to limit its proffer as to what facts it would prove at trial; or the government may support a particular special placement, or at least agree not to oppose that placement.

On the other hand, pleading guilty to a felony charge in juvenile court may make a substantial difference in later adult cases because juvenile records may be considered in setting conditions of release and in sentencing in future adult cases. Counsel should review Chapter 35 regarding plea considerations in sex offense cases.

XIX. SOCIAL HISTORY

Counsel should discuss with the client and the client's parent as soon as possible after arrest the child's social history. Social factors are as important as the legal aspects of the case because the purported orientation of juvenile court is toward providing care and rehabilitation. With the client's permission, counsel may use various assessments to help determine any special needs.[50] The information may be helpful in finding appropriate services outside of the juvenile court system, in which case counsel should file a Motion to Dismiss for Social Reasons. See Super. Ct. Juv. R. 48(b). Also, psychiatric, psychological, and medical assessments or evaluations are relevant to the determination of whether a child is appropriate for placement in a residential program.

[48] The written plea form used in juvenile court provides a space for recording the charge to which the plea is entered. Counsel should also write on that form all other details of the plea agreement, such as the government's agreement to waive allocution, so that disputes will not later arise concerning the exact contours of the plea agreement.

[49] After a trial, the trial judge must retain the case for disposition. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 25(b). Under family court policy, the judge who accepts a guilty plea usually retains the case for disposition.

[50] There are numerous assessments that can be requested on behalf of a client. Although the findings of these assessments sometimes overlap, the testing and evaluation that leads to the findings are quite different from each other.

The timing of the scheduling of the requisite evaluations is a strategic decision that counsel should make on a case-by-case basis. While it is often important to begin as early as possible to request evaluations to avoid a delay if the case goes to the disposition stage, counsel should be aware that the results of some evaluations done through the court system will be made available to the court and other relevant parties. If evaluations are done pretrial, counsel must make sure the client does not discuss the pending allegations. Post-adjudication evaluations are often more meaningful because they can take into account the adjudicated offense. For this reason, counsel may want to delay a request for certain evaluations. Counsel for an indigent respondent can apply to the court ex parte for expert services to be compensated from funds allocated to the CJA program.

Counsel should request school records for all clients soon after picking up the case. Counsel can obtain records by sending a subpoena to DCPS, Office of General Counsel, 825 North Capital Street, N.E., 9th Floor, Washington, DC 20002, (202) 442-5000, fax (202) 442-4298. Counsel should try to copy or review a client's educational file at the school with a "release of records" form. A parent's signature is required if the student is under the age of eighteen. Special education and disciplinary records are usually kept separate from the student's cumulative file.

A. Special Education

The Individuals with Disabilities Education Improvement Act (IDEIA)[51] is designed to ensure that students with a qualifying disability are provided a free appropriate public education (FAPE). The IDEIA was reauthorized in 2004 and changes took effect on July 1, 2005. The reauthorized IDEIA can be found at 20 U.S.C. 1400 et. seq. Implementing federal regulations can be found at 34 C.F.R. Parts 300 and 303. District of Columbia regulations can be found at 5 D.C.M.R. Chapter 30.[52]

Students are eligible for special education from age three through the end of the semester in which the student turns age twenty-two.[53] The eligible disabilities are mental retardation, hearing impairments, speech or language impairments, visual impairments, emotional disturbance, orthopedic impairments, autism, traumatic brain injury, other health impairments, specific learning disabilities, deaf-blindness, or multiple disabilities.[54]

There are a variety of school placement options in the District of Columbia including public schools and charter schools. In the District of Columbia, every student has the right to attend his or her District of Columbia Public Schools (DCPS) neighborhood school, which is assigned based on his or her address. The Office of Special Education is responsible for all special education services for students attending District of Columbia public schools. For more information about special education at DCPS, counsel can contact the Office of Special Education at (202) 442-4800.

[51] 20 U.S.C. § 1400 et. seq.

[52] Under the IDEIA, the right to receive special education services is a right of the parent, not the child. Therefore, counsel who represents the child in a juvenile matter and is pursuing special education services for the child at the same time must be wary of potential conflicts between what the parent and child want. Counsel may want to consider asking the court to appoint a special education attorney.

[53] 20 U.S.C. § 1412(a)(1)(A), 34 C.F.R. § 300.101(a), 5 D.C.M.R. § 3002.1(b).

There are over fifty charter schools in the District of Columbia. A list of charter schools can be found at www.dcpubliccharter.com. Contact the school directly for application procedures. All charter schools are required to designate whether they elect to be their own Local Education Agency or DCPS Charters for special education purposes. By electing to be its own LEA Charter, the charter school assumes full legal responsibility for providing special education services as required by the IDEIA. Thus, for questions concerning special education at an LEA Charter, counsel should contact the individual charter school directly. If a charter school elects to be a DCPS charter, DCPS retains full legal responsibility for providing all special education related services to students at the charter schools. In this situation, counsel should contact DCPS Office of Special Education. Counsel may check with the charter school's principal or special education coordinator to determine if a charter school is its own LEA or is a DCPS charter.

The following are signs that a child may need to be referred for special education: difficulty with reading or understanding; poor grades or standardized tests scores; repeated retentions; severe behavioral problems at school; repeated suspensions or expulsion; poor coordination or motor control; and delayed or impaired speech. To start the special education process, the parent or guardian should send a written request for evaluations to the principal and special education coordinator at the school which the child is attending.[55] The request should include the reasons why the parent or guardian suspects the child has a disability that requires special education and related services. The parent or guardian must sign a consent form before the evaluation process can begin.[56]

Once a referral is made and before conducting evaluations, the school must hold a Multidisciplinary Team Meeting (MDT)[57] to review current and existing data about the child such as evaluations, assessments and observations and then develop a Student Evaluation Plan detailing the reasons for the referral and the evaluations to be conducted.

DC law requires the evaluations to be conducted within one hundred twenty days from the date the student was referred for an evaluation.[58] To expedite this process, counsel can request that the court order a psychological, neuropsychological or psychiatric evaluation from Youth Forensic Services and the Child Guidance Clinic. Counsel should ensure that requesting these evaluations is consistent with counsel's case strategy, and counsel should be mindful of the possible impact of these evaluations on the juvenile case. Before providing a copy of court-ordered or other outside evaluations to the school, counsel should redact any confidential, non-education-related information.

[56] 20 U.S.C. §§ 1414(a) – 1414(c), 34 C.F.R. §§ 300.301-300.306, 5 D.C.M.R. § 3005.

[57] Members of the Multidisciplinary Team include the parents, teachers and qualified individuals who can interpret the results of the testing.

[58] D.C. Code § 38-2561.02.

Once the evaluations have been completed, the school district must convene a MDT meeting to review the tests and determine if the child has a disability that qualifies him or her for special education services.[59] If the child is found eligible, the team will determine the disability classification, discuss the necessary special education instruction and services the student requires and develop an Individualized Educational Program (IEP).[60]

After the initial IEP is developed, a team made up of parents, teachers and a DCPS representative knowledgeable about placement options must decide where the child will receive the services outlined in the IEP. The school placement must be the least restrictive environment that can serve the child's needs.[61]

Many of our juvenile clients will have been found eligible for special education before entering the delinquency system. The school system must evaluate these children at least once every three years and must update their IEPs at least annually.[62]

Children with disabilities who are detained either at Youth Services Center or New Beginnings Youth Development Center should still be receiving special education services while detained. Youth Services Center has a school run by District of Columbia Public Schools. The Maya Angelou Academy at New Beginnings, the school at New Beginnings, has been run by See Forever Foundations since 2007. The schools at Youth Services Center and at New Beginnings are responsible for evaluating children, convening MDT/IEP meetings and providing special education services to all eligible students at the facility. If counsel has questions regarding the school at Youth Services Center, counsel should call (202) 576-9073. To contact the Maya Angelou Academy at New Beginnings, counsel can call (202) 299-3227.

Many of the children in the delinquency system also deal with disciplinary issues while in the community. Often times the incident that leads to a suspension or expulsion from school also results in a delinquency charge. Counsel should make every attempt to attend disciplinary hearings, as they provide a good opportunity to obtain discovery. Counsel should also ensure that their clients are aware that disciplinary hearings are recorded, and thus clients should not say anything that can be used against them in another proceeding. The disciplinary regulations were updated in 2009 and can be found at 5 D.C.M.R. Chapter 25.

Special education students are entitled to further protections from disciplinary actions, including the right to a manifestation determination review after being suspended for more than ten days in a school year and the right to have expedited evaluations conducted during the period in which a child is subjected to disciplinary measures[63].

XX. DUAL STATUS CHILDREN: NEGLECT AND DELINQUENCY

Many allegedly delinquent children are eligible to receive services as neglected children. If the need for a neglect investigation is indicated, and the client agrees, counsel can notify DHS Child and Family Services. Factors suggesting such a need include: (1) the child is 12 or younger; (2) the parents failed to take custody of the child after arrest, were unavailable, or failed to appear for an intake interview; (3) a troublesome home and social situation, indicated by a history of truancy, parental problems, or physical condition of the home; or (4) a history of family involvement with the delinquency or neglect system. Referrals are made based on the investigation report.

If the client has been adjudicated neglected, counsel should contact the GAL and social worker to ascertain whether the child needs the additional supervision and services of the delinquency system, and, if not, move to dismiss for social reasons. See Super. Ct. Juv. R. 48. It may be important to keep the neglect case open – even if the child is adjudicated delinquent – to allow continuation of services not available in the delinquency system, such as an independent living program. A delinquency adjudication may result in "expulsion" from the neglect system. Moreover, if the neglect case is closed, the delinquent will not have a viable home situation to transition to upon termination of the delinquency matter. While there are a number of independent living programs for neglected youth, only a limited number of programs take children with delinquency charges.

Counsel has an obligation to attend all neglect proceedings if her client is in the neglect system and the hearing will discuss matters relevant to the delinquency proceeding. Counsel must protect her client's 5th and 6th Amendment Rights and advocate for the client in the neglect proceeding in a manner than will further the client's objectives in the delinquency case. As noted earlier in Section III, counsel is allowed to be present at all Family Court proceedings. See In Re Ti.B., 762 A.2d 20 (D.C. 2000)

XXI. THE DISPOSITION HEARING

Disposition is the term used in juvenile court for the sentencing proceeding. The date for the disposition hearing will be set after the child enters a plea or is found involved at the conclusion of his or her fact-finding hearing (trial). [64] The judge who accepted the plea or who finds the child involved during the fact finding phase will preside over the disposition hearing and all post-disposition matters.

[64] The disposition hearing may be held immediately if all parties consent and waive the preparation of a predisposition report. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 32. This consent of the parties is sometimes included as part of a plea agreement.

Social Factors:

- ✓ Counsel has an independent duty to investigate the client's circumstances, including such factors as previous history, family background and economic condition, and any other information relevant to disposition
- ✓ If helpful or necessary, counsel should seek to secure the assistance of psychiatric, psychological, medical or other expert personnel to evaluate, consult, or testify to aid the client at disposition

Super. Ct. Juv. R. 32 requires the court to schedule a disposition hearing within 15 days for a child detained at YSC or in a shelter house. However, in In re J.B., 906 A.2d 866 (D.C. 2006), the court held that a disposition hearing of a detained juvenile can be continued beyond the 15 day period prescribed by the S. Ct. Juv. R. 32 to allow Court Social Services to prepare a disposition report. The court held that the language in Rule 32(a) which states that the court shall schedule a disposition hearing within 15 days of adjudication for a detained child is directory, not mandatory. However, the court noted that, "none of this is to say that the trial court may continue indefinitely the predisposition confinement of a juvenile to await the preparation of a predisposition report. Rule 32(a) serves as an important injunction to the court and the Director [Court Social Services] to avoid prolonged detention of juveniles pending disposition, especially when the end result may be a determination by the court that confinement for the offense-rather than probation- is unnecessary." Id. at 868.

The dispositional hearing is a hearing, after a finding of fact, to determine "whether the child in a delinquency or need of supervision case is in need of care or rehabilitation and, if so, what order of disposition should be made." D.C. Code § 16-2301(17)(A). The judge is required to terminate the proceedings and discharge the child from detention if the court finds that the child is not in need of care and rehabilitation. D.C. Code § 16-2317.[65] Moreover, the Family Court has authority under Super. Ct. Juv. R. 48(b) to dismiss a delinquency petition at a dispositional hearing if the court finds by clear and convincing evidence that a child who committed a delinquent act is nonetheless not in need of care and rehabilitation. The dispositional hearing is not intended to result in the imposition of any penal sanction on the child. Rather, the purpose is "to determine the treatment required to rehabilitate him." In re C.W.M., 407 A.2d 617, 622 (D.C. 1979).[66]

The court's dispositional authority is set forth in D.C. Code § 16-2320. The court can permit the child to remain with a parent or guardian or other custodian subject to conditions and limitations prescribed by the court including outpatient medical or psychiatric treatment; place the child [65] "There shall be a rebuttable presumption that a finding of the commission of an act which would constitute a criminal offense if committed by an adult is sufficient to sustain a finding of need for care or rehabilitation in delinquency and need of supervision cases." D.C. Code § 16-2317(c)(2).

[66] In re L..J., 546 A.2d 429 (D.C. 1988) (while reaffirming that the District of Columbia is committed to a rehabilitative approach to juvenile justice, said that the protection of society is also a legitimate concern of the dispositional judge).

under protective supervision; transfer legal custody to a child placing agency . . . or relative or other individual qualified to receive and care for the child . . . ; commit the child for medical, psychiatric, or other treatment at an appropriate facility on an inpatient basis if confinement is necessary to the treatment of the child;[67] or terminate the parent child relationship for the purpose of seeking an adoptive placement for the child pursuant to Chapter III of Title 16. § 16-2320(c)(1).[68] The court can place the child on probation with conditions and limitations. § 16-2320(c)(3). The court can transfer legal custody of the child to a public agency for the care of delinquent children. Id. § 16-2320(c)(2).[69]

It is important to note that the authority of the court to order specific placements and services in delinquency cases is much narrower than in neglect cases. In 2003, the Court of Appeals curtailed longstanding practice by ruling that family court judges do not have the statutory authority to direct the placement or treatment of juveniles who have been committed to the legal custody of a public agency pursuant to § 16-2320(c)(2). In re P.S., 821 A.2d 905 (D.C. 2003). Although the holding in P.S. is still accurate at the disposition phase of a delinquency case, the Omnibus Juvenile Justice Act of 2004 created the power to modify a commitment to DYRS after a finding that the child is not receiving the appropriate services or level of care. D.C. Code § 16-2323. This finding may be made only on the motion of the child or the child's parent or guardian, and such motion may be made only once every six months. Id. The same statute provides the only mechanism by which a judge may terminate a case prior to the expiration of the commitment without the consent of DYRS. See In re K.A., 879 A.2d 1 (D.C. 2005).

A dispositional order of probation shall remain in force for a period not exceeding one year from the date entered. D.C. Code § 16-2322(a)(3). The Director of Social Services of the agency providing supervision may terminate the supervision at any time that it appears the purpose of the order has been achieved. Id.

"[A] dispositional order vesting legal custody of a child adjudicated delinquent or in need of supervision in a department, agency, or institution shall remain in force for an indeterminate period not to exceed the youth's twenty-first birthday." D.C. Code § 16-2322(a)(4). This statute prescribes the maximum period of commitment. Judges often impose indeterminate sentences of up to one year or up to two years.[70] Counsel must argue vigorously against the imposition of an indeterminate commitment not to exceed the youth's 21st birthday. Despite the theory of juvenile court as a rehabilitative process, the reality of the delinquency system is that it is punitive and children rarely receive appropriate, individualized treatment plans that would enable their early release from their commitment. See the court monitor reports in Jerry M. and the [67] See infra Section XXIII E. Residential Placements.

[68] The court is authorized to enter any disposition authorized by § 16-2320(a) (dispositional alternatives for neglected children) other than paragraphs (3)(A) and (5) of that subsection.

[69] See D.C. Code § 16-2321 for the disposition of a child who is mentally ill or substantially retarded.

[70] Before the 1993 amendments to Title 16, the maximum period of commitment was an indeterminate period not to exceed two years that could be extended yearly. After the 1993 amendment, judges continued to impose the typical one or two year indeterminate commitments. There is no mandate that commitments must last until the youth's 21st birthday and counsel should argue for a shorter period of commitment whenever possible. See In re C.L.M., 766 A.2d 992 (D.C. 2001). The court has no authority to extend a commitment.

consensus report on the Jerry M. panel recommending the closing of Oak Hill Youth Center; see also A Call to Justice, American Bar Association (1995).

Unless the commitment order sets a minimum period for commitment of the child, or specifies that release is permitted only by order of the Division, the department, agency, or institution may release the child at any time that it appears the dispositional order has been achieved. D.C. Code § 16-2322(a)(3).

Counsel Must Explain the Following to the Client:

- ✓ The nature of the disposition hearing and outcome
- ✓ The issues involved
- ✓ The alternatives available to the court
- ✓ The nature, obligations and consequences of any proposed disposition plan
- ✓ The meaning of conditions of probation
- ✓ The characteristics of any institution to which commitment is possible
- ✓ The probable duration of the client's responsibilities under the proposed disposition plan

If appeal from the decree is contemplated, the client should be advised of that possibility, but the attorney must counsel compliance with the court's decision during the interim.

Counsel's obligation to represent the client continues until the end of the probation period or the commitment order whether or not the court placed a restriction on the commitment. Counsel must continue to be an advocate for the child with the probation department or, if the child is committed, the DYRS case manager and treatment team at the institution.

The court retains jurisdiction over a child on probation. If the child violates the terms of probation, the OAG may file a petition to revoke probation. The court will notify counsel and schedule a probation revocation hearing. If the child is found by the court to have violated probation, the court may extend the period of probation, modify the terms and conditions of the probation order, or enter any other disposition specified in D.C. Code § 16-2320 for a delinquent child. See D.C. Code § 16-2327; Super. Ct. Juv. R. 32(h). By placing a child on probation, the court maintains control over the case and keeps open the option of being able to change the treatment program. A court could specify a treatment program as a condition of probation. If the child desires to participate in a treatment program as a condition of probation, counsel must work to secure a funding source outside the court system, such as DCPS, health insurance, or a scholarship. Probation has some purchase of services money for specific programs designated by the court such as family counseling or tutoring.

Upon commitment, the appropriate treatment plan is determined by DYRS. See In re J.M.W., 411 A.2d 345 (D.C. 1980). If a child is placed on aftercare and supervised in the community, aftercare can be revoked and the child returned to the institution by a decision of a hearing officer after an administrative hearing. The statutory authority to file a motion with the court after applying to the institution for a change in the commitment was dropped in the 1993 amendment to the Family Division Statute.[71]

Counsel's representation of the juvenile at the disposition phase can determine the course of the child's life during critical stages in the child's development. Counsel must thoroughly understand the commitment process and how DYRS interprets commitment orders. Counsel must review the disposition order carefully immediately following the hearing and make sure to follow the progress of the child closely.

At the conclusion of the fact-finding hearing if the client is found involved, or after entering a plea, the court will determine whether to detain the child pending disposition. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 106 explicitly applies to the detention decision at this phase of the proceedings.

One of the things the court must consider at the disposition phase of the case is any victim impact statement offered by the victim(s) or eyewitnesses, either personally or through the AAG. D.C. Code § 16-2340(b). Counsel should be given advance notice of such victim impact statements as part of the predisposition investigation. See In re M.N.T., 776 A.2d 1201 (D.C. 2001).

A. Social Study

After adjudication, the child and family members will be required to meet with CSS probation staff prior to the disposition hearing. If the child is detained, the CSS staff will go to YSC interview the child. If the child is on probation or under commitment, the probation officer or DYRS case manager may prepare the report for the disposition. CSS will prepare a disposition report for the court called a social study. The social study report shall contain the child's prior record and such information about the child's "characteristics, family, environment and the circumstances affecting the respondent's behavior as may be helpful in determining the need for treatment and a proper disposition of the case." Super. Ct. Juv. R. 32(b)(2). The report will also include the results of physical or mental examinations if ordered by the court pursuant to D.C. Code § 16-2315. Counsel should provide the probation officer with pertinent social information and remain in contact with the worker throughout the diagnostic process.

Counsel must explain the diagnostic process to the child and his or her family. The child will be asked about the offense. The child should be advised to be as candid with the report writer as he or she was with the judge who accepted the plea. If the child was found involved in a fact-finding proceeding, counsel must call the diagnostic worker and advise the probation officer that the child will be asserting his or her Fifth Amendment privilege and will not discuss the case due to the possibility of a retrial after an appeal.

The social study and any other materials to be disclosed at disposition "shall be furnished to the judicial officer and copies thereof shall be furnished to counsel for the respondent and to the Corporation Counsel at least three business days prior to the dispositional hearing." Super. Ct. Juv. R. 32(a)(2). Counsel must obtain a copy of the report from the judge's chambers, review the report with his or her client, and submit a letter to the court in advance of the hearing addressing any inaccuracies in the report and setting forth a proposed treatment plan. Counsel must also review the child's social file in preparation for the disposition.[72]

At the disposition hearing, before entering a dispositional order, the judicial officer shall afford the respondent or the respondent's counsel an opportunity to comment on the predisposition report (social study) and, in the court's discretion, to introduce testimony or other information relating to any alleged factual inaccuracy in the report. The judicial officer shall afford counsel an opportunity to speak on behalf of the respondent, address the respondent personally, and permit the respondent's parents, guardian, or custodian to make a statement on the child's behalf or present any relevant information to the court. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 32(c)(1). The judge is not bound by the recommendation of the social study. Counsel may submit a proposed order to the court to sign. If the court adds language to the form disposition order, counsel must ensure that DYRS and the institution receive a legible copy of the order.

XXII. PROBATION

The court may impose probation for a period of up to one year. D.C. Code § 16-2320(c)(3). Special conditions may include a curfew, school attendance, participation in a vocational training program, psychological counseling, community service, and employment. If probation is ordered, the probation officer who was assigned to the case pretrial, and who completed the social study, will supervise the youth while on probation.

The Superior Court Social Services Division, which provides probation supervision, oversees a "purchase of services" program to provide diagnostic and treatment services. Participants must be residents or wards of D.C., under court supervision for long enough to receive the services, and able to benefit. Diagnostic services include educational assessments and psychiatric and medical evaluations. Treatment services include tutoring, school advocacy, and support; job readiness, placement, and outreach; limited in-home services; short-term psychiatric and psychological intervention; self-esteem building; parent support; and family counseling. Services should be discussed with the probation officer after adjudication but before disposition. However, funds are often in short supply.

A. Revocation of Probation

Super. Ct. Juv. R. 32(h) controls the procedure to be followed in revoking probation. If the respondent is rearrested or allegedly commits a technical violation, the Family Division's Director of Social Services may try to resolve the problem informally or refer it to the OAG for action. To initiate revocation, the Attorney General must file a petition setting forth the alleged violations. See In re W.A.G., 104 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 591 (D.C. Super. Ct. April 6, 1976). The judge will schedule a hearing and send notices to the respondent and attorney. The standard of proof is preponderant evidence for technical violations and proof beyond a reasonable doubt for a new offense. Super. Ct. Juv. R. 32(h)(1). Generally a probation revocation hearing will trail [72] The social file will contain all social information gathered on the child since the child first entered the system. Check with the probation officer for the location of the file pending disposition.

the rearrest matter. Other than the standard of proof, the procedures set forth in United States v. Peters, Crim. No. 9956 (D.C. Super. Ct. Dec. 12, 1975) (Greene, J.), apply to juvenile revocation proceedings. See In re A.W., 353 A.2d 686 (D.C. 1976). No child can be detained prior to filing the revocation petition.

XXIII. COMMITMENT TO THE DEPARTMENT OF YOUTH REHABILITATION SERVICES (DYRS)

At the time a child is committed to DYRS, a case manager is assigned. The case manager is responsible for case management during placement of the child, including devising and implementing a treatment plan for the child as well as a release plan for aftercare. Case managers are assigned according to the level of treatment a child requires (e.g., residential, group home, etc.). This case manager has a profound effect on the nature and duration of the services the child will receive, and counsel should make every effort to stay in contact with the case manager, as well as with the child's parents and the child. If the child feels that he is not receiving appropriate services though his commitment, counsel should file a motion to modify the commitment under § 16-2323, keeping in mind that a judge in ruling on such a motion might order a more restrictive level of placement or a more intensive plan of services. The level of placements offered by DYRS changes fairly frequently, but can include some of the options below.

A. Foster Care

The waiting list may be long and placement may not occur for many months. Counsel should therefore try to place the client in an interim living arrangement, perhaps with a relative. DYRS may be able to designate a child's residence as an "abridged foster home," qualifying it for financial assistance. If a client might benefit from foster care, counsel should contact the probation officer and DYRS case manager. Counsel with PINS clients should also contact PDS ORD to determine the availability of other services for PINS children.

B. Group Homes

DYRS operates and contracts for group homes for adjudicated youth. The homes are located in various communities in the District of Columbia. The group homes generally house 8-10 children and are staffed 24 hours a day. Each group home provides counseling and organized recreational activities, and the children are required to attend school in the community, obtain employment, or be involved in job training or other programs. Specific services vary.

C. New Beginnings Youth Development Center

Committed children who are incarcerated are sent to New Beginnings Youth Development Center. New Beginnings is located twenty-five miles outside the District in Laurel, Maryland.[73]

[73] To reach New Beginnings, take the Baltimore-Washington Parkway north to Route 198 East, Fort Meade. Follow 198 East for approximately one half mile. At the first intersection on the left, marked by a green sign for New Beginnings, turn left.

Attorneys may visit or call their clients at the institution routinely from 7 a.m. to 9 p.m., seven days a week. See Jerry M., C.A. No. 1519-85, § IX(E). If there is a legal emergency, counsel may visit or call at any time. Id. Counsel can call control at (202) 299-3200 to verify that the child is at the institution before visiting. To speak with the child on the telephone, counsel must have the child's Xref number from the court order.[74] Although the official policy is to the contrary, children are not always able to call their attorneys upon request. Counsel should call their clients regularly while they are incarcerated. When visiting youth, counsel must insist on a private office to interview his or her client. Counsel should talk to the superintendent if counsel is not afforded a place to have a confidential conversation with the client.[75]

Family members may visit the children on weekends.[76] Youth should be permitted to receive visits and make telephone calls to parents, guardians, primary caretakers, siblings, children, and co-parents of offspring. See Jerry M., § IX(D). The child should get two ten-minute phone calls per week to call family members. Id. The child's unit manager can add other names to the list at his or her discretion.

Children who are committed to DYRS are usually sent to New Beginnings while a treatment plan is developed for the child. If counsel suspects a child will be committed at a dispositional hearing, counsel should contact DYRS in advance of that hearing to begin the placement planning process.

D. Girls

Girls who are committed are usually placed faster than boys. There is no secure DYRS facility for committed girls; pre-trial girls are detained at the Youth Services Center on Mt. Olivet Road.

E. Residential Placement

A residential placement is a facility that provides twenty-four hour care for children. There are one or two twenty-four hour facilities in the District, but they typically do not take delinquent children and there are long wait lists. The District of Columbia school system is obligated to place children in residential care if their IEP requires such placement. The school system places children with learning disabilities and severe emotional problems.

Residential placements range from psychiatric hospitals to boarding-school-type behavior modification programs. The family court judge may not order a specific level of treatment program at the time of the initial disposition, though some judges will make an unenforceable "recommendation" at the time of commitment. Once a child is committed, if DYRS believes [74] Counsel can call social services to get the child's general schedule for the best time to visit or call. Attorneys should have no problem visiting during school hours, but it is better to call after school hours when the children are in the units. There is generally no movement between 2:30 p.m. and 3:30 p.m. because of shift change. Counsel should not visit at that time.

[75] Call the court monitor for the Jerry M. case if you have difficulty gaining access to your client on the phone or in person.

[76] The child's family can call control at New Beginnings for visiting times and policies at (202) 299-3200.

residential treatment is warranted, a caseworker will send application packets to several residential facilities. If the child is accepted, the interstate process will begin. Counsel can speed up this process significantly by determining what type of health insurance the child has (different programs accept different insurance) and by applying directly to programs without waiting for DYRS to act.

Residential placement should be the last alternative to incarceration at New Beginnings. Although it may offer a child with severe educational disabilities an appropriate school placement, many children become lost in the system when they are sent away and spend years at a facility. A Jerry M. expert panel found that, for the most part, the residential facilities utilized by the District did not provide the services they advertised.[77] The institutions have a financial incentive to keep children as long as possible. The District has little ability to oversee the children and DYRS workers have no incentive to bring children back and add more work to their already overloaded client list.

Once a child is placed at a facility, counsel should contact the facility and obtain the number of the child's social worker or therapist to provide information about the child, request that counsel be provided with monthly reports, monitor the child's progress, and ensure that the child has a mechanism to contact his or her attorney.[78]

F. Community Placement after Commitment

Community Release, formerly known as aftercare, refers to the status of a child whom DYRS has released to the community before expiration of the commitment. See 29 DCMR Chapter 1200, et seq. At the time of release, the caseworker and the child enter into a contract, which both sign. Counsel should make sure that the client understands his or her responsibilities. If the program is not feasible, counsel should advocate with the worker for modification.

Authority for revocation of a Community Release Agreement lies with DYRS, not with the court. See In re J.M.W., 411 A.2d at 348. Community status review procedures are set out in the DCMR. The case manager initiates revocation. After notice to the respondent, the parents or guardian, and counsel, an administrative hearing is held. The child is entitled to be represented by counsel. The child may present a defense, but DYRS will not assist in securing attendance of witnesses for the child. DYRS rules require that the case manager be present at the hearing unless emergency prevents it.

J.M.W. likened the status of a child in Community Release status to that of an adult on parole. Counsel should look to the cases relating to parole revocation to determine what protections are necessary for revocation and the return of the child to a secure facility. See, e.g., Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471 (1972) (due process requires written notice of claimed violations, [77] Several facilities advertise 24-hour therapeutic intervention but provide only twice weekly contact with a therapist and minimal contact with a psychiatrist.

[78] See In re D.W.G., 115 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 2097 (D.C. Super. Ct. Oct. 5, 1987) (von Kann, J.), finding the Brown School in Austin, Texas, to be "grossly incompetent, abusive, and life threatening" after a 17-year-old youth was injected with an antipsychotic drug when he refused to put on his pajamas, and then received daily dosages of other powerful drugs not to treat him "but rather to control him and to make him compliant."

disclosure of evidence against parolee, right to present witnesses and to cross-examine adverse witnesses, a neutral and detached hearing body, and a written statement by the fact-finder as to evidence relied on and reasons for revoking parole).

Counsel should request that the revocation hearing is transcribed and that any objections to the procedures are made on the record. If the child's placement in the community is changed, counsel may challenge the legality of incarceration through an administrative appeal or a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in Superior Court.

The only control a judge has over a child committed to DYRS (unless a motion has been filed pursuant to § 16-2323) is to retain a "restriction" on the commitment that operates as a veto over DYRS' decision to terminate the case prior to the end of the commitment period (and thereby close the case). In most cases, counsel should work to lift the restriction (or argue against it at the time of disposition). In some cases, however, the child may desire the housing or other services provided by the commitment and, therefore, desire the restriction, ensuring that DYRS will not divest itself of responsibility for the child without a judge's approval.

G. APPEAL

Counsel shall consider and discuss with the client the right to appeal and whether an appeal has merit. When discussing the possibility of an appeal, counsel should explain both positive and negative effects. Counsel should also discuss whether he or she will represent the client in an appeal or whether another attorney will be appointed.

If the client decides to appeal, trial counsel must file any necessary post-hearing motions and the notice of appeal, and he or she must order the transcript. If trial counsel does not serve as appellate counsel, he or she must transmit all documents relevant to the appeal to appellate counsel.

Trial counsel must protect his or her client's interests by responding in a thorough and timely manner to any post-trial motions, notice of appeal, and order for transcript filed by any adverse party. This obligation remains in effect until appellate counsel has been appointed for his or her client.

XXIV. THE JUVENILE SERVICES PROGRAM (JSP)

The Public Defender Service, pursuant to a mandate by City Council, created the Juvenile Services Program (JSP) to provide legal services to the District's incarcerated children. JSP has offices downtown and at YSC and New Beginnings. The program supervisor recruits and trains law students who work directly with the children. JSP activities include representing children at institutional disciplinary hearings, facilitating communication between attorneys and the children and providing assistance to attorneys with motions for release and to lift restrictions. Law clerks also provide orientation session for residents regarding their legal rights within the institution, the disciplinary rules, and the grievance process.

If counsel has concerns or questions regarding a client's safety, ability to access counsel, or other issues regarding the youth's confinement at the facility, counsel should contact JSP at the main PDS phone number (202) 628-1200.

XXV. JERRY M. v. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

In 1985, PDS and the ACLU National Prison Project filed a class action suit in Superior Court against the District of Columbia on behalf of children incarcerated in juvenile detention facilities, alleging that the facilities lacked appropriate education, special education, vocational training, medical, psychological, and psychiatric services, and that the number, quality, and training of staff was inadequate. Jerry M. v. District of Columbia, C.A. No. 1519-85. In 1986, the parties agreed to a settlement of all the issues. The Jerry M. consent decree governs virtually every area of operation of the YSA facilities, including population and overcrowding, safety of the youth, education, mental health and medical services, the environmental conditions of all of the facilities, and staffing, and is enforced by a Special Arbiter who reports to the court on the District's compliance. Counsel should become familiar with the services that DYRS institutions are required to provide pursuant to the Jerry M. consent decree and related workplans, as the institution's failure to provide the required services can become the basis for motions for release or alternative placements.

XXVI. SEALING OF RECORDS

Under D.C. Code § 16-2335, juvenile court and social records may be sealed if two years have passed since final discharge from custody or supervision and the child has not been subsequently convicted or adjudicated as a PINS or delinquent. The burden is on the child to file a motion to seal records. Super. Ct. Gen. Fam. R. P. Disposition orders include a notice to the child of eligibility to seal the record; notice should also be received when the child is discharged from supervision, treatment, or custody.

Two years after final discharge, counsel should submit the child's name, social file number, and jacket number(s) to the Juvenile Clerk's Office. If a search of Family Division and criminal records indicates eligibility, the Division will prepare the form and mail copies to the Attorney General, the authority that was responsible for supervision, the law enforcement agency having custody of the files and records as specified in § 16-2333, and the child's parents or legal guardians. These parties have 45 days to contest the motion. An Order Sealing Records will be entered if no opposition is received; if there is opposition, a Family Division judge will rule on the motion.

Once a record is sealed, the facts relating to the arrest and adjudication will no longer exist as a matter of law. Thus, anyone making further inquiry regarding the case will be informed that the case does not exist. However, the records will be unsealed if the child is subsequently adjudicated delinquent, in need of supervision, or is convicted of a felony. D.C. Code § 16-2335(e); Super. Ct. Gen. Fam. R. P(g). The Attorney General must file a Motion to Unseal, with copies to counsel, the child's parents or guardian, the law enforcement agency, and the authority granting the discharge, subject to the same rules for oppositions as the Motion to Seal.

CHAPTER 15

REPRESENTING PERSONS SUBJECT TO CIVIL COMMITMENT PROCEEDINGS

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Overview of the Civil Commitment Process

Civil commitment of persons in the District of Columbia is governed by the Hospitalization of the Mentally Ill Act, codified at D.C. Code §§ 21-501 to 592 (also known as the Ervin Act in honor of former United States Senator Sam Ervin). Approximately 1,300 Ervin Act cases are filed each year. Jurisdiction is vested exclusively in the Family Court of the District of Columbia Superior Court. Practice before the court and its Mental Health Commission is regulated by the Superior Court Mental Health Rules and certain enumerated Superior Court Rules of Civil Procedure that have been incorporated by reference in the Mental Health Rules. See Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 12(d). The Mental Health Commission is a specially-created panel consisting of a magistrate judge of the court, who is the chairperson for the Commission, and eight qualified psychologists and psychiatrists who sit on the Commission in alternating pairs. D.C. Code § 21-502.

Four Stages for Commitment: The Ervin Act includes provisions to protect an individual's right to voluntary mental health treatment, as well as procedures for involuntary detention and mental health commitment. The processes for detention and mental health commitment set forth in the Ervin Act have four main stages. The first stage arises only if the respondent is detained at the commencement of the case. In that circumstance, he or she is entitled to a prompt hearing in Superior Court under § 21-525 to test the legality of the detention. This stage is discussed in section IV.D. The second stage consists of a hearing before the Mental Health Commission pursuant to §§ 21-542 and 21-544. See infra Section V. This hearing will result either in the dismissal of the petition for commitment or in a recommendation by the Commission for some form of commitment. If a petition is dismissed, the respondent is entitled to immediate release if he or she is being detained at the hospital. This stage is also discussed in section V.E.

The third stage is the review of the Commission's report pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-545, which permits the respondent to contest a recommendation of commitment by means of a court review or a de novo trial by judge or jury. This stage is discussed in section VI. The last stage is the disposition hearing. See infra Section VI. Commitment pursuant to § 21-545 is for a one-year period, which may be renewed pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-545.01 after a hearing before the Mental Health Commission. See infra Section VIII. The Ervin Act also includes sections that describe rights of respondents during the term of the commitment order. See infra Section VII.

Throughout these proceedings, the Act requires the court to ensure that a respondent has counsel. D.C. Code § 21-543 (2004). If the respondent is indigent, the court is authorized under the Criminal Justice Act, §§ 11-2601 to 2609, to appoint counsel. If a non-indigent respondent refuses or is unable to retain counsel, the court shall appoint counsel. See § 21-543 (2004).

B. Available Practice Materials

There are many treatises, journals, and web sites that provide information useful to representing individuals in civil commitment proceedings. For information on psychiatric diagnoses, counsel might want to refer to the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM) IV (IV-TR), American Psychiatric Press Textbook of Neuropsychiatry (Yudofsky & Hales), Comprehensive Textbook of Psychiatry (Kaplan & Sadock), and www.medscape.com. For information on medications, counsel might want to look at the Physician's Desk Reference (PDR), "The Medical Letter," American Psychiatric Press Textbook of Psychopharmacology, and www.medscape.com/ druginfo. In addition, counsel might find useful Coping with Psychiatric and Psychological Testimony by Faust & Ziskin (Law and Psychology Press) and Psychological Evaluations for the Courts by Petrila et al. (Guilford Press). The Mental Health Division (MHD) of the Public Defender Service (202-824-2860) maintains pleadings, files, and copies of Superior Court cases. In addition, MHD has a duty day attorney available to answer questions.

3. Voluntary Treatment

Persons seeking psychiatric treatment at a hospital may do so on a voluntary basis. See D.C. Code § 21-511. Any person 18 years of age or older who requests care shall be admitted to a public hospital as a voluntary patient if an examination by a staff psychiatrist or psychologist reveals a need for hospital treatment; a private hospital may refuse to admit such a person even if hospital treatment is indicated. Id. A person seeking voluntary treatment may not be admitted to the hospital as an emergency involuntary patient. In re Blair, 510 A.2d 1048 (D.C. 1986).[1]

Patients admitted involuntarily under § 21-522 can be – and often are – converted to voluntary status when the hospital doctor makes a judgment that they are not dangerous and can be responsible for their own treatment needs. Individuals who are converted to a voluntary status after initial detention have the same rights as individuals who are initially admitted in a voluntary status.

A voluntary psychiatric patient may terminate the hospitalization on his or her own request. D.C. Code § 21-512(a). Under the Ervin Act, a voluntary patient's right to leave is absolute. Although a voluntary patient may be held for up to 48 hours after making a written request for discharge, the hospital may not initiate involuntary proceedings to detain the patient. See id.; In re Blair, 510 A.2d 1048 (D.C. 1986); In re Robinson,101 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 1501 (D.C. Super. Ct. May 30, 1973); In re Curry, 470 F.2d 368 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (Curry II). But see In re Peterson, 984 A.2d 192 (patient's status could be changed from voluntary to involuntary). If the 48-hour period ends on a weekend or holiday, the patient may be detained until noon of the next day that is not a weekend or legal holiday. See D.C. Code § 21-526.

Two decisions by the D.C. Court of Appeals have suggested that a voluntary patient's right to discharge is not absolute. See In re Clark, 700 A.2d 781 (D.C. 1997); In re Peterson, 984 A.2d 192. In Clark, the court held that nothing in the Ervin Act precluded initiation of commitment proceedings under the narrow circumstances presented in the case. Clark had been a voluntary patient who was not compliant with treatment and who was arrested for assaulting a staff member on his ward at the hospital. He was placed in the hospital's forensic division under an order in the criminal case after a finding that he was incompetent to stand trial on the criminal charges, and unlikely to regain competence. In addition, the court found that he was "no longer … amenable to treatment as a voluntary inpatient." 700 A.2d at 786. The court rejected Clark's challenge to his involuntary inpatient commitment. In Peterson, the Court of Appeals extended Clark to hold that in extraordinary circumstances, a voluntary inpatient can also be the subject of an emergency detention petition. Peterson was a voluntary patient at Washington Hospital Center who requested discharge from inpatient treatment, and who was instead transferred involuntarily to St. Elizabeth's Hospital. The Court of Appeals held that involuntary detention procedures could be applied to allow involuntary detention of a voluntary patient "in truly urgent situations where imminent dangerousness requires detention of an individual who is no longer amenable to treatment. Peterson, 984 A.2d at 194. The Public Defender Service has filed a motion for en banc review of the Peterson decision.

Similar rules apply to voluntary admissions of minors (under 18), except that the person making application for hospitalization and requesting release is the minor's spouse, parent, or legal guardian. A minor cannot sign him or herself in or out of the hospital, absent unusual circumstances such as the emancipation of the minor. For more information regarding the rights of voluntarily and involuntarily hospitalized minors, see infra section IX.

[1] An individual receiving voluntary treatment on an outpatient basis may be made the subject of an involuntary hospitalization proceeding under limited circumstances. In re (Bernard) Johnson, 691 A.2d 628 (D.C. 1997).

4. Nonprotesting Treatment

The Ervin Act provides for another noncompulsory hospitalization scheme, termed "nonprotesting" status. D.C. Code § 21-513 (1984). This status applies to a person who signs a statement that he or she does not object to hospitalization after being admitted when a friend or relative applies for the hospitalization. The Ervin Act explicitly provides that, unlike a voluntary patient, a nonprotesting patient can be detained if he or she is the subject of involuntary commitment proceedings. D.C. Code § 21-514. However, a nonprotesting patient must be released immediately upon written request unless involuntary commitment proceedings have already been initiated. D.C. Code § 21-514.

II. APPOINTMENT OF COUNSEL, PICKUP PROCESS AND REPRESENTATION IN MENTAL HEALTH CASES

A. Appointment of Counsel

In addition to the procedures necessary for obtaining appointments under the Criminal Justice Act (CJA), counsel must be approved to be on the panel of attorneys appointed to mental health cases. See Super. Ct. Administrative Order No. 03-20 (Oct. 10, 2003). For information on applying to the mental health panel of CJA attorneys, counsel should contact the Chairperson of the Mental Health Commission, Magistrate Judge Joan Goldfrank. Once on the list, counsel will be asked to provide notice of availability to receive appointments to the Mental Health Clerk's office (Room 4450) on a monthly basis. When an appointment is made, the clerk's office will notify counsel that the cases are ready to be picked up at the Mental Health Clerk's office. When counsel arrives at the office to pick up the cases, counsel will be asked to sign for the case documents, including legal documents and appointment vouchers relating to each newly assigned case. (Extra second, third, and continuation voucher sheets are available either from the Commission staff or at the CJA office.)

The bulk of counsel's newly assigned cases will be cases that were initiated as a result of the respondent's emergency involuntary admission to a hospital. See infra Section IV. Counsel is routinely appointed to a block of cases each rotation. Cases are also sometimes initiated as a result of a petition for judicial commitment filed under D.C. Code § 21-541, referred to as an "off the street" case because the respondent is not subject to detention pursuant to an emergency petition under § 21-522 and may remain at liberty during the pendency of the proceedings. See infra Section V.D.

On occasion, counsel may be asked to represent a family member in an off the street case who has filed a commitment petition pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-541. See Section V.D.2. Counsel may not be compensated for services rendered to a private petitioner. The Commission also occasionally appoints attorneys to be "guardians ad litem" (GAL) in certain situations in mental health cases. Sample reports to the court, required by the GAL in these cases, can be obtained from the Mental Health Division of the Public Defender Service.

Once counsel is appointed to represent a respondent in an emergency detention or commitment proceeding, the representation will continue until the court closes the case. See Section F.1, supra. Nevertheless, the Commission will issue a new order appointing counsel when a petition for recommitment is filed, pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-545.01, and the Commission sets a hearing on the petition.

B. Papers in Emergency Detention Cases

When counsel is appointed to a new mental health case in which the respondent has been detained pursuant to the Ervin Act's emergency hospitalization provisions, counsel should receive the following documents:

1. Order Authorizing Continued Hospitalization for Emergency Observation

This order contains counsel's appointment, authorizes the respondent's continued hospitalization for exactly seven days from the time and date the order was docketed, and contains other useful information such as the case number.

2. Petition for Order Authorizing Continued Hospitalization of a Patient for Emergency Observation

This is usually a boilerplate pleading and should be signed by the hospital's administrator or the chief clinical officer of the Department of Mental Health, or their designee. The time and date of filing should be stamped on the front page by the case caption. The petition generally includes some information as to time of admission and the respondent's community contacts. The pleading should also indicate whether the respondent has been detained at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, the Department of Mental Health's Comprehensive Psychiatric Emergency Program (CPEP), or some other hospital or facility. United Medical Center ("UMC", formerly Greater Southeast Community Hospital) and the Psychiatric Institute of Washington ("PIW") have contracts with the Department of Mental Health to receive emergency involuntary admissions. PIW also maintains a number of its "emergency" beds at Providence Hospital.

There are a number of documents attached to the petition. Generally right below the petition is a copy of the Application for Emergency Hospitalization, often referred to as an "FD-12" form. This form will identify who initiated the respondent's hospitalization and should set forth the facts upon which the applicant based the detention. Below the application will be the "Certificate of Psychiatrist Under § 522." The psychiatrist or psychologist who made the decision to admit the respondent to the hospital or other facility should have completed this certificate. It will generally reflect the admitting doctor's tentative diagnosis and impressions, contain hearsay information about the circumstances surrounding the detention, and have information about relatives or other contacts and previous psychiatric care, etc. In most cases, reproductions of one or more handwritten sheets and copies of initial treatment records will be appended to the § 522 certificate. Often there are two § 522 certificates – one documenting admission at CPEP and another documenting admission at a hospital.

C. Papers in Off the Street Cases

If counsel is appointed to a proceeding initiated by the filing of a § 541 petition, then counsel will receive different documents than those provided in an emergency detention case:

1. Order Appointing Counsel and Setting Date for a Hearing

This order sets a date for a hearing before the Commission on Mental Health, appoints counsel to represent the respondent, indicates that the respondent will be subpoenaed to appear for an examination before the Commission on the date of the hearing, and states that the respondent "is to receive a certified copy of this order and petition for judicial hospitalization prior to the hearing."

2. Screening Findings

In off-the-street cases in which a family member or guardian files a petition for commitment, rather than the Department of Mental Health or a hospital, see infra Section V.D.2, the Commission conducts an ex parte preliminary screening hearing. Its findings are set forth in a document, signed by the members of the Commission on Mental Health after the hearing, and including the Commission's determination that the petition "is sufficient for the Court to require" the respondent to submit to an examination by the Commission's physician members.

3. Petition for Judicial Hospitalization

This is typically a form or boilerplate petition completed by the family member or other petitioner, available from the Commission on Mental Health, to which the petitioner adds identifying data about him or herself and information about the respondent.

4. Affidavit of Petitioner

The first page of this document allows the petitioner to describe the respondent's behavior by checking boxes. The second is a blank sheet on which the petitioner is directed to elaborate on the boilerplate allegations checked. This form should be notarized. When the Department of Mental Health or a hospital files the petition for commitment, a certificate of psychiatrist or qualified psychologist will be attached instead of an affidavit of petitioner.[2]

[2] In a small number of instances, the mental health case will begin with a § 541 petition filed by St. Elizabeth's Hospital against an individual who is detained at the hospital following a determination in a criminal case that the respondent is incompetent to stand trial and unlikely to regain competence in the foreseeable future (a so-called Jackson case, after the case Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715 (1972)). See supra Chapter 3. In these cases, a certificate of a psychiatrist or qualified psychologist will be filed in lieu of an affidavit from the petitioner. See Section V.D.

D. Papers in Recommitment Cases

1. Order Appointing Counsel

This order appoints (or re-appoints) counsel to represent the respondent. Usually, the clerk's office will handwrite on the appointment order the date of the hearing before the Mental Health Commission.

2. Petition for Recommitment

This is typically a form or boilerplate document submitted by the Department of Mental Health's chief clinical officer or his designee. A certificate of physician should be attached to the petition. In the certificate, the respondent's treating doctor states findings of a current examination and certifies his or her opinion that the respondent is mentally ill and dangerous.

E. Locating the Respondent

Whether a respondent is detained in the hospital or is living in the community at the time counsel is appointed, counsel obviously must locate the client. The petition should indicate whether the respondent is detained at CPEP, St. Elizabeth's, or another hospital. If detained at St. Elizabeth's, the respondent's location there should appear in the petition for emergency detention. If detained at a different hospital, the easiest way to locate the respondent is by either calling the hospital's chief administrator or by contacting the petitioner. Many private hospitals will neither confirm nor deny that a person is a patient at the hospital if he or she is there for psychiatric treatment, due to restrictions on disclosure of information encoded in the Mental Health Information Act, D.C. Code §§ 7-1201.01, et seq. In contrast, the central switchboard at St. Elizabeth's (202) 562-4000 will tell counsel what ward a client is on and provide the telephone number for the ward.

If the respondent is the subject of an off the street case, the petitioner is supposed to provide the respondent's current address so that the court can notify the respondent of the filing. This information is often inaccurate, making it more difficult for counsel to find his or her client. If the information in the petition is inaccurate, counsel may be able to locate the respondent by determining whether the respondent was served with the petition and, if so, where.

F. Obligations of Counsel

1. Duty to Client

The Ervin Act mandates that persons involuntarily hospitalized "must be represented by counsel in all proceedings before the Commission or the court." D.C. Code § 21-543; In re Holmes, 422 A.2d 969, 972 (D.C. 1980);[3] Dooling v. Overholser, 243 F.2d 825 (D.C. Cir. 1957). This mandate extends from representation at a § 525 hearing to representation at any post-commitment proceedings that could have a bearing on the respondent's legal status. If a lawyer is unable for some reason to continue representing a client after a final commitment order is entered, he must communicate that clearly to the client, see D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct, comment to Rule 1.3 at [8], and, where appropriate, withdraw from the case so that successor counsel can be appointed. See D.C. R. Prof. Cond. 1.16(d) and comment; see also Michael L. Perlin, Fatal Assumption: A Critical Evaluation of the Role of Counsel in Mental Disability Cases, 16 Law & Human Behavior 39 (1992).

The D.C. Rules of Professional Conduct provide substantial guidance for counsel representing clients in Ervin Act proceedings. The rules that require a lawyer to represent a client zealously and diligently, within the bounds of the law, Rule 1.3, and that require counsel to provide competent representation, Rule 1.1, also apply in mental health cases. Rule 3.1 requires counsel in civil commitment cases to put the government to its proof, even where no defense theory seems to be available:

> A lawyer . . . for the respondent in a proceeding that could result in involuntary institutionalization, shall, if the client elects to go to trial or to a contested fact-finding hearing, nevertheless so defend the proceeding as to require that the government carry its burden of proof.

See also Comment to Rule 3.1 at [3].

The District of Columbia is not unique in holding lawyers in civil commitment cases to the same high degree of attention and zealous advocacy as in other areas of legal representation. The National Center for State Courts has published Guidelines for Involuntary Civil Commitment and the D.C. Court of Appeals has cited with approval the section on legal representation in the Guidelines. See In re Melton, 565 A.2d 635, 646 (D.C. 1989), vacated on other grounds, 597 A.2d 892 (D.C. 1991) (en banc). The Guidelines identify the obligations a lawyer owes a respondent in a mental health case, including a prompt and private meeting with the client soon after appointment in the case, during which counsel may learn the respondent's version of the facts and events leading to hospitalization, as well as background information from the client. In addition, the Guidelines state that counsel should explain to the client what is happening and why, explain what rights the client has during the commitment process, and determine what the client's preferences are. Guidelines at E.5, p. 473-74.

The American Bar Association's Commission on the Mentally Disabled has also promulgated standards for counsel in civil commitment proceedings. Involuntary Civil Commitment: A Manual for Lawyers and Judges (1988). The ABA Manual emphasizes that a prompt and thorough prehearing interview of the client, which includes advising the client of his or her rights, is one of the most important – if not the most important – points in the representation of a respondent in a mental health case. See id. at 19. Failure to meet with an Ervin Act client or attend scheduled hearings has been found to constitute negligent failure to pursue a client's case and conduct prejudicial to the administration of justice, warranting a 60-day suspension. In re Zdravkovich, 671 A.2d 937 (D.C. 1996).

2. Exercising and Waiving Rights of Clients

The Ervin Act, court rules, and case law provide respondents in civil commitment cases with important procedural protections. These rights, ranging from the very specific timetables in the emergency hospitalization process to a jury trial to contest one-year commitment, are personal to the client and any decision to exercise or to waive these rights must be made by the respondent. Respondents are presumed to be competent to make decisions and counsel is obligated to abide by the express wishes of the respondent; counsel may not substitute his or her own view of the client's best interests. Not only does counsel have an obligation to explain to the respondent what his or her rights are and to determine how the respondent wishes to proceed, counsel must also fully understand the client's decision and how it relates to waiver or exercise of those rights. For example, counsel should not presume from a client's willingness to receive outpatient treatment that the client necessarily agrees to treatment on a court-ordered basis; it is essential for counsel to make sure the respondent understands the difference between voluntary outpatient treatment and commitment as an outpatient for a one-year period. The respondent may choose to waive rights after the different options are explained and after a judge has inquired of the respondent to determine that the waiver is knowing and voluntary; it is otherwise improper for counsel to waive rights to contest commitment.

Some clients will reject all or part of counsel's assistance. For instance, a client may refuse to sign a record release, instruct counsel not to exercise various rights, or refuse to be represented by counsel at all. Counsel must determine how to handle such situations on a case-by-case basis at each step of the proceeding, taking care to fully advise the client of his or her rights while respecting the client's wishes. A client may explain that he or she wants to talk with a family member first or that he or she would prefer to work out a solution with the doctor without going to court. Counsel should respect this position. Counsel could attempt to facilitate such a discussion but should do nothing unless the client makes a request or otherwise authorizes him or her to take some action.

Under some circumstances, counsel may believe that the restrictions the client has placed on his representation will seriously impair counsel's ability to achieve the client's goals. In such a situation – e.g., the respondent has asked for a jury trial but refuses to sign a record release permitting counsel to review hospital records – counsel may have to consider taking action that appears to run counter to the client's wishes as to the manner of proceeding. If the refusal to cooperate with counsel reaches the point that the client has, in effect, rejected or fired the attorney, counsel may consider asking the court to relieve him of the appointment. See D.C. R. Prof. Cond. 1.16. If the client's refusal to cooperate is occasioned by a desire to waive the right to counsel and proceed pro se, this decision is presumptively competent. Counsel must raise the issue with the court to determine whether the client is able to proceed pro se. See Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975).

Occasionally, counsel will encounter ethical problems when representing a client who is unable to communicate with or assist counsel due to confusion, memory loss associated with advanced dementia, or serious physical problems. There is no clear solution to this problem. Because counsel is not a guardian who can decide what is best for the person and the community without reference to the respondent's wishes, counsel may wish in these rare circumstances to request appointment of a guardian ad litem.[4] The need for a guardian ad litem arises almost exclusively at the final stage of the commitment process, after the Mental Health Commission has recommended commitment and the respondent is unable to communicate a decision regarding his or her trial rights. In requesting appointment of a guardian ad litem, counsel should ask the court to instruct the guardian ad litem to decide not necessarily what is in the respondent's best interests, but what decision the respondent would make for himself were he able to communicate a decision. This substituted judgment approach is strongly favored in the District of Columbia, which values dearly the sanctity of personal choice. See, e.g., In re A.C., 573 A.2d 1235 (D.C. 1990).

III. MENTAL ILLNESS AND LIKELIHOOD OF INJURY TO SELF OR OTHERS

A. Statutory Criteria for Involuntary Hospitalization

Throughout the Ervin Act, the criteria for involuntary hospitalization are mental illness and likelihood of injury to self or others as a result of mental illness. (The second criterion is commonly referred to as "dangerousness.") Before a person may be taken into custody for emergency treatment, there must be allegations that the person has a mental illness and is likely to injure self or others if not immediately detained. D.C. Code § 21-521. The doctor admitting the person to the hospital must also be of the opinion that the proposed patient is mentally ill and dangerous. D.C. Code § 21-522. The court, in authorizing hospitalization on an emergency basis, must determine whether there is probable cause to find the respondent mentally ill and dangerous. See In re Barnard, 455 F.2d 1370 (D.C. Cir. 1971). A petition for one-year commitment, which begins the second stage of the process, must similarly allege mental illness and dangerousness, D.C. Code § 21-541, and the Mental Health Commission must make findings regarding mental illness and dangerousness. D.C. Code § 21-544. In the third stage of a commitment proceeding, a judge or jury must make findings based on clear and convincing evidence that there is mental illness and dangerousness before one-year commitment may be ordered. D.C. Code § 21-545. Finally, a person who is committed is entitled to periodic reviews of the commitment at which doctors must determine whether the person remains mentally ill to the extent that he or she is likely to injure self or others if not committed. D.C. Code §§ 21-546, 548.

The statute contains a definition of mental illness, D.C. Code § 21-501, but does not define "likely to injure self or others." Both criteria have been considered by the courts, and a number of cases include language useful to understanding what mental illness and dangerousness mean in an Ervin Act proceeding. It is important to be familiar with the jurisprudence in this area, though most decisions are tightly tied to the particular facts of each case.

The parameters of mental illness and dangerousness do not vary from section to section of the Ervin Act. However, the quantum of evidence needed to prove these elements varies from section to section, ranging from a mere "reason to believe" in § 21-521 to clear and convincing evidence at a trial held pursuant to § 21-545. In addition, the statute has some variation on the time frame for evaluating dangerousness: to support emergency detention, the dangerousness must be likely if the person is "not immediately detained," D.C. Code § 21-521, but for one-year commitment, the danger need not be imminent. See § 21-545.

2. Definition of "Mental Illness"

"Mental illness" is defined in D.C. Code § 21-501 as "a psychosis or other disease which substantially impairs the mental health of a person." However, "what may viscerally appear to be precise to the layman – the term 'psychosis' – is deceptively broad." In re Ballay, 482 F.2d 648, 665 n.57 (D.C. Cir. 1973). Accordingly, the statutory definition has been given an expansive reading. For example, a person who was diagnosed as having a non-psychotic personality disorder after attempting suicide could be found to be mentally ill at a probable cause hearing. See In re Rosell, 547 A.2d 180 (D.C. 1988).

All medical or psychiatric diagnoses do not come within the statutory definition. For example, mental retardation, drug addiction, epilepsy, or alcoholism, though mental disorders listed in the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (4th ed. 1994) (DSM-IV), are not, standing alone, considered mental illnesses under § 21-501. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 925, 88th Cong., 2d Sess. 13 (1964); In re (Melvin) Alexander, 372 F.2d 925 (D.C. Cir. 1967). Conversely, to qualify as a § 21-501 mental illness, the condition need not be classified in the DSM-IV. (Melvin) Alexander, 372 F.2d at 927. Psychosis due to drug or alcohol intoxication may meet the statutory definition of mental illness; however, given that such states are generally temporary, it is possible that within a few days of a person's hospitalization the mental illness will have dissipated. Finally, some physical conditions, such as renal failure or diabetes, can in an acute phase cause temporary psychosis that would be resolved when the physical problem is treated.

"'[M]ental illness' is by no means a static concept but rather one of degree of deviation from the 'norm'," Ballay, 482 F.2d at 665, and because the origins of mental illness are uncertain, the "spotlight" at any hearing is on the respondent's current mental condition. In re Artis, 615 A.2d 1148, 1151 (D.C. 1992). The Supreme Court has cautioned that there is a risk that a fact-finder "might decide to commit an individual based solely on a few isolated instances of unusual conduct." Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 427 (1979). Accordingly, before an individual may be deprived of his or her liberty, there must be "a showing that the individual suffers from something more serious than is demonstrated by idiosyncratic behavior." Id.

2. Overview of Dangerousness

The meaning of the phrase "likelihood of injury to self or others" is not spelled out in the Ervin Act and has not yet been definitively established under case law interpreting the Ervin Act, though it has been deemed clear enough to meet constitutional standards. See In re (Magnolia) Alexander, 336 F. Supp. 1305 (D.D.C. 1972). Refinement of this criterion has been left to the courts, id. at 1307, on a case-by-case basis. In re Mendoza, 433 A.2d 1069, 1072 (D.C. 1981); see also Cross v. Harris, 418 F.2d 1095, 1099 (D.C. Cir. 1969) (regarding similar criterion in sexual psychopath commitment statute).

Given that courts make decisions regarding dangerousness that are closely tied to the specific facts of each case, it is difficult to say with certainty whether the allegations in a case, if proved, would support a finding of dangerousness at a probable cause hearing, a Mental Health Commission hearing, or a trial.[5] In a number of cases, the D.C. Court of Appeals has affirmed findings of dangerousness, and a few behavioral patterns have consistently been determined to be dangerous. One caveat should be noted: in most reported decisions affirming a trial court finding of dangerousness, the evidence has suggested that the respondent engaged in a variety of behaviors which, individually, may or may not have supported the finding, but which clearly support the finding when reviewed as a whole. For example, the court held that behavior that might not otherwise be considered dangerous or out of the ordinary could be, under certain circumstances, "sufficient to enable the court to find risk of injury" that satisfied the statutory requirements. In re Perruso, 896 A.2d 255 (D.C. 2006). In another case, the Court of Appeals stated that "wandering aimlessly and speaking incoherently in the midst of moving automobile traffic" is an example of "behavior [that] endangered both [respondent's] own well-being and the safety of others," and when coupled with other incidents such as threatening family members, ramming his head into a steel door, and destroying property, there was "an ample substantive basis from which the jury could conclude that, because of his mental illness, [respondent] is likely to injure himself or others if" allowed to be at liberty. In re Samuels, 507 A.2d 150, 154 (D.C. 1986).

A finding of likelihood of harm under the Ervin Act need not be based on a showing that the respondent committed a recent overt act that harmed himself or others, although the absence of [5] The circuit court, in an early decision interpreting the Ervin Act, suggested some of the shortcomings with a case-by-case approach to dangerousness. "Remaining largely undefined, application of [dangerousness] concepts by judge and jury may unduly reflect clinical definitions and conclusions rather than the appropriate judicial exegetics and community values … Since most 'mental illness' is defined and measured in terms of behavioral deviance, to classify and label it as a basis for subsequent testimony predictive of future behavior presents somewhat of an anomaly in itself. It is at least questionable in many cases exactly how much this differs from a prediction that 80-90% of the individuals featuring specified socio-economic traits and backgrounds are destined to commit crimes, then using this profile to rehabilitatively incarcerate, presumably an unacceptable procedure both morally and constitutionally." Ballay, 482 F.2d at 665-66.

such an act may be argued. In re Snowden, 423 A.2d 188, 191-192 (D.C. 1980).[6] Conversely, a judge or jury may not base a finding of dangerousness on speculation. In re Mendoza, 433 A.2d at 1071-72. Nor may a finding be based on injury to a respondent's "reputation 'and the like'"; "the word 'injure' at least implies an element of dangerousness." Id. However, "the danger need not necessarily be physical nor involve violence. All that is required is that the subject be found likely, by reason of mental illness, to 'inadvertently place himself in a position of danger or . . . to suffer harm.'" In re Gahan, 531 A.2d 661, 665 (D.C. 1987) (citations omitted).

3. Dangerousness to Self

The phrase "dangerous to self" is ambiguous. In re Ballay, 482 F.2d at 660.

> Literally this encompasses injury of an active sort ranging from intentional acts such as suicide, to purely unintentional acts, such as ignorantly crossing the street against the light, to purely passive injury, such as disease which results from inability to . . . furnish the minimum nutritional and hygienic requirements of life.

Id. However, dangerousness to self is not so broad as to allow for commitment "of persons who, because of mental illness, lack sufficient capacity to make responsible decisions with respect to hospitalization." Id. at 661.

The decision in the Gahan case, in which the Court of Appeals concluded that there was ample evidence at trial of a likelihood of self-injury to justify commitment, 531 A.2d at 665, is frequently cited by the petitioner in mental health cases to support its argument that a respondent is dangerous to self. In Gahan, the court held that the evidence that the respondent "had a habit of standing outside for hours in cold or rainy weather inadequately clothed," "had not eaten for two weeks prior to her admission to" the hospital, and had a history of malnutrition and dehydration when off of antipsychotic medications, and "was likely to place herself in a position of danger" with "aggressive and hostile conduct [that] was likely [at] some point to incur retaliation," supported a finding that the respondent "was unable to care for herself, to a degree which put her in potential physical danger." Id. at 665, 666. The court emphasized that the question for the jury was whether the respondent "is likely to injure herself in the future." Id. at 666. Moreover, "[t]his prediction does not depend on the individual's having succeeded in causing injury to herself in the recent past." Id.

4. Dangerousness to Others

Case law affirming commitment is replete with descriptions of behavior that have been found to support findings of dangerousness to others, though there is no clear definition of what this means. Clearly, attacking another person or threatening another person with serious harm, especially if the threat involves a knife or some other kind of a weapon, fall within the scope of dangerousness to others. Numerous cases, for example, have involved threats to or attacks on family members by respondents, see, e.g., In re Melton, 597 A.2d 892, 901 (D.C. 1991) (en banc); In re Samuels, 507 A.2d 150, 154 (D.C. 1986); In re Snowden, 423 A.2d 188, 189 (D.C. 1980); or threatening and assaultive behavior directed toward women who were not related to the male respondents. See, e.g., In re Katz, 638 A.2d 684, 686 (D.C. 1994); Samuels, 507 A.2d at 154; Snowden, 423 A.2d at 189. However, injury to others need not be intentional. Bumper, 441 A.2d at 978. Nor must there have been any actual physical injury to others; potential injury or emotional injury may be enough. See Samuels, 507 A.2d at 154.

The D.C. Court of Appeals in Mendoza, 433 A.2d at 1071 n.6, suggested that courts look to the decision in Cross v. Harris, 418 F.2d 1095 (D.C. Cir. 1969), for help in understanding what is meant by dangerousness to others. The circuit court decisions in Cross and Millard v. Harris, 406 F.2d 964 (D.C. Cir. 1968), which arose from commitments under the Sexual Psychopath Act, provide an analysis germane to the judicial assessment of dangerousness in Ervin Act proceedings. See also Fuller v. United States, 390 F.2d 468, 471 n.3 (D.C. Cir. 1967) (Bazelon, C.J., concurring); Barnard, 455 F.2d at 1375 n.12. To be dangerous for purposes of the Sexual Psychopath Act, one must be "likely to attack or otherwise inflict injury" on others. D.C. Code § 22-3803(1). The circuit court, in Cross, observed that the focus of the statute is not on expected conduct, but on the harm that may result from the conduct. In determining whether the misconduct is likely to result in injury, factors such as the frequency of the misconduct, the availability of treatment, and the likelihood that the person in question will voluntarily accept a course of outpatient treatment should be considered. 418 F.2d at 1100. The court emphasized the importance that trial judges not allow the question of likelihood of harm "to devolve, by default, upon the expert [psychiatric] witnesses." Id. at 1100.

In at least one kind of commitment case, the assessment of dangerousness seems to omit the requirement of a likelihood of injury. In what are commonly referred to as "White House cases," a respondent need not demonstrate overtly threatening behavior in order to be deemed dangerous to others. In these cases, evidence that police or Secret Service perceived the respondent as threatening to a public official has been sufficient to support commitment. See, e.g., In re Nelson, 408 A.2d 1233, 1235 (D.C. 1979); Ballay, 482 F.2d at 649. But see David Shore, M.D., et al., White House Cases: Psychiatric Patients and the Secret Service, 142 Am. J. Psych. 3 (March 1985) (Less than a quarter of delusional visitors to the White House or other government offices have threatened some prominent political figure, yet none had made an attempt on the life of any prominent political figure ten years after initial hospitalization as White House cases.)

The fact that a respondent could be charged with a crime often leads the petitioner in an Ervin Act case to argue that the respondent is dangerous because he or she has engaged in a criminal act, even if it would be a non-violent charge. In support of this argument, the petitioner generally will cite In re Mendoza, 433 A.2d at 1072, and United States v. Charnizon, 232 A.2d 586 (D.C. 1967). However, a closer analysis of these and related cases demonstrates that this is an impermissible interpretation of the Ervin Act.

The Charnizon decision, which is most frequently cited by the petitioner to support the argument that non-violent criminal acts are tantamount to dangerous behavior warranting commitment, is based on Overholser v. Russell, 283 F.2d 195 (D.C. Cir. 1960), an early case involving a release request for a person found not guilty by reason of insanity. The Court of Appeals relied on Overholser v. Russell in Mendoza, which stated that "[i]nvoluntary civil commitment is appropriate when a fact-finder determines by clear and convincing evidence, that the subject is likely to cause injury to himself or others by criminal conduct or otherwise." 433 A.2d at 1072. However, the decisions in Mendoza and in Overholser v. Russell do not support the conclusion that any and all criminal behavior is tantamount to dangerous behavior warranting civil commitment. Non-violent or non-injurious criminal acts are not per se evidence of dangerousness in civil commitment cases given the holding in Mendoza that "a jury instruction [on dangerousness] must be sufficiently pure to protect against misleading the jury into speculation" and that the common meaning of injure[7] should be used. Id.

In Overholser v. Russell, the D.C. Circuit addressed whether an insanity acquittee, who was seeking release under D.C. Code § 24-501, is "'dangerous' if he may commit a non-violent crime, or only if he may commit an act of violence." 283 F.2d at 198. The court ruled, per curiam, that Russell, who had been acquitted by reason of insanity on a bad check charge, should not have been unconditionally released where, in part, the evidence showed that he might write bad checks if released. Russell himself had presented expert testimony that he remained mentally ill and was dangerous to "society because of his check-writing proclivity" and to himself because of his history of suicide attempts. The court, in dicta, stated:

> the danger to the public need not be possible physical violence or a crime of violence. It is enough if there is competent evidence that he may commit any criminal act, for any such act will injure others and will expose the person to arrest, trial and conviction. There is always the additional possible danger – not to be discounted even if remote – that a non-violent criminal act may expose the perpetrator to violent retaliatory acts by the victim of the crime.

Id. However, the trial court's order of unconditional release was reversed primarily because Russell had not proved that he had sufficiently recovered from his mental illness, as evidenced by his expert's opinion. This fact was essential for Judge Bazelon, who wrote a concurring opinion in which he agreed that the evidence supported the conclusion that Russell had not recovered from his mental illness to the extent that he would not be a danger to self or others in the reasonably foreseeable future. Judge Bazelon wrote separately to emphasize that there was "no basis for th[e] court's comments on the question whether a person who will probably commit non-violent crimes . . . may be unconditionally released." The question was not presented by the record in this case. Id. at 199.

Similarly, the question of whether a non-violent criminal act is per se evidence of dangerousness was not properly before the D.C. Court of Appeals in United States v. Charnizon, 232 A.2d 586 (D.C. 1967). Charnizon had been rehospitalized after running up a large hotel bill that he took care of with a bad check. In addition to this incident, there was evidence in the record from Charnizon's expert that he "had not recovered and would be a danger to himself and others if released." In spite of this expert testimony, the trial court sua sponte unconditionally released Charnizon, in part because of the disparity between the possible sentence and the length of commitment. The question presented to the Court of Appeals centered on the standard for return to inpatient status of this insanity acquittee who had been charged with writing bad checks after being conditionally released under D.C. Code § 24-501. The appeals court rejected the trial court's position, emphasizing that the criteria for release under § 24-501 is whether the patient has an abnormal mental condition that renders him potentially dangerous. Because of the expert testimony that Charnizon was still dangerous, not because he had engaged in possible criminal conduct, the court found that unconditional release was inappropriate. Then, in dicta, the court added that, under § 24-501, dangerousness "need not be possible physical violence or a crime of violence," 232 A.2d at 588, quoting with approval the language in Overholser v. Russell.

Subsequent cases seem to have discredited the idea that dangerousness can be proved by suggesting there is a possibility an insanity acquittee (or civilly committed person) might commit a nonviolent criminal act. In Millard v. Harris, 406 F.2d 964 (D.C. Cir. 1968), the court more fully addressed the question whether a person's non-violent criminal conduct might be dangerous to others. Judge Bazelon wrote on the question of dangerousness under the District's sexual psychopath law. Millard was found not dangerous in spite of testimony that he had a history of exhibitionism, voyeurism, and masturbating in public, all criminal acts. He had no history of violent sexual crimes, though he had history of other aggressive and assaultive acts. The court noted, however, that "[w]ere this a case involving civil commitment, such a rounded view of the individual's personality and past behavior would of course be essential both to a determination of whether he was mentally ill and, if so, whether his condition would cause him to be dangerous to himself or others." Id. at 975. Judge Bazelon rejected the implicit assumption of the trial court > that the mere fact that some such women and children are among the 'potential viewers' of the appellant's expected exhibitionism if released is enough to justify the ultimate conclusion of likely dangerousness . . . [T]he requirement for commitment for dangerousness is not the mere possibility of serious harm, but its likelihood. The trial court made no effort to evaluate the probability, as opposed to the possibility, of such harm.

Id. at 977. Thus, the statutory requirement that a person must be "likely to inflict injury on others" is crucial to the analysis of dangerousness. Id. The court went on to find that the possibility of psychological harm to others, including children, who might witness Millard's act of exposure, was "too remote to justify commitment." Id. at 978.

Millard was the starting point for the circuit court's decision in Cross v. Harris, 418 F.2d 1095 (D.C. Cir. 1969), which further refined what goes into a dangerousness determination. (Cross is cited with approval in Mendoza, supra.) In Cross, Chief Judge Bazelon again focused on what the language "likely to . . . inflict injury" means. The court wanted to provide guidance to "lower courts in applying the conclusory term 'dangerous to others.'" Id. at 1099 (citation omitted).

> Without some such framework, 'dangerous' could readily become a term of art describing anyone whom we would, all things considered, prefer not to encounter on the streets. We did not suppose that Congress had used 'dangerous' in any such Pickwickian sense . . .

> The focus of the statute is not on expected conduct, but on the harm that may flow from that conduct. Commitment cannot be based simply on the determination that a person is likely to engage in particular acts. The court must also determine the harm, if any, that is likely to flow from these acts. A mere possibility of injury is not enough; the statute requires that the harm be likely. For no matter how certain one can be that a person will engage in particular acts, it cannot be said that he is 'likely to . . . inflict injury' unless it can also be said that the acts, if engaged in, are likely to result in injury.

Id. at 1099-1100 (citations omitted; emphasis in original). The court went on to emphasize that the magnitude of harm that would justify commitment must be substantial. It was clear that the commitment act in question did not "authorize indefinite preventive detention for those who have a propensity to behave in a way that is merely offensive or obnoxious to others." Id. at 1100. "Incarceration for a mere propensity is punishment not for acts, but for status, and punishment for status is hardly favored in our society." Id. at 1101-02.

More recent decisions by the D.C. Court of Appeals seem to have modified the dicta in Charnizon regarding non-criminal acts in evaluating dangerousness in § 24-501 release hearings. For example, the court's analysis in De Veau v. United States, 483 A.2d 307 (D.C. 1984), should lay to rest any argument, in any commitment context in D.C., that any non-violent criminal act, without more, is sufficient to support a finding of dangerousness. In DeVeau, the court addressed the factors that go into a current determination of dangerousness, given the presumption of mental illness and dangerousness following an insanity acquittal. First, "the hospital records, files, and psychiatric history of the acquittee are all relevant, and may be considered by the court." Id. at 314 (citations omitted). Second, "[t]he court may refer also to the acquittee's demonstrated behavior, including the act for which she was prosecuted as well as any other prior crimes or bad acts, if, in the particular case before the court, the behavior relates to the current determination of dangerousness." Id. at 315. Whether the offense leading to commitment was violent "may be relevant to the determination of whether the public's safety will be protected if the acquittee is released." Id. at 315 n.19. Although the court concluded that prior behavior could be considered, it emphasized that "there are relevancy limits to the use of prior antisocial acts in predicting future dangerousness. The mere commission of such an act or acts is not, without more, sufficient to establish dangerousness by a preponderance of the evidence." De Veau, 483 A.2d at 315 n.20. Third, given the "lack of certainty and fallibility of psychiatric diagnosis," Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 429 (1979), quoted in De Veau, 483 A.2d at 315, the court must evaluate "these professional opinions [on future dangerousness], whether there is a consensus expressed, and whether the doctors have persuasively given reasons for their opinions." 483 A.2d at 316.

The court has reiterated that civilly committed individuals are distinct from individuals committed following an insanity acquittal "because [the latter] are 'an exceptional class of people' who have 'already unhappily manifested the reality of anti-social conduct.'" Reese v. United States, 614 A.2d 506, 515 (D.C. 1992) (citation omitted). Thus, prior criminal behavior may be a factor in determining current dangerousness for an insanity acquittee because that person has, in fact, committed a crime; a person found not guilty by reason of insanity is presumed to be mentally ill and dangerous because of the nature of the commitment under D.C. Code § 24-501(d)(2). Id.

There are no decisions by the Court of Appeals after Mendoza that incorporate DeVeau or Reese into an analysis of dangerousness under the Ervin Act. Nor is there anything that directly addresses the question whether commission of non-violent or non-injurious criminal acts, without more, can support a finding of likelihood of injury to others under the Ervin Act. However, given the case law addressing this issue in a different, but similar, arena, and the oft-quoted admonition that the Ervin Act must be "narrowly, even grudgingly, construed," Covington v. Harris, 419 F.2d 617, 623 (D.C. Cir. 1969), it is difficult to see how commission of a non-violent criminal act by a respondent in a mental health case could be deemed likely to injure others, absent other compelling evidence of dangerousness.

5. Nexus Between Mental Illness and Dangerousness

The petitioner is required to establish a connection between the mental illness of the respondent and the dangerous behavior attributed to him. Counsel should be alert to any case in which the petitioner has failed to make this connection, and argue this point in court. For example, a person who is mentally ill may get involved in street fights, petty crimes, or family disputes that have nothing to do with the person's illness.

3. Who May Initiate Emergency Hospitalization

The Ervin Act identifies three classes of persons qualified to take another person into custody and apply for the emergency hospitalization of that person in the District of Columbia: (1) an officer authorized to make arrests in D.C.; (2) an accredited officer or agent of the Department of Mental Health of the District of Columbia[8]; or (3) the physician or the qualified psychologist of the person in question. D.C. Code § 21-521 (2004).[9] A physician or psychologist who is employed by the government but is not an officer or agent of the District may not execute an application unless he or she is the physician or qualified psychologist of the person in question. See Williams v. Meredith, 407 A.2d 569 (D.C. 1979). The court in Williams v. Meredith emphasized that a § 521 applicant who is the "physician of the person in question" presupposes a voluntary and pre-existing doctor-patient relationship. Id. at 573. However, in In re Rosell, 547 A.2d 180 (D.C. 1988), where the physician applicant had no pre-existing relationship and only met the respondent in his hospital's emergency room, the court concluded that even if the application for hospitalization was defective because the doctor was not the "physician of the person in question," the statutory violation need not result in dismissal of the civil commitment action given the trial court's determination that involuntary hospitalization was supported by probable case. Accord In re Herman, 619 A.2d 958 (D.C. 1993) (en banc).

[8] A list of accredited officer-agents can be obtained from the Department of Mental Health's Access Helpline at 671-3070. Certification of officer-agents is regulated by the Department of Mental Health in accordance with 22 D.C.M.R. 7600, et seq. (2008).

[9] This process of taking a person into custody and applying for the person's emergency hospitalization, while technically not an arrest, is a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. In re Barnard, 455 F.2d 1370, 1373 (D.C. Cir. 1971). In Magwood v. Giddings, 672 A.2d 1083 (D.C. 1996), a woman involuntarily hospitalized as potentially suicidal unsuccessfully sued an officer-agent for false imprisonment, intentional infliction of emotional distress, negligence, and battery.

The class of psychiatrist or psychologist applicants is limited somewhat by § 21-582(a), which forbids a physician or qualified psychologist related to a person by blood or marriage to apply for that person's hospitalization under § 21-521 and prohibits a physician or psychologist who has a professional, financial, or official connection with a private hospital to apply for any person's admission to that particular hospital. In addition, § 21-582(b) states that a physician's or psychologist's application may not be considered unless it is based on personal observation and examination made by the physician or qualified psychologist within 72 hours of the execution of the application. See In re Morris, 482 A.2d 369 (D.C. 1984).

The requirement that the application be based on personal examination of the respondent may provide a basis for challenging the validity of the detention papers. An application that does not satisfy this requirement is not "cured" or "remedied" by a later judicial determination under §§ 21-524 and 21-525, In re Herman, 619 A.2d 958, 968 (D.C. 1993) (en banc), and although such a defect may not warrant dismissal of the action per se, the court should take such defects into account "insofar as they bear upon the reliability and integrity of the application and the information therein." Id.

4. Basis for Application

Section 21-521 requires the applicant to set forth in detail those facts that cause him or her to believe that the subject of the application is mentally ill and, as a result of mental illness, likely to injure self or others if not immediately detained.

5. Subject of an Emergency Application

Any person, adult or juvenile, may be the subject of an application for emergency hospitalization if the applicant has reason to believe that the person is mentally ill and, as a result of the illness, is likely to injure self or others if not immediately detained. However, if a person is seeking voluntary hospitalization under § 21-511, that person may not be made the subject of a § 21-521 application for emergency detention and observation. See In re Blair, 510 A.2d 1048, 1051 (D.C. 1986). But see In re (Bernard) Johnson, 691 A.2d 628 (D.C. 1997).

The D.C. Court of Appeals in Blair adopted the conclusion of the D.C. Circuit, which found that the Ervin Act's preference for voluntary treatment precluded the involuntary emergency hospitalization of a person who was actively seeking inpatient treatment under § 511. In re Curry, 470 F.2d 368 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (Curry II). In Curry II, the respondent voluntarily sought inpatient treatment at George Washington University Hospital, but was instead admitted to St. Elizabeths as an emergency involuntary patient. The circuit court dismissed his case after he had unsuccessfully raised the issue at a § 525 probable cause hearing, after a § 541 petition for judicial hospitalization had been filed, and after he had been discharged from the hospital. The court found that the issue was not moot and declared his involuntary hospitalization null and void. This result was reached in Blair also, though the respondent in that case came to the hospital under slightly different circumstances. In that case, the respondent was a voluntary outpatient for whom inpatient treatment was recommended. He agreed to his counselor's recommendation, but asked to wait a day to implement it so that he could take care of some personal matters. When he returned the next day seeking voluntary inpatient treatment, the doctor believed he was "drunk" and his counselor thought he might sign himself out of the hospital prematurely, so the staff arranged for his admission to St. Elizabeths as an emergency involuntary patient. When Blair raised this issue at a § 525 hearing, the court rejected it and found probable cause to support his detention as an emergency patient. However, the Court of Appeals concluded that "the steps taken to have Blair hospitalized on an involuntary basis were improper, and the motion to dismiss the probable cause proceeding should have been granted." 510 A.2d at 1051; cf. Zinermon v. Burch, 494 U.S. 113 (1990) (incompetent respondent should not have been allowed to sign in as a voluntary patient where applicable statute required "express and informed consent" to voluntary admission).

There have been several cases decided after the Blair decision that have complicated the issue of voluntariness as a bar to commitment. In In re Clark, 700 A.2d 781 (D.C. 1997), the court held that a voluntary inpatient who was charged with a crime and found incompetent to stand trial on the charge, pursuant to Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715 (1972), may be subject to involuntary commitment under D.C. Code §§ 21-541 through 21-545. Similarly, in In re (Bernard) Johnson, 691 A.2d 628 (D.C. 1997), the court concluded that Johnson's commitment as an outpatient, under D.C. Code § 21-545, was not precluded by the fact that, prior to the initiation of the commitment proceeding, he had been receiving outpatient treatment on a voluntary basis under § 21-511. Most recently, the court held that a voluntary inpatient status did not bar initiation of emergency detention proceedings after he requested his discharge. In re Peterson, 984 A.2d 192.

Individuals who are already subject to an involuntary outpatient commitment order under D.C. Code § 21-545 can be detained as the subject of an application for admission under D.C. Code § 21-521. However, the government is obligated under D.C. Code § 21-548 to notify the court of the person's inpatient status within 24 hours of hospitalization, and the government must release the person from detention if it has not filed a petition for revocation of outpatient status within 5 days of a detention order.

B. Examination and Admission for Observation for 48 Hours and Petition Requesting Continued Detention

1. Statutes and Court Rules

D.C. Code § 21-522 (examination and admission to hospital)

D.C. Code § 21-523 (court order required for detention beyond 48 hours)

D.C. Code § 21-526 (extension of maximum periods of time)

D.C. Code § 21-582(b) (admission certificate based on personal observation and examination)

Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 2 (emergency detention proceedings)

2. Examination and Admission for Observation for 48 Hours

Once an application is received by a hospital,[10] a psychiatrist, qualified physician,[11] or qualified psychologist on the staff of the hospital must examine the individual in question and make an independent decision whether to admit the person. A person could also be presented for admission to the Department of Mental Health and would have to be evaluated by the Department's chief clinical officer or his designee. D.C. Code § 21-522(a). A psychiatrist, qualified physician, or psychologist who evaluates a person presented with an application for involuntary detention must complete a certificate stating that he or she: (1) has examined the person; (2) is of the opinion that the person is mentally ill and as a result dangerous; and (3) is of the opinion "that hospitalization is the least restrictive form of treatment available to prevent the person from injuring himself or others." D.C. Code § 21-522(a)(3).

If the psychiatrist, physician, or psychologist decides to admit the person and executes a certificate under D.C. Code § 21-522, the individual must be admitted to a public hospital, or may be admitted to a private hospital, for a period of up to 48 hours. In addition, a person admitted to the hospital as an emergency patient must be informed of his right to counsel. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 2(a).

If the doctor examining the person for admission is of the opinion that hospitalization is not the least restrictive form of treatment, but "that detention in a certified facility for observation and diagnosis is the least restrictive treatment alternative to prevent the person from injuring himself or others," then the person may be detained by the Department of Mental Health at a certified facility. D.C. Code § 21-522(b)(4). Currently, the only certified facility for emergency observation and diagnosis is the Department's Comprehensive Psychiatric Emergency Program (CPEP), located on the grounds of the former D.C. General Hospital. Typically, respondents remain at CPEP for at most a few days and are either discharged back to the community or placed in a hospital by the Department.

If the doctor examining the person for admission is of the opinion that detention at a hospital or a certified facility is not warranted, the doctor must "facilitate the person's treatment through the Department [of Mental Health] or a provider [of mental health services], as appropriate." D.C. Code § 21-522(c).

A psychiatrist or psychologist executing a certificate of admission must base the certificate "on personal observation and examination of the [alleged mentally ill] person." D.C. Code § 21-582(b). 3. Petition Requesting Continued Detention

A person admitted under § 21-522 must be released within 48 hours unless the hospital or Department of Mental Health has, within that period, filed a petition with the court for an order extending the hospitalization for further evaluation and diagnosis for a period not to exceed seven days. D.C. Code § 21-523. The application for the person's admission and the § 522 certificate for admission should be filed with the petition. See D.C. Code § 21-524(b).

Section 21-526(a) and (b) describes the method of computing the time limits set by D.C. Code §§ 21-522 to 524 and when these time limits may be extended beyond "clock" or "calendar" limits as set forth in these sections.

Williams v. Meredith, 407 A.2d 569 (D.C. 1979)

3. Review of § 523 Petition and Seven-Day Order

The court[12] will consider the § 21-523 petition on an ex parte basis and must act on it within 24 hours. D.C. Code § 21-524. As part of the petition, the court must consider the report of the person who made the admission application and the certificate of the admitting psychiatrist or psychologist as well as any other relevant information. See § 21-524(b); Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 2(b).

The court may not grant the order extending the hospitalization unless it finds that the petition and accompanying documents contain "demonstrable facts" (and not "mere conclusory statements") establishing that probable cause exists to believe that the respondent is mentally ill and, as a result of such illness, likely to injure self or others. See In re Barnard, 455 F.2d 1370, 1375 (D.C. Cir. 1971); Williams, 407 A.2d at 574.

Should the court decide to grant the § 523 petition, it will issue a detention order pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-524, which extends the period of hospitalization for up to seven days. The order, which is prepared by the clerk's office, also appoints counsel for the respondent and provides the respondent with notice of his right to a hearing under D.C. Code § 21-525. See In re Barnard, 455 F.2d at 1376. See D.C. Code § 21-543; D.C. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 2, 12(a).

In some cases, the court has concluded that the petition did not provide sufficient factual information that the respondent was mentally ill or likely to injure self or others as a result of mental illness.[13] See, e.g., In re Clinton, M.H. No. 239-99 (D.C. Super. Ct. March 30, 1999) (Broderick, J.); In re Britton, M.H. No. 425-85 (D.C. Super. Ct. April 24, 1985) (Morrison, J.). In several more recent cases, the court has concluded that the petition was not filed within 48 hours of the respondent's admission to CPEP or the hospital, and has denied an order extending the detention. Because it is sometimes difficult to determine the exact time of admission, sometimes the court relies on supporting documents to determine when a person began receiving treatment, in order to start the 48-hour time period. In cases where the order to extend detention is denied, the respondent has the right to immediate release from detention. Often a respondent will chose to remain at the hospital as a voluntary patient. In cases where the petition is denied, the court usually assigns counsel to ensure that the person is not unlawfully detained.

3. Nature and Scope of § 525 Hearing

To contest the legality of an emergency hospitalization, the respondent may request a hearing pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-525. At the hearing, the court will, after hearing the evidence and arguments of counsel, determine whether the petitioner has met its burden of showing probable cause to find the respondent is mentally ill and likely to injure self or others as a result of mental illness.

The respondent has an unqualified right to have the hearing held within 24 hours of requesting it. In re DeLoatch, 532 A.2d 1343 (D.C. 1987). The request is usually made through the Mental Health Clerk by respondent's counsel. A request can be made in writing, in person, or by telephone to the Mental Health and Mental Retardation Branch of the Family Court during normal business hours, or by filing a written request with the Family Court after normal business hours. D.C. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 2(d). In accordance with the requirement that the hearing be held within 24 hours of the request, the hearing will be scheduled before a Superior Court judge,[14] usually for the following day. If the court does not conduct the § 21-525 hearing within 24 hours, the respondent must be released. Id. at 1345; see In re Barlow, 634 A.2d 1246, 1250 (D.C. 1993) (hearing "must begin prior to the expiration of the deadline and . . . must continue to advance to conclusion without reasonable delay") (emphasis in original). The respondent may waive the 24-hour rule by filing a praecipe with the court before the hearing.

[14] Since the creation of the family court, there have been times when a judge is not available to preside over a probable cause hearing and a magistrate judge has been assigned to the mental health case for the § 525 hearing. While this is inconsistent with long-time practice and appears inconsistent with the court's rules, challenges to magistrate judges at probable cause hearings have been unsuccessful.

Any legal infirmity underlying the respondent's detention may be raised at the § 21-525 hearing. See Curry II, 470 F.2d 368 (D.C. Cir. 1972); Barnard, 455 F.2d 1370; Morris, 482 A.2d 369. But see Herman, 619 A.2d 958. The issues that frequently arise include: (1) whether the respondent was illegally converted to involuntary status while seeking admission on a voluntary basis, see In re Blair, In re Curry;[15] (2) whether the application was executed by a person authorized to make an application under § 21-521; (3) whether the application meets the requirements of D.C. Code § 21-582; and (4) whether all the time limits specified in §§ 21-521 to 525 have been met.

4. Legal Standard at a Probable Cause Hearing

Probable Cause: The probable cause determination itself involves consideration of two elements: (1) the presence of a mental illness; and (2) the likelihood of injury to self or others because of such illness. These elements are discussed in detail in Section III. The standard of proof at a § 21-525 hearing has been found to be analogous to that used to test affidavits supporting requests for search and arrest warrants. Barnard, 455 F.2d at 1375 n.13. The information before the court must be sufficiently detailed and supported by facts to allow the court to perform its function under § 21-525 of ruling on the credibility of the evidence and determining whether probable cause exists for continued detention. Id. at 1375.

5. Setting for Hearing

The § 21-525 hearings are held in Superior Court. Ordinarily, respondents are brought to court by hospital or ward staff and physical restraints are not used. Use of the jail or cellblock is prohibited by D.C. Code § 21-585.

In the case of a respondent who speaks English only as a second language or who is unable to hear, counsel should inform the court and petitioner's counsel as soon as possible after requesting the hearing. The court should arrange for an interpreter to be present at the hearing. See D.C. Code § 2-1901 et seq. (1993).

The court does not usually make a court reporter available for probable cause hearings, which are recorded by tape. If counsel wants a court reporter to transcribe a probable cause hearing, it is advisable to make the request in advance in order to avoid delay of the proceedings.

6. Hearing and Procedure

a. Presence of respondent

The respondent has a right to be present at the hearing, but may waive his or her presence. See Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 2(f); Barnard, 455 F.2d 1370.

[15] In re Peterson, 984 A.2d 192 (D.C. 2009), altered the long-standing jurisprudence regarding an individual's absolute right to receive treatment on a voluntary basis, and to be discharged within 48 hours upon written request.

b. Preliminary matters

Counsel may and should ask the court to impose the Rule on Witnesses. Generally, such a request will be granted, though expert witnesses are usually allowed to remain in the courtroom while fact witnesses testify.

Generally, challenges to the legality of the detention procedure are raised as preliminary matters. The court may choose to resolve the legal challenge prior to commencement of any hearing on the merits of the probable cause determination, or may choose to proceed with arguments and evidence on the merits as well, and resolve the case in its entirety at the conclusion of the hearing.

c. Petitioner's case

At the § 21-525 hearing, the burden is on the hospital, as the petitioner, to establish that probable cause exists to justify the respondent's emergency hospitalization.[16] The hospital may do this either by relying on the same papers that were before the judge who authorized the original § 21-524 order, Barnard, 455 F.2d at 1375,[17] or by presenting witnesses. Hearsay is admissable.

Often the only witness for the petitioner will be the psychiatrist or psychologist treating the respondent at the hospital. Absent a stipulation as to the doctor's qualification as an expert in the treatment and diagnosis of mental illness, the prosecuting attorney first questions the doctor in a manner designed to establish the doctor's qualifications to testify as an expert witness. Respondent's counsel may conduct voir dire to challenge the doctor's qualifications. See infra Section VI.D.6. Once the doctor is qualified as an expert, he or she will typically be asked whether he or she: (1) is responsible for the respondent's care at the hospital; (2) is aware of the circumstances of the respondent's admission; (3) has reviewed the respondent's hospital records; (4) has conferred with hospital staff or family members about the respondent's condition and behavior; (5) has an opinion on whether the respondent has a mental illness and to explain the basis for that opinion, including a description of the respondent's diagnosis and symptoms the respondent is showing at the time of the hearing; and (6) has an opinion whether the respondent, as a result of mental illness, is likely to injure self or others if released, and the basis for that opinion. Other areas of examination may include the frequency of the doctor's contact with the respondent, the respondent's reported behavior in the community and on the ward, the respondent's history of prior hospitalizations and treatment, the medication the respondent is taking at the time of the hearing, and the doctor's opinion regarding the likelihood the respondent would continue taking medication or following through with other treatment if released from emergency detention. The petitioner's expert witness seldom has direct knowledge of the initial [16] The Department of Mental Health (DMH), which operates St. Elizabeth's Hospital, is the petitioner in all but a handful of emergency mental health cases. DMH is represented by the Mental Health Section of the Office of the Attorney General for the District of Columbia, whose offices are located on the 2nd floor of the Smith Center on the grounds of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, 1100 Alabama Ave. SE. The main phone number for the office is (202) 645-5266. If the petitioning party is a private medical facility, its counsel will prosecute the case.

[17] In those rare cases where the hospital decides to rely on the papers, counsel's proffer of contrary proof of challenge to the accuracy of the facts or diagnoses in the papers can force the petitioner to put on live testimony. See Barnard, 455 F.2d at 1375.

detention and will rely primarily on the information in the § 521 application and § 522 certificate to establish the circumstances of admission. Similarly, the witness will typically rely on the notes by ward staff contained in the medical record to establish the respondent's behavior since admission.

Hearsay is admissible, but where the declarant is unknown or of uncertain reliability, or where the hearsay is second- or third-hand, the court may sustain an objection to its coming into evidence to establish the truth of the matters asserted.

Occasionally, the petitioner will call a family member, a police officer, an officer-agent, a case manager, or another member of the hospital staff to testify. Generally, if asked, the petitioner's counsel will inform the respondent's counsel who the witnesses are prior to the beginning of the hearing.

d. Respondent's case

The respondent is entitled to be represented by counsel, testify, present evidence, and examine witnesses at the § 21-525 hearing. See Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 2(f). Counsel may subpoena witnesses, id., or introduce affidavits. See Barnard, 455 F.2d at 1375. Under D.C. Code § 21-583, any psychiatrist, psychologist, or physician making application or conducting an examination pursuant to the Ervin Act can be compelled to give testimony.

Numerous avenues are available to the respondent to present favorable information to the court. As hearsay is usually accepted, the medical records may contain information supporting the respondent's position.[18] If the doctor testifies on the petitioner's behalf, favorable information contained in the records may be elicited through cross-examination. In addition to cross-examination of the petitioner's expert, the respondent may present witnesses such as relatives, eyewitnesses to events upon which the admission was based, community-based treatment providers, and so on.[19] A showing of alternative reasons for behavior, community ties, employment, residence or treatment alternatives to hospitalization may influence the court. Because the essential question in the hearing is how the respondent would act if left at liberty, i.e., released from emergency detention, evidence showing how the respondent would live and act in the community is relevant. If the respondent is willing to transfer to a different hospital and has the means to do so, a social worker can be called to testify to these facts, because willingness to seek help on a voluntary basis is a factor for the court to consider in making a judicial determination of dangerousness. See Cross v. Harris, 418 F.2d at 1101.

[18] D.C. Code Section 21-562 requires the hospital to maintain "records detailing all medical and psychiatric care and treatment received by a person admitted for treatment as a voluntary, non-protesting, emergency or commited patient … and the records shall be made available [upon that person's written authorization] to the person's attorney …" See also D.C. Code §§ 7-1202.01, 1202.02, and 1202.06 (Mental Health Information Act); see Williams v. Robinson, 432 F.2d 637, 642-643 (D.C. Cir. 1970) ("[W]hen a patient at Saint Elizabeths seeks to challenge the legality of hospital decisions regarding the treatment accorded him or the manner of his confinement, the hospital may not rely upon information or explanations not in the patient's hospital record to justify its decision. . . .If the records are not adequate on their face, they may not be rehabilitated by a subsequent demonstration in court.")

[19] Because hearsay is admissible in this kind of hearing, a defense investigator may supply favorable information learned during the investigation from a source unable to testify.

Finally, the respondent may testify at the probable cause hearing. Whether the respondent takes the stand often depends upon his or her ability to make a credible showing. If the client insists on testifying against the advice of counsel, counsel must acquiesce. See supra Section II.F. Counsel should caution a client who has an open criminal case or a possible immigration problem that the client may risk self-incrimination or suffer other consequences if he or she testifies in the mental health case.

e. The hearing's conclusion

When the defense rests, most judges will allow summary argument by counsel before ruling. Barnard, 455 F.2d at 1375, suggests that the court state reasons for its finding on the record or in writing. If the court does not find probable cause, or if some other defect in the detention process requires the respondent's release, an entry on the court jacket will be sufficient to effect the client's release directly from the courtroom. The client, of course, may return to the hospital to seek admission on a voluntary basis without fear of commitment, see Blair, 510 A.2d at 1050-51, or to pick up his or her belongings, though doing so is not without risk of being subjected to a new emergency detention. See In re Barlow, 634 A.2d at 1250-51.

In re Strickland, 597 A.2d 869 (D.C. 1991)

3. Extension of Emergency Detention Beyond Seven Days

If the hospital files a timely petition for a respondent's judicial commitment pursuant to § 21-541, it may continue by operation of statute to detain a respondent who was involuntarily hospitalized pursuant to §§ 21-521 to 525. D.C. Code § 21-526(c). Absent such a timely filing, however, the respondent should be discharged immediately upon the expiration of the seven-day detention authorized by the § 21-524 order. In re Strickland, 597 A.2d 869 (D.C. 1991). In Strickland, the court made clear that the seven-day period covered by a § 524 order is measured "from the hour and minute" the order was signed, and the respondent is entitled to release at the end of seven 24-hour periods after entry of the § 524 order. 597 A.2d at 870; In re Reed, 571 A.2d 801 (D.C. 1990) (a § 21-541 petition filed more than 24 hours after the seven-day period had expired was untimely and respondent was entitled to be released; moreover, an intervening finding of probable cause at a § 21-525 hearing did not cure this defect); see also Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 2(g).

Extension of emergency detention under § 21-526(c), by the filing of a § 541 petition, is for a period of 21 days. The emergency detention may be extended beyond the 21-day period by the court for good cause. Generally, if both parties consent to continuation of proceedings before the Commission on Mental Health, the Commission will grant the extension and, accordingly, detention will be extended. The 21-day period may also be extended after a hearing before the Commission on Mental Health, pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-542, if the Commission has made findings that the respondent is mentally ill and dangerous. If the Commission finds that inpatient commitment is the least restrictive treatment alternative, the respondent's emergency detention will continue, pending conclusion of the commitment proceedings, until either the court discharges the respondent or the Department or hospital detaining the respondent determines that inpatient treatment is no longer the least restrictive treatment setting. D.C. Code § 21-526(d). If the Commission finds that outpatient commitment is the least restrictive treatment alternative, then the respondent's emergency detention must end no later than 14 days after the finding. The respondent must be released to outpatient treatment. D.C. Code § 21-526(e).

The filing of a § 21-541 petition does not negate a respondent's right to a § 21-525 hearing, see In re Glymph, 102 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 2365 (D.C. Super. Ct. Nov. 1, 1974), and the court may order that the respondent be discharged from the hospital at the end of a § 525 hearing, even if a § 21-541 petition has been filed in the case. (Customarily, the petitioner will not prosecute the § 21-541 petition if probable cause is not found at the § 21-525 hearing, though the petitioner is legally entitled to do so.)

C. Nature and Function of Commission on Mental Health

Proceedings for the one-year commitment of individuals commence with the filing of a petition for commitment, pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-541, with the Commission on Mental Health. The Commission on Mental Health is composed of nine members: a magistrate judge of the Superior Court, who is the chairperson, and eight physicians or psychologists, who serve part-time. D.C. Code § 21-502(a), (c). The Commission hears cases in which a § 21-541 petition has been filed. D.C. Code § 21-542(a). The Commission sits in panels of three, consisting of the chairperson and two physician/psychologist members who serve in teams of two that change every three months. The Commission on Mental Health has an office in the District of Columbia Superior Courthouse, fourth floor, and all pleadings before the Commission are filed in the Mental Health/Mental Retardation Branch of the Family Court.

Section 21-502 describes the Commission's organization, its composition, and the appointment and terms of its members. Section 21-503 describes the Commission's general purposes, subpoena powers, and the location of its hearings. The purpose, mode, and scope of the hearings are governed by §§ 21-542 and 21-544 and Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3. The form, content, and filing of the Commission's report to the court are governed by § 21-544 and Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(b).

D. Commencement of Mental Health Commission Phase

1. Who May Be the Subject of a Section 21-541 Petition

Proceedings for the commitment or court-ordered hospitalization of a person alleged to be mentally ill are commenced when an authorized person files an appropriate petition pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-541 with the D.C. Commission on Mental Health at Superior Court. A petition may be filed against a person who is temporarily hospitalized as an involuntary emergency patient pursuant to §§ 21-521 to 524, or against a person who is at liberty in the community. In addition, a person admitted to the hospital on a nonprotesting basis, pursuant to § 21-513, may be the subject of a § 21-541 petition before making a written request for release. D.C. Code § 21-514.

As a rule, a hospital may not file a § 21-541 petition on a person who is voluntarily receiving inpatient psychiatric care. See D.C. Code § 21-512; Curry II, 470 F.2d 368 (D.C. Cir. 1972).

But see In re Clark, 700 A.2d 781, 784 (D.C. 1997) (hospital may petition for commitment of "voluntary" patient who has been charged with a crime and found incompetent to stand trial).

A petition may also be filed against a defendant in a criminal case who has been found incompetent to proceed and unlikely to regain competence. D.C. Code § 24-531.06(c)(4). The Supreme Court in Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715, 738 (1972), held that where a trial court finds the defendant not likely to regain competence, the defendant must be released unless the government institutes civil commitment proceedings. Id. In this jurisdiction, unless the government seeks civil commitment by filing a § 541 petition within 30 days of the Jackson finding, the defendant must be released. D.C. Code § 24-531.07(a)(1); Thomas v. United States, 418 A.2d 122, 126-27 (D.C. 1980).[20] The fact that the incompetent defendant had been a voluntary inpatient pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-511 at the time of the criminal charge is irrelevant when a § 21-541 petition is filed. See In re Clark, 700 A.2d 781, 786 (D.C. 1997).

The Federal Reservation Act, D.C. Code §§ 21-901-909, authorizes, under certain circumstances, the temporary detention of persons alleged to be mentally ill who have been found on federal reservations within Maryland and Virginia counties neighboring the District of Columbia. These reservations include Washington Dulles International Airport and Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport. The Act, as interpreted in Bension v. Meredith, 455 F. Supp. 662 (D.D.C. 1978), and Medynski v. Margolis, 389 F. Supp. 743 (D.D.C. 1975) (three-judge court), authorizes a magistrate in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to commit such persons to St. Elizabeth's Hospital for a maximum of 30 days upon finding mental illness and likelihood of injury to self or others. Counsel assigned by the magistrate at the detention hearing represent these individuals. For more information on proceedings under the Federal Reservation Act, counsel should contact the Special Proceedings Section of the U.S. Attorney's Office, which prosecutes these cases. Once the temporary commitment, usually to St. Elizabeth's Hospital, is ordered, the hospital may initiate proceedings in Superior Court to have the detained person adjudicated mentally ill under the laws of the District of Columbia. See D.C. Code § 21-906(b). Thus, a § 21-541 petition may be filed against a patient held involuntarily under the Federal Reservation Act.

2. Who May File a Section 21-541 Petition

There are no court rules and only one Court of Appeals decision governing the filing of a § 21-541 petition. A § 21-541 petition may be filed by: (1) a person's spouse; (2) his or her parent or legal guardian; (3) a physician or qualified psychologist, see Dobbs v. Duncan, 458 A.2d 719 (D.C. 1983); (4) a duly accredited officer or agent of the D.C. Department of Mental Health; (5) the Director of the Department of Mental Health or the Director's designee; or (6) an officer authorized to make arrests in the District of Columbia. If a person is at liberty at the time of filing, i.e., an "off-the-street" case, the petitioner is usually the respondent's spouse, parent, or legal guardian. See infra section 6. If the respondent is hospitalized at the time of filing, the petitioner is usually the superintendent of the hospital, the respondent's treating physician from the hospital, or a designee of the Director of the Department of Mental Health.

[20] The District's law governing competence to proceed in criminal cases was substantially revised in 2004. The new law contains provisions regarding detention of an incompetent defendant pending civil commitment and the effect of civil commitment on pending criminal charges. See supra Chapter 3.

3. What Must Be Included in a Section 21-541 Petition

A § 21-541 petition must include a certificate of either a physician or a qualified psychologist stating that he or she has examined the respondent and is of the opinion that the respondent is mentally ill and, due to this illness, likely to injure self or others if allowed to remain at liberty. Alternatively, the petition may include a sworn, written statement that the petitioner has good reason to believe that the respondent is mentally ill and, because of this illness, is likely to injure self or others, and that the respondent has refused to submit to examination by a physician or qualified psychologist.[21] See D.C. Code § 21-541(a) (2004); In re (Stanley) Johnson, 699 A.2d 362, 364 (D.C. 1997).

Because the Ervin Act is concerned with the respondent's present mental status, see In re Lomax, 386 A.2d 1185 (D.C. 1978) (en banc), a petition based on facts that occurred substantially prior to the filing of the petition may be deemed stale. Furthermore, a petition should provide constitutionally adequate notice in order that the respondent may prepare a defense. A petition that is vague or conclusory and fails to describe precisely the facts upon which it is based may violate the respondent's right to due process of law. See Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418 (1979).

If the petition is based upon a physician's or psychologist's certificate, the certificate "shall set forth in detail the facts and reasons on which the physician or qualified psychologist based his opinions and conclusions." D.C. Code § 21-582(b). The certificate "may not be considered unless it is based on personal observation and examination of the [alleged mentally ill] person made by the physician or qualified psychologist not more than 72 hours prior to the making of the . . . certificate." Id. But see Dobbs v. Duncan, 458 A.2d at 721 ("[Section] 582(b) does not require that a petition filed by the [hospital] superintendent and accompanied by a certificate of an examining physician also reflect that the superintendent personally examined the patient"). Furthermore, similar to the procedure for the filing of a petition for emergency detention, the physician or psychologist executing the certificate may not be related to the respondent, be financially interested in the hospital in which the respondent will be detained, or, except in the case of a physician or psychologist employed by the government, be professionally or officially connected to the hospital. D.C. Code § 21-582(a).

4. Notice

Section 21-541(b) provides that within three days after the Commission receives a § 21-541 petition, a copy of the petition shall be sent to the respondent by registered mail. It is important for counsel for a respondent to investigate whether the respondent has actually received a copy of the petition and the means by which the petition was served, and to note any objections to the case proceeding until service is sufficiently proved.

[21] Any allegation that the respondent refused to submit to an examination should be carefully investigated.

5. Motions to Dismiss

The only general rule governing motions practice in mental health cases is Super. Ct. Mental Health R. 14. In addition, Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 12(d) incorporates into all proceedings before the Commission or the Court Rule 12-I (e) of the Superior Court Rules of Civil Procedure. As a matter of custom, motions to dismiss §21-541 petitions are generally filed with the Mental Health Clerk's office and heard by the Chair of the Commission, who is a magistrate judge for the Family Court. The Commission, if counsel requests, will usually continue the Commission hearing until after the motion is decided.

6. Procedures for "Off the Street" Petitions

When a § 21-541 petition is filed by a family member or guardian regarding a person who is at liberty, the petition and supporting affidavit are forwarded to the Mental Health Commission, which schedules a preliminary screening hearing. Notice of the hearing is required to be sent to the respondent. At the hearing, which is conducted on the record, the Commission will hear testimony and take other evidence from the petitioner and other witnesses about the allegations in the petition. If the Commission determines that there is sufficient evidence to support the petition, the Commission will report this to the Superior Court and ask the court to have notice of a preliminary examination and hearing before the Mental Health Commission sent to the respondent, ask that counsel be appointed to represent the respondent, and ask that a subpoena be issued directing the respondent to appear for the examination by the Commission. These procedures are the result of the decision in In re (Stanley) Johnson, 699 A.2d 362, 370 (D.C. 1997). The respondent is not represented by counsel at the preliminary screening hearing, but evidence presented at that hearing may have an impact on the decision of the Commission on Mental Health later. Accordingly, counsel may want to request a transcript of the preliminary screening hearing prior to the hearing on the § 541 petition. Unless a petitioner has retained counsel, the "private petitioner" (family member or guardian) is not usually represented by counsel in proceedings before the Mental Health Commission.

E. The Mental Health Commission Hearing

1. Nature, Form, and Scope of the Proceeding

After a § 21-541 petition has been filed, D.C. Code § 21-542 directs the Commission to examine the respondent promptly, hold a prompt hearing on the issue of the respondent's mental illness, and hold a hearing to determine who is liable under D.C. Code § 21-586 for the expense of the respondent's hospitalization if hospitalization[22] is ordered. The hearing on financial liability may be held separately from the hearing on mental health and, if it is conducted separately, may be conducted by the chairperson alone. D.C. Code § 21-542(b). In practice the hearing on liability will be held only if the Office of the Attorney General petitions for a determination of financial responsibility.[23]

[22] Commitment may include inpatient treatment, outpatient treatment, and any range of treatment alternatives. See Lake v. Cameron, 364 F.2d 657, 659 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

[23] Section 21-586 instructs the Commission to ascertain the ability of the respondent and his parents, spouse, or adult children "to maintain or contribute toward the maintenance of the mentally ill person." In reality, the Commission

Typically, hearings before the Mental Health Commission are scheduled no more than three weeks after a petition for judicial commitment under § 21-541 has been filed. This should allow counsel and the respondent adequate time to prepare for the hearing. Respondents who are hospitalized pursuant to D.C. Code §§ 21-521 through 21-524 will continue to be detained pending the Commission hearing. Section 21-543 states that the court or the Commission may, at the request of respondent's counsel, grant a five-day recess of the hearing to give counsel time to prepare. The Commission may also grant continuances for up to 14 days if good cause is shown. D.C. Code § 21-543(b). The chairperson of the Commission will usually agree to a continuance for one two-week period if all the parties are notified and a written continuance request is presented before the day of the Commission hearing. In practice, the chairperson of the Commission will grant additional brief continuance requests for good cause shown, but after two or three requests will ask counsel to appear and put the request on the record.

All hearings before the Mental Health Commission must be conducted in a manner consistent with orderly procedure. D.C. Code § 21-542(a). The general public is excluded from the proceedings, though someone interested in the work of the Commission or a particular case may, upon application, be admitted to the hearing if respondent's counsel consents and the applicant agrees to maintain the confidentiality of the proceeding. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(1).

Any person whose testimony may be relevant shall be heard and the Commission shall receive all relevant evidence offered. D.C. Code § 21-542(a). The Commission will impose the Rule on Witnesses upon request of counsel or upon its own initiative. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2).

Section 21-544 directs the Commission to make findings on two issues: whether the respondent is mentally ill and, if so, whether he or she is likely to injure self or others if not committed. See supra Section III. In addition, the court rules direct the Commission to consider dispositional alternatives less restrictive than hospital commitment. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(C).

2. Setting for Hearing

The Commission is authorized to conduct its examinations and hearings either at the courthouse or elsewhere at its discretion. See D.C. Code § 21-503(b). Most hearings are held at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, but whenever a respondent is detained or confined at another hospital or institution, the Commission will travel to the respondent. All proceedings before the Commission must be recorded. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(A).

3. Waiver of hearing

The respondent may choose to waive his right to a hearing on the § 541 petition and agree to accept the petitioner's recommendation of commitment. With rare exceptions, the respondent must appear before the Commission to state present a waiver on the record. The chair of the rarely addresses the respondent's ability to pay for treatment at its hearings and, if commitment is recommended, a proposed order will be attached to the Commission's final report to the court in which the final paragraph orders "[t]hat the expense for the Respondent's care and treatment provided by the Department of Mental Health shall be borne by the District of Columbia, without prejudice to the District of Columbia's right to claim reimbursement in full from the estate of the Respondent or others, as provided by law."

Commission will inquire of the respondent in order to determine whether the waiver is made knowingly and voluntarily. The respondent will be required to participate in a preliminary examination by the Commission doctors prior to appearing on the record to present a waiver. The decision to waive the right to a hearing before the Commission is a respondent's decision and counsel must abide by the respondent's choice, neither proceeding over the respondent's objection, nor waiving the right to a hearing absent the client's direction to do so. See supra Section II.F.

If the petitioner is seeking a commitment to outpatient treatment, the record should be made clear that the respondent understands the difference between outpatient commitment under D.C. Code § 21-545 and outpatient voluntary treatment under D.C. Code § 21-511.

Even if the respondent states that he or she has no objection to commitment, the commitment would not be final. The respondent, as discussed below, will still receive the Commission's final report and recommendation and have an opportunity to contest or agree to treatment under a court order.

4. Hearing and Procedure

a. Preliminary examination

Section 21-542(a) requires the Commission to examine the respondent after the filing of the § 21-541 petition. The Commission doctors usually conduct this examination on the same date of the hearing, just prior to the hearing. The Commission members typically have refused to permit counsel to be present during these examinations. They also have refused to conduct the examinations on the record, with or without counsel present, and to state on the record at the close of their deliberations any facts that they learned during the examination and upon which they relied in forming their conclusions. These examination procedures have been upheld in In re Holmes, 422 A.2d 969 (D.C. 1980).

The typical "preliminary examination" consists of an unrecorded conversation between the doctor members of the Commission and the respondent in a private room near the hearing room.[24] During this five to ten minute examination, the doctor members may ask the respondent fact questions – date, place, reason for hospitalization, names of presidents, etc. – aimed at determining the respondent's general mental condition. Occasionally, a Commission doctor may seek to test the respondent's capacity for abstract thinking by asking the respondent to interpret one or more proverbs or by asking the respondent what he or she would do in a given situation. See Myrl R. S. Manley, M.D., "Psychiatric Interview, History, and Mental Status Examination," in 1 Kaplan & Sadock's Comprehensive Textbook of Psychiatry, 652-665 (7th ed. 2000).

[24] The parameters of the Commission's examination of the respondent have not been clearly delineated. The legislative history of the Ervin Act suggests that this preliminary examination should be limited to an interview-style examination. Nonetheless, in one case, the Commission sought to compel a respondent to undergo neurological and psychological testing to determine an exact diagnosis and make recommendations as to appropriate treatment. The Court of Appeals rejected the Commission's request for a continuance and compulsory testing, however, because the Commission had already made findings that the respondent was mentally ill and dangerous. The lower court was directed to set the case for trial. Anderson v. Hess, No. 87-380 (D.C. July 14, 1987) (order denying writ of mandamus).

In addition to this interview, the Commission doctors may attempt to review the respondent's medical record, though the current Chair of the Commission generally sustains counsel's objections to this practice on the theory that the physician members may inquire of the hospital's witnesses on the record, in contrast to reviewing medical records during the preliminary examination, which is not on the record. If the doctor members of the Commission have reviewed a respondent's medical records before counsel had an opportunity to object, i.e., before the beginning of the hearing, then counsel should inquire of the doctor members during the hearing as to what documents were reviewed and what information is being relied on by the doctors in making a decision on the § 541 petition.

The preliminary examination is an important part of the Commission proceedings because the results will form part of the basis for the Commission's findings and recommendations to the court. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(b)(2). In addition, a doctor member of the Commission may be called as a witness at a trial or final hearing and may refer to facts learned during the preliminary examination as a basis for his or her opinion. D.C. Code 21-583; See also In re Morrow, 463 A.2d 689, 691 (D.C. 1983).

If the respondent wishes not to participate in the examination, the Commission will abide by the respondent's decision. Counsel should advise the Chair of the Commission of the client's decision in advance of the hearing to assure the examination is not attempted. If the respondent has no objection to the examination, but does not want to come to the hearing or examination room, the doctor members of the Commission may be willing, upon counsel's request, to examine the respondent on a hospital ward or another location. If the respondent chooses to participate in the examination, counsel should prepare him or her in advance and advise the respondent to invoke the privilege against self-incrimination if the doctors question him or her about privileged matters or pending criminal charges.

b. Presence of Respondent at Hearing

Once the examination is conducted, the respondent may, in his or her discretion, be present at the hearing to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses. D.C. Code § 21-542(a). When a respondent who is at liberty in the community fails to attend a hearing of which he or she received notice and a subpoena, the chairperson historically has sought a court order by writ of attachment to the U.S. Marshal to bring the respondent to the next hearing to be examined under section 21-542(a). Prior to issuance of such an order, the respondent should have an opportunity to challenge the subpoena, in accordance with the decision in In re (Stanley) Johnson, 699 A.2d 362, 370-71 (D.C. 1997).

If the respondent elects to attend the hearing, the respondent may not be excluded unless he or she conducts him or herself in a manner that is so disorderly and disruptive of the hearing that it cannot be carried on in the respondent's presence. See Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(D). If the respondent elects to waive his presence at the hearing, the Commission will hear arguments, receive testimony from witnesses and receive other evidence, deliberate, and announce its decision outside of the respondent's presence.

c. Rule on witnesses

Upon the request of counsel, or on its own initiative, the Commission may impose the Rule on Witnesses. See Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(D).

d. Opening statement

Counsel has the right to make an opening statement at the hearing. See Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(B).

e. Petitioner's case

The statute and the rules contain no reference to petitioner's counsel appearing at the Commission hearing. An attorney from the Attorney General's office represents the Department of Mental Health at Commission hearings. Occasionally, a private petitioner will appear with retained counsel. A private petitioner has no right to have his or her case prosecuted by a public prosecutor. See In re Kossow, 393 A.2d 97 (D.C. 1978).

In the majority of cases, where the petitioner is the Department of Mental Health and the respondent is hospitalized prior to the hearing, the primary witness against the respondent is the treating psychiatrist from the hospital. The petitioner will offer these witnesses as expert witnesses. Occasionally, the hospital will send either a new doctor whose credentials are not known to respondent's counsel, or a psychiatric resident, i.e., a doctor in training to become a psychiatrist, to testify at a Commission hearing. In those instances, counsel may want to explore the doctor's qualifications to testify as an expert, including questions regarding the doctor's licensure status in the District of Columbia. In a number of instances, psychiatric residents have not been licensed to practice medicine in D.C. and, therefore, may not be allowed to testify as experts. See Joseph v. Board of Med., 587 A.2d 1085 (D.C. 1991).

The doctor's testimony may include information acquired from the admission papers, review of the medical record, and personal examinations and observations of the respondent. The doctor's testimony may be supplemented by that of family members, ward staff, and sometimes the officer who applied for the respondent's emergency admission, or staff from an outpatient clinic where the respondent had received treatment prior to hospitalization.

Respondent's counsel will have the opportunity to cross-examine any witnesses. The medical records may contain information that contradicts, undermines, or weakens the witnesses' testimony. Respondent's counsel should be familiar with the respondent's current hospitalization records and, to the extent possible, prior hospitalization and/or outpatient treatment records, and should be prepared to question the witness regarding content of the records.

When counsel have finished examining and cross-examining a witness, the physician/ psychologist members of the Commission are given an opportunity to ask questions. See D.C. Code § 21-542(a).

f. Respondent's case

The respondent is entitled to testify, but may also choose not to testify. See D.C. Code § 21-542(a). Counsel will be allowed to examine the respondent and petitioner's counsel will be allowed to cross-examine the respondent. Then the members of the Commission may ask the respondent questions.

The respondent is also entitled to present witnesses. See id.

At the close of the evidence, counsel for both sides may make closing arguments. See Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(B).

g. Standard of proof

Neither the Ervin Act nor the Mental Health Rules explicitly set forth a standard of proof for the Mental Health Commission. Consequently, the Commission has refused to adopt a standard of proof on its own. See In re Holmes, 422 A.2d 969, 971 (D.C. 1980).

h. Commission findings and report

At the conclusion of the testimony and argument, the Commission determines by majority vote whether the respondent is mentally ill and, if so, whether the respondent is likely to injure self or others as a result of mental illness if not committed. See D.C. Code § 21-544; Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(E). If the Commission decides that the respondent is not mentally ill or not dangerous as a result of mental illness, the respondent is entitled to immediate release. The fact of the respondent's release is later reported to the court. See D.C. Code § 21-544; Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2).[25] If the Commission decides to recommend commitment, it must orally and in writing advise the respondent of his or her right to demand a jury trial. See D.C. Code § 21-544; Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2). The Commission will usually also advise the respondent of its recommendation for inpatient commitment, outpatient commitment, or an alternative form of treatment.

Alternatively, the Commission may decide to continue the case if it cannot reach a conclusion about the respondent's mental illness or dangerousness. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(E). This may occur when there is a need for more evidence or when the doctor requests postponement in expectation that the respondent will be converted to voluntary status or placed in the community before the next hearing. Generally, a continuance will not be granted over the respondent's objection.[26]

[25] A respondent may opt to remain at the hospital or in treatment on a voluntary basis, under D.C. Code § 21-511. If that is the respondent's plan, counsel should make that clear on the record before the respondent returns to the hospital ward or outpatient clinic to avoid having to physically leave the facility and seek voluntary admission.

[26] The Commission may not continue a case if it has found the respondent mentally ill and likely to injure self or others. Such findings trigger the respondent's right to trial. See Anderson v. Hess, No. 87-380 (M.H. No. 409-86) (D.C. Super. Ct. July 14, 1987) (order denying writ of mandamus). Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(E) authorizes the Commission, at the close of its deliberations, to continue the hearing. This decision is committed to the Commissioner's discretion, though the Commission rarely continues a case over the respondent's objections. If the Commission recommends a continuance for further evaluation or treatment over the respondent's objection, it may

Within five days of the hearing, the Commission must report its findings of fact, conclusions of law, and recommendations to the court, and a copy of the report must be personally served on the respondent and respondent's counsel. See D.C. Code § 21-544; Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(b).

Rule 3(b) sets out specific requirements regarding the contents of the Commission's report. For example, the report must specify which alternatives to hospitalization were considered by the Commission in making its commitment recommendation. In addition, each member of the Commission panel must sign the report and, if any member dissents from the findings and recommendation, that fact will be included in the report.

If counsel has objections to the contents of the report, an informal written request that the Commission amend the report to conform to the rules and to the record in the case should be sent to the chairperson. If this approach fails to settle the matter, counsel should request that the court order the Commission to amend the report. When the court is dissatisfied with a Commission report, it may require that the report be supplemented. See D.C. Code § 21-545(a); Lake v. Cameron, 364 F.2d at 662 n.18 (1966); Kossow, 393 A.2d at 107.

VI. JUDICIAL PHASE: TRIAL, TRIAL WAIVER AND DISPOSITION HEARING

A. Introduction

Once the Mental Health Commission has made its final report and recommendations, the Ervin Act provides a respondent with two options for judicial review of his or her legal status. The respondent may request a de novo trial by jury or the court to contest a recommendation of commitment. D.C. Code §§ 21-544 to 545. Alternatively, the respondent may agree to have the court review the Commission's report and enter a finding based on that report, a knowing and voluntary waiver of jury trial rights, and any other evidence that the court wishes to hear. § 21-545(a). When no trial is requested, the final hearing will be scheduled for the "open court" calendar.

B. Assertion or Waiver of Jury Trial Right

A trial must be requested within five days of the date on which the respondent is personally served with the Commission's final report and notice of final hearing. See D.C. Code § 21-545; Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 4(d). The trial demand may be made by the respondent or by any other person on the respondent's behalf. Note that the five-day period is not counted from the day of the Commission hearing, but from the day of actual service of the Commission's report on the respondent. This date may be two or three weeks after the Commission hearing is held.

The request for trial is usually made by filing a praecipe with the court. However, if the circumstances require, the demand can also be made in open court. A jury demand is presumed be exceeding its authority. The continuance of a hearing for the purpose of further treatment and a possible change of status bear no relation to the statutory duties of the Commission. The question of what course of treatment is to be ordered is a decision committed to the court, not to the Commission. See D.C. Code § 21-545(b). Extended continuances act to deprive the respondent of a prompt trial, because a recommendation of a commitment, not a continuance, is needed to trigger the respondents' right to a jury trial. See § 21-545(a).

to be for a 12-person jury unless the parties stipulate to a smaller number. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 16(c).

There are no rules or cases governing a respondent's waiver of his or her right to trial. A trial waiver may consist of a written statement, preferably sworn, by the respondent, which counsel presents to the court. Alternatively, the respondent may waive his or her trial right on the record at the open-court hearing.[27]

Generally, those respondents who elect not to have a trial also agree to the disposition proposed in the Mental Health Commission report. In this case the disposition hearing will be held concurrently with the open court review and the court will sign the order of commitment reflecting the Mental Health Commission's recommendation.

C. Alternative Response to Section 21-544 Report

1. Section 21-545 Hearing

Section 21-545(a) requires that if no timely trial demand is made, the court must hold a hearing to make an independent determination of the respondent's mental condition. An order of commitment may be entered only if the court finds there is clear and convincing evidence that the respondent is both mentally ill and likely to injure self or others as a result of the mental illness. See In re Holmes, 422 A.2d at 972; In re Walls, 442 F.2d 749, 751 (D.C. Cir. 1971). A trial court has the authority at a § 21-545(a) hearing to evaluate the transcript of the Mental Health Commission hearing and to reject the Commission report. Id. at 750.[28] Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 4 requires that this hearing be held as soon as practicable after the Mental Health Commission hearing.[29] Mental Health Rule 6 requires that a disposition hearing be held immediately after the final hearing.

2. Request for Disposition Hearing

A respondent who is not contesting the Mental Health Commission finding that he or she is mentally ill and dangerous may still wish to contest the type of commitment that has been recommended by asking for a formal disposition hearing pursuant to D.C. Code § 21-545(b) and

---

[27] Most of the time, the judge presiding over mental health cases will conduct a fairly detailed inquiry of the respondent to determine if the respondent knowingly and voluntarily waives his or her right to a trial and agrees to a court order directing the respondent to receive treatment for a one-year period. The Mental Health Division of the Public Defender Service can provide sample trial waivers for both inpatient and outpatient commitment.

[28] Whenever the Commission determines that a respondent should be committed, a copy of the transcript of the Commission hearing must be furnished to counsel for indigent respondents upon request. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(F).

[29] If the Mental Health Commission recommended outpatient commitment, the respondent must be released from the hospital within 14 days of the Commission hearing. D.C. Code § 21-526(c). This often means that the respondent will have left the hospital prior to the status hearing in Superior Court at which counsel may have requested a trial or waived trial, on the respondent's behalf. The respondent has the right to be present at the status hearing in court if a trial date is being selected, and has the right not to be present if accepting commitment. However, most judges are reluctant to accept a trial waiver from counsel without the respondent being present.

Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 6. The purpose of a disposition hearing is to determine the type of commitment, i.e., inpatient hospitalization, outpatient treatment, nursing home, etc. See infra Section VI.E.

D. The Trial

1. Introduction

A relatively small percentage of mental health cases go to trial. Most cases are resolved either by dismissal of the case when the respondent becomes a voluntary patient or is discharged, or by the respondent's waiving his or her right to trial and agreeing to commitment. In most cases in which there is a trial, the case is tried before a jury. However, some respondents elect to have their cases heard by the court sitting without a jury. In a trial by the court, the respondent has the same rights and the law is the same as in a jury trial. At a bench trial, the respondent is entitled to have the court make specific findings of fact instead of a general verdict. See Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 5(c).

2. Statutes and Court Rules

D.C. Code § 11-2605(a) (ex parte request for investigator, expert witness)

4. Limited Discovery

The Mental Health Rules provide for an informal exchange of information between the parties in a commitment trial, to be provided on a schedule that is set by the court. See Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 17. Each party must disclose the name and qualification of any expert witness whom the party intends to call at trial and a written summary of the witness's opinions and the bases for the opinions. In addition, the party must provide any report, record, or other document upon which the expert relied in forming the opinion. Upon request, a party must provide test data and test materials used in forming an opinion. Test data and materials are to be provided only to the opposing party's expert and to counsel, and must be returned at the conclusion of the trial to the party who produced the material.

The petitioner is obligated to provide written notification to the respondent of the incidents upon which it intends to rely at trial to establish likelihood of injury to self or others. The respondent must then notify the petitioner of any incidents that will be disputed at trial. Both parties are required to supplement or correct disclosures prior to trial.

A copy of the transcript of the Commission hearing must be furnished to counsel for indigent respondents upon request. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 3(a)(2)(F).

5. Burden and Standard of Proof

The burden of proof in all mental health trials is on the petitioner to show by clear and convincing evidence that the respondent is mentally ill and likely to injure self or others as a result of mental illness if not committed. See Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 5(a); Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418 (1979); In re Nelson, 408 A.2d 1233 (D.C. 1979).

6. Voir Dire

The Mental Health Rules do not cover voir dire of prospective jurors. However, Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 12(d) incorporates Super. Ct. Civil R. 47 and 47-I, which govern voir dire and peremptory challenges. The respondent, through voir dire, may want to elicit the views of prospective jurors on the connections between mental illness and dangerousness, as well as the connection between mental illness and a need for treatment, regardless of dangerousness. Sample voir dire questions may be obtained from the Mental Health Division of the Public Defender Service and the Mental Health Division of the Office of the Attorney General, located at St. Elizabeth's Hospital.

Because of the broad range of behaviors that could be included in a definition of dangerousness in mental health proceedings, voir dire may need to include questions that cover specific areas unique to the case, which the petitioner will suggest supports a finding of dangerousness. For example, if the respondent was homeless prior to hospitalization, counsel may want to ask prospective jurors whether any of them believe that a person without a fixed address or who lives in a shelter is more likely to be mentally ill than the general population, or that a person who is described as a street person or homeless is more likely to injure himself or others or is placing himself in harm's way because of his lifestyle, or that a person who is described as homeless is unable to care for herself, or that a person who does not have a fixed address or who lives in a shelter should be hospitalized or housed in a mental institution. While the petitioner may object to such unique voir dire, the trial court frequently has overruled such objections when the respondent proffers the relevance of the issues raised in the questions. In addition, the respondent may object to the petitioner's voir dire where it misstates the law. See In re Artis, 615 A.2d at 1152.

7. Expert Testimony

a. Introduction

Counsel should be prepared to deal with psychiatric and psychological experts because their testimony will form the principal element in the petitioner's case and may well be an important part of the defense. Counsel for an indigent respondent can make an ex parte request for authorization of funds to hire an expert to examine his or her client in preparation for trial pursuant to D.C. Code § 11-2605(a). Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 12(b); In re Morrow, 463 A.2d at 692.

The criteria for admitting expert testimony are set forth in Dyas v. United States, 376 A.2d 827, 832 (D.C. 1977). But see Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993) (rejecting general acceptance portion of Dyas test). For general background information on psychiatric and psychological expert testimony, counsel should look at Ziskin & Faust, Coping with Psychiatric and Psychological Testimony (4th ed. 1988). This three-volume book includes examples of voir dire to qualify a witness as an expert, descriptions of psychological tests, and numerous samples of direct and cross-examination of an expert. In addition, counsel should be well-acquainted with the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (4th ed. Text Revision 2000) (DSM-IV-TR). Other references include Gary B. Melton et al., Psychological Evaluations for the Courts: A Handbook for Mental Health Professionals and Lawyers (2nd ed. 1997).

b. Psychiatric testimony on dangerousness

Expert psychiatric testimony on dangerousness is probably one of the most important and difficult problems that arise during a mental health trial. In its en banc decision in In re Melton, 597 A.2d 892, 899-900 (D.C. 1991), the Court of Appeals ruled that a psychiatric witness who qualified as an expert in the treatment and diagnosis of mental illness was also qualified to give expert opinion testimony on whether a respondent would be dangerous to self or others in the future if the respondent failed to take prescribed psychiatric medications.[30] The court in Melton determined that psychiatrists are routinely called upon, under the Ervin Act, to make dangerousness assessments, and that they are capable of doing so because of their education and training in the treatment and diagnosis of mental illness. Melton identifies cross-examination as the means to undercut an expert's predictive ability, and any success will result in the jury assigning less weight to the testimony, rather than keeping it from being admitted before the jury.

c. Hearsay bases of expert testimony

The Court of Appeals, sitting en banc, in Melton also stated that a psychiatric expert may rely on, and testify concerning, otherwise inadmissible hearsay[31] as a basis for the expert's opinion if the trial judge determines that experts in the field commonly rely on that particular type of hearsay information in addressing the specific type of problem raised in the case before the court, but should exclude expert opinion, including the facts and data upon which it relies (even if of a type reasonably relied on most of the time), if admission into evidence would create a substantial danger of undue prejudice or would mislead the jury. 597 A.2d at 906. This analysis is consistent with the method of evaluating expert opinion testimony under Fed. R. Evid. 703, including the requirement that the trial court must determine as a threshold matter "that minimal standards of reliability have been met." Id.

However, a court need not make this explicit finding when the psychiatrist or psychologist is relying on information from family members or hospital records, which are "customarily relied on by" such experts. In re Artis, 615 A.2d at 1151-52. For example, the Court of Appeals recognized that not "everything a family member tells a psychiatrist is necessarily reliable or true"; thus, the trial court may be asked to determine whether the expert has "the necessary skill to evaluate any second-hand information" and whether the information meets the minimal standard of reliability for admissibility. In re Melton, 597 A.2d at 903.

[30] In Melton, the court noted that the expert's opinion on the respondent's likely dangerousness was so intertwined with allegations that the respondent would fail, "when not under the hospital's supervision, to take psychotropic medicine with the requisite regularity," that it defied "common sense to suggest that a lay juror knows as much as a qualified psychiatrist does about what is likely to happen if a schizophrenic patient does not receive" his medication. 597 A.2d at 898. The narrow basis for the court's holding, tied as it is to medication, may leave room to formulate questions in the qualification phase showing that the witness is not qualified to predict future dangerousness in a case where medication is not an issue. But see In re Artis, 615 A.2d at 1151.

[31] In some instances, the hearsay bases of an expert's opinion might be admissible under an exception to the hearsay rule. See In re Samuels, 507 A.2d at 154.

In permitting psychiatric experts wide latitude in testifying about the bases for their opinions, the Court of Appeals in Melton acknowledged that the jury is being asked to do a difficult thing, to consider hearsay only to evaluate the opinion given by an expert witness and not to consider the hearsay as evidence in itself. Id. at 901. Accordingly, counsel should consider filing a pre-trial motion in limine. Motions in limine can and should be used to address the issue of prejudice that may result from an expert's reliance on otherwise inadmissible hearsay, and to clarify whether a particular hearsay basis is reasonably relied upon by an expert. Id. at 907 n.29. In addition, if a fact witness could be made available to testify about the hearsay basis of the expert's testimony, counsel should make a record on that issue and ask the court to "condition admission of the expert testimony . . . on the [petitioner's] also calling the [fact witness] to testify and on its making her available for cross-examination." Id. at 907.

d. Limiting instruction to jury and expert

Counsel may want to ask the court to instruct an expert witness in front of the jury right before the testimony is presented. Such instruction informs the jury and the witness of the special rules that govern expert testimony. See infra Chapter 29: Experts.

Counsel should ask the court to instruct the jury immediately before or after the psychiatric expert testifies. This instruction emphasizes for the jurors that much of the doctor's testimony may be hearsay and that it is not evidence for the jurors to rely upon in reaching a verdict, but merely information that the doctor relied upon in forming an opinion. See Standardized Civil Jury Instructions for the District of Columbia No. 3-3 (Rev. ed. 1998). Although a psychiatrist may testify as to his opinions on the respondent's mental condition and dangerousness, there is authority to support the argument that the petitioner also must present independent factual evidence to the fact-finder showing that the respondent is dangerous as a result of a mental illness. See In re James, 507 A.2d 155, 158 (D.C. 1986); In re Mendoza, 433 A.2d 1069, 1090-91 (D.C. 1981); In re Snowden, 423 A.2d 188, 192 (D.C. 1980); In re Penn, 443 F.2d 663, 666 (D.C. Cir. 1970).

The D.C. Court of Appeals has questioned the sufficiency of these limiting instructions in a mental health case. See In re Melton, 597 A.2d at 907; In re Samuels, 507 A.2d 150, 153 n.5 (D.C. 1986). A challenge to the effectiveness of these instructions might lie where the hearsay of an expert's testimony comes "to the jurors' attention in such a way that they might well have considered it for the truth of the out-of-court statement." Melton, 597 A.2d at 906.

8. Mental Health Commission Doctors as Witnesses

Counsel for the petitioner rarely calls Mental Health Commission doctors to testify at trial even though they are compellable witnesses at any mental health proceeding. See D.C. Code § 21-503. It is permissible, however, for a Commission doctor who expects to be called as a witness at a trial to reexamine the respondent before the trial without notice to respondent's counsel. In re Morrow, 463 A.2d at 692-93.

9. Jury Instructions

There are no standard jury instructions for civil commitment trials. The Mental Health Division of the Public Defender Service has sample jury instructions that it makes available to all mental health practitioners. Also, the Office of the Attorney General has a standard set of instructions it uses at trials that may be requested. The parties generally submit proposed instructions to the court prior to trial. See Super. Ct. Civ. R. 51. Prior to closing arguments, the judge will identify the instructions that he or she will give the jury. This is done on the record with the jury recessed to afford counsel an opportunity to object to any instructions he or she feels are inappropriate or misstate the law.[32] The language used in instructions is critical. Counsel should note objections to those instructions that misstate the law. At the very least, clearly stating objections to given instructions will preserve the issues should an appeal be necessary. Misstatement of the law in a jury instruction is clearly reversible error in civil commitment cases. See In re Mendoza, 433 A.2d at 1071-72. Accord In re Bumper, 441 A.2d 975, 978 (D.C. 1982).

Mental health cases are civil cases and many judges will use jury instructions from Standardized Civil Jury Instructions for the District of Columbia (Rev. ed. 1998); others will use standard criminal instructions. In addition to standard civil instructions 1-1 to 1-10, 2-1 to 2-10, and 3-1 to 3-3, the court will instruct the jury on the essential elements in a mental health case, the definitions of mental illness and dangerousness, and the standard of proof. The Mental Health Division of the Public Defender Service has copies of instructions used by the court in prior cases, although each judge tends to create his or her own set of instructions, and counsel may want to ask the judge for a set of instructions.

E. The Disposition Hearing

Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 6 requires that the disposition hearing be held immediately after the civil commitment trial, though it may be continued for good cause. At the disposition hearing, the court must determine whether to order the respondent's hospitalization for a period of up to one year, or another alternative course of treatment that the court believes is in the best interests of the person or the public. D.C. Code § 21-545(b) (2004); accord In re Artis, 615 A.2d at 1153. This duty includes consideration of less restrictive intra-hospital dispositions, as well as exploration of dispositions less restrictive than hospitalization itself, such as outpatient clinics, day treatment programs, psychosocial and vocational rehabilitation programs, and various supportive long-term care environments such as community residential facilities and nursing homes. See Lake v. Cameron, 364 F.2d at 659-60. In fashioning an appropriate disposition, the court may resort to services or programs outside the District of Columbia. See In re Myrick, 624 A.2d 1222 (D.C. 1993); In re H.J.B., 359 A.2d 285 (D.C. 1976). The court also may explore alternatives that might exist within the inpatient setting of St. Elizabeth's Hospital. Covington v. Harris, 419 F.2d 617, 623 (D.C. Cir. 1969). As a matter of practice, however, the government usually presents its witnesses first. Under Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 5(c), the trial court must make specific findings at the disposition hearing "upon request of a party." See In re Artis, 615 A.2d at 1153.

[32] In recent years, the judge presiding over most mental health trials has scheduled a pre-trial hearing several weeks before the trial is set to start. At that hearing, the jury instructions are discussed and refined, and objections should be noted.

Neither the Ervin Act nor the Mental Health Rules indicate who has the burden of proof or what that burden is at the disposition hearing. See In re Gaither, 626 A.2d 920, 925 (D.C. 1993).

F. Transfer of Civilly Committed Patients from John Howard Pavilion to the Civil Division of the Hospital

Individuals who are found incompetent for trial in a criminal case and are subsequently civilly committed have the right to be transferred from the forensic division to a civil division of St. Elizabeth's Hospital.[33] (The one possible exception to this rule is where the hospital can establish that a patient exhibits so much violent behavior that he or she can only be treated in a maximum security setting such as John Howard Pavilion.) The right to transfer is based not only on the right to receive treatment in the least restrictive setting, but also on St. Elizabeth's own regulations. See Covington v. Harris, 419 F.2d at 623; Commission on Mental Health Services Policy 50000.523.1A ("Transfer of Forensic Inpatient Services Bureau Patients to Other Clinical Bureaus") (Oct. 28, 1992).

C. Periodic Examinations and Court Review of Commitment

At the expiration of 90 days from the issuance of a § 21-545 order of commitment or the date on which the §21-545.01 order renewing the period of commitment begins, and every 90 days thereafter, a patient is entitled to a current examination of his or her mental condition. D.C. Code § 21-546(a). Within 180 days from the date of the commitment order, the patient may also make a written request to be examined by an independent physician. If the patient is indigent, the examination shall be provided at public expense. If the Department of Mental Health, after consideration of the physician's reports, determines that the patient no longer meets the statutory criteria for commitment, the patient must be converted to voluntary legal status or discharged from treatment. D.C. Code § 21-546(d).

If the Department of Mental Health decides that the patient should not be released, but one or more of the examining physicians disagree, the patient may petition the court for an order of release. Id.[34] This right to review applies to outpatients as well as inpatients. Super. Ct. Ment.

[34] It is not enough to trigger judicial review for a report under § 21-546 to state that the respondent is "not dangerous to herself or others in a custodial setting" because "this does not mean that [the respondent] would not be dangerous

Health R. 9 places the burden on the patient of proving, by a preponderance of the evidence, that he or she is no longer likely to injure self or others as a result of mental illness.

D. Revocation of Outpatient Commitment

In 2003, the Ervin Act was amended to include provisions regarding revocation of outpatient commitment. Prior to this amendment, the procedures were governed by Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 16, which has since been repealed. The Ervin Act amendment sets forth procedures for transferring committed persons to inpatient hospitalization from outpatient committed status and is based on the decisions in In re James, 507 A.2d 155 (D.C. 1986); In re Richardson, 481 A.2d 473 (D.C. 1984); and In re Mills, 467 A.2d 971 (D.C. 1983).

1. Rehospitalization after Court Hearing

Section 21-548(a) authorizes the court to order a committed person's transfer from outpatient treatment to inpatient hospitalization after a hearing at which the petition has proved by clear and convincing evidence that the committed person (1) has failed to comply with a material condition of outpatient treatment and a more restrictive form of treatment is required to prevent the person from injuring self or others or (2) has had a significant change in his or her mental condition and a more restrictive form of treatment is required to prevent the person from injuring self or others. Occasionally, the government applies to the court for an order requiring that the U.S. Marshals Service or other law enforcement take a respondent into custody and transfer the person to an inpatient setting prior to any court hearing under § 21-548(a). The court has repeatedly found that it is not authorized to issue such an order. See, e.g., Order, In the Matter of Robert Freeman, M.H. 1303-08 (December 28, 2009).

2. Rehospitalization before Court Hearing

Section 21-548(b) provides a detailed description of the process by which a treatment provider can take a committed person into custody and transfer the person from outpatient treatment to inpatient treatment for observation and evaluation, if the treatment provider determines that the patient is likely to injure self or others if not immediately detained. Within 24 hours of the detention, the Department of Mental Health or the hospital where the person is detained must file notice of rehospitalization along with a detailed affidavit in court reciting the circumstances of the transfer to a more restrictive treatment setting. D.C. Code § 21-548(b)(2). Also within 24 hours, a copy of the notice and affidavit must be provided to the committed person and counsel for the committed person. D.C. Code § 21-548(b)(3).

Within 24 hours of the filing of the notice of rehospitalization, the court must conduct an ex parte review and determine whether the change of treatment venue is supported by probable cause. D.C. Code § 21-548(b)(4). If the court determines it is not, the person is returned to outpatient status; if the court determines that it is, the hospital or Department may continue to hold the committed person for up to five days. Id. The Department or hospital may hold the in the event she were released" from the commitment. In re Dow, 663 A.2d 1214, 1215 (D.C. 1995) (emphasis in original).

person beyond the five-day period only if, during those five days, the hospital or Department has filed a petition to revoke outpatient treatment. D.C. Code § 21-548(b)(5). A hearing will be scheduled within 21 days of the filing of the outpatient revocation petition. Id. The decision in In re Richardson, 481 A.2d 473 (D.C. 1984), which formed the basis for the procedures set out in § 21-548, is helpful in understanding the outpatient revocation process.

Failure to file a timely notice of rehospitalization requires immediate release from inpatient custody and return to outpatient status. In re Feenster, 561 A.2d 997 (D.C. 1989). The untimely filing of a notice of rehospitalization is not "cured" by a subsequent judicial determination that outpatient status should be revoked. Id. at 999.

The statute does not distinguish between voluntary and involuntary transfers from outpatient to inpatient treatment. Section 21-548 appears to cover all transfers from outpatient to inpatient treatment.

3. The Revocation Hearing

In cases in which the hospital seeks revocation of outpatient status, either before or after the committed person has been transferred to more restrictive treatment, a revocation hearing will be scheduled before the judge who is assigned to the mental health calendar. When the respondent has been transferred to an inpatient setting prior to the hearing, the temporary detention will continue until the revocation hearing is held or the inpatient doctor determines that inpatient treatment is no longer the least restrictive setting for the respondent to receive treatment. Although the hearing will be scheduled within 21 days of the filing of an outpatient revocation petition, the court may, for good cause shown, continue the hearing. See D.C. Code 21-548(b)(5).

At a revocation hearing, the treatment provider or the Department of Mental Health has the burden of establishing by clear and convincing evidence that the transfer to inpatient treatment is warranted. D.C. Code § 21-548(a).[35] The court must find that up to one-year inpatient treatment is the least restrictive alternative and is supported by facts of increased dangerousness. In re Stokes, 546 A.2d 356, 361 (D.C. 1988). At the hearing, the court must inquire into treatment alternatives less restrictive than inpatient hospitalization. "[A] hearing on a petition to revoke an outpatient commitment involves more than a binary choice," between inpatient and outpatient commitment. In re Smith, 880 A.2d 269 (D.C. 2005).

Thus, at a revocation hearing, the court will consider any relevant evidence produced by either side as to whether the respondent's psychiatric condition has deteriorated such that inpatient psychiatric care is the only appropriate alternative and, therefore, is the least restrictive treatment feasible. Richardson, 481 A.2d at 479 n.4; see James, 507 A.2d 155 (court criticized hospital's presentation of unreliable hearsay). However, the court may not rely on "mere conclusionary statements" about dangerousness as a basis for revocation, but must present the testimony or affidavits of witnesses, such as family members, with direct knowledge of the respondent's conduct. James, 507 A.2d at 159. The court will consider the entirety of a respondent's behavior, rather than individual incidents, including past history of compliance with and response to treatment. See In re Perruso, 896 A.2d 255 (D.C. 2006), (evidence that respondent was "inadvertently exposing herself to a significant risk of injury to herself when she acted on her delusions," was sufficient to support a conclusion that inpatient hospitalization was the least restrictive alternative until she "is optimally stable" at which point she would have "gained insight into her disease" and not "simply stop taking her medication the moment she was released from the hospital.").

The respondent's failure to take his or her medication should not be a basis in and of itself for revocation of outpatient status. Richardson, 481 A.2d at 479 n.5. A respondent's mental illness may go into remission or he or she may no longer need medication. If the respondent is doing fine without treatment, counsel may be able to persuade the court not to revoke outpatient commitment. See James, 507 A.2d at 158. Counsel for the respondent may call any witnesses who support the contention that the respondent should be returned to the community. Although the burden is on the petitioner to show that inpatient hospitalization is the least restrictive treatment alternative available, counsel for the respondent may consider proposing alternative placements within the community that are less restrictive than the hospital but better tailored to the client's needs. Stokes, 546 A.2d at 361.

If the court orders revocation, the respondent's legal status is changed to that of a committed inpatient. A committed inpatient may be placed on outpatient status by the hospital staff without the court's involvement. If a person on inpatient status is transferred to outpatient status, the procedures described in Richardson apply, even if the inpatient status came about through a revocation proceeding. See In re Plummer, 608 A.2d at 745.

E. Right to Appeal

If, after a trial, a respondent has been found likely to injure self or others as a result of mental illness, "the Court shall advise the respondent of his right to appeal within 30 days and of the right of a person who is unable to pay the cost of an appeal" to proceed in forma pauperis. Super. Ct. Ment. Health R. 6(c). The right to appeal attaches following any order that finalizes commitment, including a final order of disposition where the respondent has waived the right to a trial on the issues of mental illness and dangerousness, or an order revoking outpatient commitment.

A respondent may appeal adverse rulings on preliminary issues or motions raised at a probable cause hearing in addition to adverse rulings at disposition and revocation hearings.[36] See, e.g., In [36] For several reasons, the release of a respondent from the hospital following an adverse decision at a probable cause hearing will rarely moot out an appeal. First, the release may be survived by "continuing collateral consequences which should be dispelled if the confinement was, in fact, unlawful." In re Curry, 470 F.2d at 371. But see Hardesty v. Draper, 687 A.2d 1368, 1372-73 (D.C. 1997) (habeas application mooted by juvenile patient's release from hospital and subsequent reaching of age of majority, even though the record of having been hospitalized could present future difficulties for the person). Second, the challenged action may be deemed 'capable of repetition yet evading review' if the effects were too short-lived to fully litigate and there is a reasonable expectation that the respondent may be subject to the same action again. In re Morris, 482 A.2d 369, 372 (D.C. 1984). In addition, the short duration of a case or the continuing collateral consequences alone may be sufficient to re De Loatch, 532 A.2d 1343 (D.C. 1987). However, if the respondent willfully avoided the jurisdiction of the court, he or she may not seek appellate review of a trial court ruling that came after the respondent's flight. In re Reynard, 616 A.2d 1262 (D.C. 1992).

The petitioner may appeal a limited number of adverse rulings at a probable cause hearing. In re Barlow, 634 A.2d 1246, 1249 (D.C. 1993); see also In re (Bernard) Johnson, 691 A.2d 628 (D.C. 1997); In re Katz, 638 A.2d 684 (D.C. 1994). However, the petitioner may not appeal an adverse determination at trial. In re Lomax, 386 A.2d 1185 (D.C. 1978) (en banc).

VIII. RENEWAL OF COMMITMENT STATUS

In December 2004, the District's civil commitment law changed significantly in that commitment, which had previously been for an indeterminate period of time, became limited to a one-year term, which may be renewed following the procedures in D.C. Code § 21-545.01. There is no statutory limit on how many times the one-year commitment order may be renewed. If a renewal of a § 21-545 or § 21-545.01 commitment order is sought, a new petition for commitment must be filed at least 60 days prior to the expiration of the period of commitment. D.C. Code § 21-545.01. The petition can be filed within 60 days of the expiration of the commitment order only for good cause shown. The renewal term sought under § 21-545.01 shall not exceed one year. The respondent must be notified of this petition within three days of filing. D.C. Code § 21-545.01(b).

Petitions for recommitment will be heard by the Commission on Mental Health. D.C. Code § 21-545.01. The Commission must examine the respondent, and promptly hold a hearing on the issue of whether the respondent has a mental illness and if, as a result of that mental illness, the respondent is dangerous if not committed. D.C. Code §21-545.01 (c). If the Commission finds that the respondent remains mentally ill and dangerous, it will order renewal of commitment for a term no greater than one year and then notify the court and respondent in writing. The Commission can order renewal of commitment on an outpatient or an inpatient basis, and should consider and order the least restrictive treatment setting. If the Commission finds the respondent to be no longer mentally ill, or no longer a danger, the Commission shall order the termination of the respondent's commitment, and notify the court of the decision in writing. D.C. Code §545.01(d), (e).

A person for whom recommitment has been ordered by the Commission may appeal the decision to the Superior Court and shall be advised of this right orally and in writing. D.C. Code § 21-545.01(h). A respondent cannot appeal a recommitment order to the Court of Appeals until a judge of the Superior Court has first reviewed the order. D.C. Code § 21-545.01(h)(3).

IX. VOLUNTARY AND INVOLUNTARY COMMITMENT OF MINORS

Persons under 18 years of age may be hospitalized and discharged as voluntary patients only upon the signature of their parent or guardian. See D.C. Code §§ 21-511 and 512. The Supreme avoid mootness when the case involves "overarching issues important to the resolution of an entire class of future [cases]." In re Barlow, 634 A.2d 1246, 1249 (D.C. 1993) (citation omitted); accord In re (Bernard) Johnson, 691 A.2d 628 (D.C. 1997).

Court declared in Parham v. J.R., 442 U.S. 584 (1979), that when a parent seeks to admit a child to a hospital for the treatment of a mental illness, the child's right to due process is satisfied by a determination by the admitting psychiatrist that hospitalization is warranted and that the statutory criteria are met. Id. at 606-14. Thus, assuming the hospital medical staff believes the admission is needed, a dispute between a juvenile and his or her parent or guardian regarding a decision to initiate or end a voluntary hospitalization will be resolved against the juvenile. The juvenile does have recourse to a petition for a writ of habeas corpus and, if it can be shown that the admission decision of the psychiatrist was incorrect, the juvenile may be able to contest his or her admission or continuing hospitalization. A juvenile who wishes to remain in treatment may be taken out of a hospital by a parent or guardian over the juvenile's objection. The Department of Mental Health no longer provides inpatient services to juveniles at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, though if it were to decide to do so again, then the rights of juveniles admitted as voluntary patients at Saint Elizabeth's would be controlled by an agreement filed in Poe v. Harris, No. 74-1800 (D.D.C. Feb. 25, 1980). The rights of juveniles admitted to private hospitals were raised but not resolved in Hardesty v. Draper, 687 A.2d 1368 (D.C. 1997).

Some minors hospitalized as emergency patients under D.C. Code § 21-521 et seq. are the subject of an open abuse or neglect case, a PINS case, or a juvenile delinquency case in family court. For children involved in these cases, it is common for the court to issue an order for observation and treatment, pursuant to D.C. Code § 16-2315. A "21-day order," the common name for an order under D.C. Code § 16-2315, will supercede any action in the mental health case and the mental health case will typically be dismissed at the time the 21-day order is entered.

Because Ervin Act court records, which often contain detailed medical reports, are not sealed or otherwise treated as confidential (unlike court records in juvenile and abuse or neglect cases), counsel should consider filing a motion to have the Ervin Act records sealed or rendered confidential. The motion is left to the discretion of the judge as there is neither a statute nor case law requiring the court to seal its records in mental health cases. See In re L.W., No. 90-1291 (D.C. Nov. 6, 1991) (memorandum opinion and judgment affirming denial of motion to seal judicial records of a minor's hospitalization).

X. RIGHTS OF PATIENTS HOSPITALIZED IN MENTAL INSTITUTIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

A. Presumption of Competence

Commitment to a mental hospital in the District of Columbia does not render a person legally incompetent for any purpose. See D.C. Code § 21-564; In re Boyd, 403 A.2d 744, 747 n.5 (D.C. 1979); District of Columbia v. Moxley, 471 F. Supp. 777 (D.D.C. 1979); Cameron v. Mullen, 387 F.2d 193, 202 n.29 (D.C. Cir. 1967).

B. Right to Treatment

Persons hospitalized for a mental illness have a right to both medical and psychiatric treatment. See D.C. Code § 21-562. The right to treatment begins on the day of admission to the hospital and cannot be ignored on the pretext that a person is being "observed" for diagnostic purposes. See In re Curry, 452 F.2d 1360 (D.C. Cir. 1971) (Curry I). Furthermore, the hospital may not justify a continuing failure to provide suitable treatment by a lack of staff or facilities. See Rouse v. Cameron, 373 F.2d 451 (D.C. Cir. 1966). Judicial review of treatment alternatives is limited to determining whether the administrator of the hospital has made a permissible and reasonable decision in view of relevant information and within a broad range of discretion. See Covington v. Harris, 419 F.2d 617 (D.C. Cir. 1969); accord Tribby v. Cameron, 379 F.2d 104, 105 (D.C. Cir. 1967).

C. Right to Consent to Treatment and to Refuse Medication or Other Treatment

With the creation of the Department of Mental Health in 2001, the District enacted a Mental Health Consumers' Rights Protection Act. D.C. Code § 7-1231.01 et seq. This Act guarantees a wide array of rights to voluntary and committed persons receiving mental health treatment, including the rights to consent to all treatments, to consent to or refuse medication, to be free from chemical restraints, to be free from seclusion or restraints, etc. Counsel should be familiar with this Act, and with rules adopted by the Department of Mental Health as a result of this Act. The Department's rules, which were promulgated pursuant to the D.C. Administrative Procedure Act, have the force of law and are located in Title 22A of the D.C. Municipal Regulations. See also D.C. Code § 21-563.

Section 7-1231.08 of the 2001 Act requires that informed consent be given before a person can be treated with medication. This means that the patient must be given "information about the proposed medication, including the purpose for its administration, possible side effects, and its potential risks and benefits, as well as information about feasible alternative treatments." D.C. Code § 7-1231.08(a). If, following the standards in the Health-Care Decisions Act, D.C. Code § 21-2204, a person has been deemed incapacitated to make a decision about treatment with medication, then the treatment provider may seek consent for treatment with medication from a substitute decision-maker if the patient so authorized the surrogate in an advance directive. D.C. Code § 7-1231.08(b). If a patient has not authorized a surrogate to consent to medication, or if an incapacitated patient does not have a surrogate, a treatment provider may administer medication after following certain procedures. D.C. Code § 7-1231.08(c). The procedures for administering medication to incapacitated patients of the Department of Mental Health can be found in Chapter 1 of Title 22A, D.C.M.R.

The involuntary administration of medication for defendants who are incompetent to proceed in criminal cases is controlled by D.C. Code § 24-531.09.

The Health-Care Decision Act bars a surrogate decision maker, absent a court order, from making any sort of decision regarding the administration of electro-convulsive therapy (ECT or shock treatment) or psychosurgery (lobotomies or the like). D.C. Code § 21-2211.

D. Right to Be Free From Unnecessary Restraint and Seclusion

Section 21-563 provides that mechanical restraints may not be used with a person hospitalized under the Ervin Act unless they are prescribed by a physician and the reasons for their use have been documented in the person's medical record. The use of seclusion and restraints is addressed more fully in the Mental Health Consumers' Rights Protection Act of 2001. D.C. Code § 7-1231.09.

E. Other Rights

A person hospitalized under the Ervin Act continues to have the right, inter alia, to enter contracts, vote, and hold a driver's license, unless adjudicated incompetent in a separate proceeding. See D.C. Code § 21-564 (2003). Additionally, a hospitalized person has the right to receive mail, which may not be censored except in limited situations, to receive visitors, and to use the telephone. D.C. Code § 21-561. The Mental Health Consumers' Rights Protection Act of 2001 expands on the provisions of the Ervin Act regarding guarantees for individuals receiving mental health treatment, either voluntarily or involuntarily. Communication rights are addressed in D.C. Code § 7-1231.04, as are the rights, inter alia, to have access to mental health services without harassment or coercion, to be treated in the least restrictive setting, to wear one's own clothes and keep personal possessions, to have reasonable opportunities for social interaction with members of either sex, to have reasonable opportunities for regular physical exercise, and to have access to the outdoors.

CHAPTER 16

RECOVERY OF PROPERTY SEIZED BY POLICE: ASSET FORFEITURE, MOTIONS FOR RETURN OF PROPERTY, AND OTHER PROCEDURES

I. INTRODUCTION

Asset forfeiture – the process by which the government permanently takes property away from the owner, without compensation, as a penalty for offenses committed "by" the property or the owner – is one of the most controversial law enforcement weapons in the "war on drugs."[1] Traceable to Biblical times, forfeiture was used at early English law to divest convicts of property and to seize "guilty property," for example, a domesticated animal that killed a person. Eventually, the crown used forfeiture to enhance revenue, a practice that led to the statutory abolition of "deodand" in England in 1846. Criminal Forfeiture: Attacking the Economic Dimension of Organized Narcotic Trafficking, 32 Am. U. L. Rev. 227, 232-35 (1982).

Many of the anachronisms in forfeiture procedure and doctrine, such as the fiction that the property itself is the defendant, are remnants of this ancient history. Others – such as lowering the burden of proof to probable cause and requiring that the claimant post a bond in order to litigate the right to the property – are legislatively-created devices that make it easier for law enforcement to prevail. Because no liberty interest is implicated, the stringent proof requirements of the criminal courts do not restrict the "remedial" civil statutes. Some commentators believe that the legislatures have gone too far in easing the government's burden of proof and relaxing the normal civil due process safeguards.[2] Several of the controversial departures in procedure have been struck down as unconstitutional.[3] The law is rapidly changing in this area. Because the "war on drugs" has resulted in new law enforcement tactics that go far beyond previous practices and test the limits of the Constitution, virtually every forfeiture case is a case of first impression on some issue. Accordingly, counsel should be alert to the novelty of the issues presented.

The government often fails to follow current forfeiture standards and procedures. Studies by the General Accounting Office have cited numerous problems in the federal government's management of property seizure and forfeiture programs, including failures to preserve the condition of the property and to protect the interests of third parties. See, e.g., "Real Property Seizure and Disposal Program Improvements Needed," Statement of Gene L. Dodaro, Associate Director, General Government Division, before the Subcommittee on Federal Spending, Budget and Accounting, U.S. Senate, GAO/T-GGD 87-28 (Sept. 25, 1987) (available from the GAO publications office).

A. Civil vs. Criminal Forfeiture

There are two types of forfeiture: in personam (i.e., criminal) or in rem (i.e., civil). The classic distinction was based upon whether the penalty was assessed against the thing or the person. Forfeiture against the person – criminal forfeiture – required a conviction before property could be taken. United States v. Seifuddin, 820 F.2d 1074, 1076 (9th Cir. 1987). See also Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 682 (1974). Such forfeitures were regarded as criminal because they were penal. One 1958 Plymouth Sedan v. Pennsylvania, 380 U.S. 693, 700 (1965); Seifuddin, 820 F.2d at 1076.

"Criminal" forfeitures are subject to all the constitutional and statutory procedural safeguards available under criminal law.[4] Because the indictment must include the forfeiture counts, the grand jury must find a basis for forfeiture. The burden of proof in criminal forfeiture cases is "beyond a reasonable doubt." Examples of criminal forfeiture statutes in current use are the Racketeer-Influenced Corrupt Organization Act (RICO), 18 U.S.C. §§ 1961 et seq., the Continuing Criminal Enterprise Act (CCE), 21 U.S.C. §§ 848 et seq., and the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970, 21 U.S.C. §§ 853, 881.

"Civil" forfeitures are in rem actions "based upon the unlawful use of the res, irrespective of its owner's culpability." Seifuddin, 820 F.2d at 1076-77. Traditionally, civil forfeiture has operated on the fiction that the res itself is the guilty party. The fact that forfeiture of the property affected someone's property rights was at first not considered. Civil forfeiture follows the rules of civil procedure and, in federal court, the Supplemental Rules for Certain Admiralty and Maritime cases. The burden of proof for seizure or arrest in the District of Columbia is probable cause. With regard to forfeiture, the government must show by a preponderance of the evidence that the moneys or items were used in violation of D.C. Code §§ 48-901.02 through -567. $345.00 in United States Currency v. District of Columbia, 544 A.2d 680, 682 (D.C. 1988). The standard for forfeiture actions under federal law, 21 U.S.C.A. § 801, is probable cause; the burden then shifts to the claimant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the "items or moneys were not so unlawfully used." Id. Because civil forfeiture is in rem instead of in personam, most civil forfeiture statutes relax the normal requirements for service of process, allowing the government to send notice by first-class mail coupled with publication. However, absent exigent circumstances, the Due Process Clause requires notice and a "meaningful" opportunity to be heard "before seizing real property subject to civil forfeiture." United States v. James Daniels Good Real Property, 510 U.S. 43 (1993).

Courts often distinguish between civil and criminal forfeitures in determining whether a particular constitutional provision applies. Analysis along these lines presents problems, however, because the distinction is arbitrary and constitutional rights are not so easily categorized.

Whether a forfeiture statute is civil or criminal turns on whether it is "punitive or remedial." See United States v. Ward, 448 U.S. 242, 248-49 (1980). The Supreme Court has announced seven considerations relevant to whether sanctions are so punitive as to override legislative intent to enact civil penalties:

> Whether the sanction involves an affirmative disability or restraint, whether it has historically been regarded as punishment, whether it comes into play only on a finding of scienter, whether its operation will promote the traditional aims of punishment – retribution and deterrence, whether the behavior to which it applies is already a crime, whether an alternative purpose to which it may rationally be connected is assignable for it, and whether it appears excessive in relation to the alternative purpose assigned.

Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144, 168-69 (1963) (citations omitted).

B. Constitutional Implications of the Quasi-Criminal Nature of Forfeiture

All forfeiture actions, whether denominated "civil" or "criminal," are "quasi-criminal" and require many of the constitutional procedural safeguards guaranteed to defendants in criminal cases. One 1958 Plymouth Sedan, 380 U.S. at 700. For example, the Due Process Clause secures the right of a citizen in an ordinary case to a hearing to contest the forfeiture of his property. United States v. James Daniels Good Real Property, 510 U.S. 43 (1993). This right to defend against forfeiture extends to an individual independent of his failure to appear in a related criminal prosecution. Degen v. United States, 517 U.S. 820 (1996).

Constitutional Rights Extended to Forfeiture Actions: In addition to the Search and Seizure Clause, the courts have extended to all forfeiture actions several other constitutional rights recognized in criminal cases. These include the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination, United States v. United States Coin & Currency, 401 U.S. 715, 717 (1971); the Sixth Amendment speedy trial guarantee, United States v. $8,850, 461 U.S. 555 (1983); the Ex Post Facto Clause, United States v. MacDonald, 607 F. Supp. 1183 (E.D.N.C. 1985); but see United States v. $5,644,540, 799 F.2d 1357 (9th Cir. 1986) (Ex Post Facto Clause applies only to criminal cases); and the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause as a bar to disproportionality between the offense and penalty in criminal forfeiture cases, Austin v. United States, 509 U.S. 602 (1993); Alexander v. United States, 509 U.S. 544 (1993); United States v. 92 Buena Vista Ave., 507 U.S. 111 (1993). The Confrontation Clause was held not to apply in United States v. Zucker, 161 U.S. 475 (1896). Neither the Double Jeopardy Clause nor collateral estoppel prevents forfeiture after a criminal acquittal for the same offense. United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354 (1984). Claimants are not entitled to representation by counsel at the government's expense unless the judgment could result in loss of liberty. Argersinger v. Hamlin, 407 U.S. 25 (1972); Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367 (1979).

II. THE GOVERNMENT'S AUTHORITY TO TAKE

Although the Fifth Amendment precludes taking of private property for public use without just compensation, it does not entirely bar forfeitures. Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 680 (1974), rejected the contention that the Puerto Rican forfeiture statute, which has no innocent owner defense, "unconstitutionally authorized the taking for government use of innocent parties' property without just compensation." The Court cited a long line of precedents establishing that innocence of the owner is not a defense to forfeiture. Id. at 683-90. See Note, The Innocent Owner Defense to Real Property Forfeiture Under the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, 58 Fordham L. Rev. 471 (1989). The Supreme Court held that judicial inquiry into the owner's guilt or innocence could be dispensed with because lawmakers are free to determine that certain uses of property are undesirable and to establish "a secondary defense against a forbidden use." Calero-Toledo, 416 U.S. at 686.

Until recently, many advocates relied on a passage in Calero-Toledo in support of the proposition that the Just Compensation Clause of the Fifth Amendment proscribes the taking of property when an owner proves "not only that he was uninvolved in and unaware of the wrongful activity, but also that he had done all that reasonably could be expected to prevent the proscribed use of his property." Id. at 688-89 (citations omitted).

Bennis v. Michigan, 516 U.S. 442 (1996), rejected the language in Calero-Toledo as dicta. Bennis' husband was arrested after the Michigan police observed him engaging in a sexual act with a prostitute while in an automobile. Id. at 445. Pursuant to a Michigan abatement scheme, the automobile was forfeited as a public nuisance, notwithstanding the fact that (1) the petitioner co-owned the car with her husband; and (2) the petitioner had no knowledge of her husband's use of the automobile in this matter. Id. In short, the Bennis court expressedly held that neither the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment nor the Just Compensation Clause of the Fifth Amendment requires judicial recognition of the "innocent owner" defense. Id. at 448.

Although Bennis rejects the claims that the Constitution requires an innocent owner defense, and the Court views the language in Calero-Toledo as obiter dictum, Bennis was silent as to whether the Constitution would be offended if an owner affirmatively showed that he had "done all that reasonably could be expected to prevent the proscribed use of his property." Calero-Toledo, 416 U.S. at 688-89. Accordingly, advocates should consider making a showing, in addition to absence of knowledge, that the owner made efforts to prevent property from being used in an illegal manner.

The power of the government to "take" private property without implicating the Just Compensation Clause is limited to takings authorized by the police power. The police power is a function delegated to each state and local government to establish and enforce laws to preserve public order and tranquility; promote the public health, safety and morals; and prevent, detect and punish crime. See State ex rel. Walsh v. Hine, 21 A. 1024 (Conn. 1890). It permits the taking of life, liberty and property, but only with due process. At a minimum, like statutes imposing criminal penalties, forfeiture statutes must be strictly construed in favor of the claimant, "in a manner favorable to the person whose property is to be seized as is consistent with the fair principles of interpretation." District of Columbia v. One 1981 Datsun 200SX, 115 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 645, 649 (D.C. Super. Ct. April 2, 1987) (Burgess, J.) (quoting State v. 1979 Pontiac Trans Am, 487 A.2d 722, 726 (N.J. 1985)).

Although the government is permitted to "take" one's property as long as the tenets of due process are met, forfeitures are subject to the principal of proportionality.[5] Consequently, the amount or the extent of the forfeiture must bear some relationship to the gravity of the offense that it is designed to punish. See United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321 (1998).

III. STATUTES CONTROLLING FORFEITURES

A. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA FORFEITURE STATUTES

Under District of Columbia law, there are five most commonly used statutes codifying asset forfeiture. Those statutes involve the offenses of controlled substances, firearms, illegal gambling, prostitution and pandering, and illegal dumping.

1. Controlled Substances – D.C. Code § 48-905.02

Asset forfeiture of property seized in connection with controlled substances is codified in D.C. Code § 48-905.02. The property that may be seized must be connected with the possession of items and/or containers used to hold, make or use drugs such as a crack pipe, baggies, and other drug paraphernalia. The statute permits the forfeiture of any U.S. Currency and "everything of value" that can be used or intended for use in drug sales and/or proceeds from drug sales. With this, vehicles or other conveyances used to carry drugs or drug paraphernalia, or are used to facilitate the sale or receipt of controlled substances, can be seized as well. In addition, any property, such as cash, that is used or intended for use to commit or facilitate a violation of the Controlled Substances Act can be seized, i.e., currency used to purchase drugs. Real property, such as a house, can also be forfeited if real property is used or intended for use to commit or facilitate a violation of the Controlled Substances Act, i.e., crack houses, shooting galleries, drug nests, and structures that are used or intended to be used for a violation of the Controlled Substances Act.

[5] Forfeiture verdict does not collaterally estop court from recalculating amount at sentencing because forfeiture and loss are independent concepts, i.e., forfeiture is value of proceeds possessed by defendant due to illegal activity and loss is harm that victim of those illegal activities suffered. United States v. Hoover-Hankerson, 511 F.3d 164 (D.C. Cir. 2007).

2. Firearms – D.C. Code § 7-2507.06a

The statute applies to transporting, possessing, or concealing any firearm in violation of D.C. Code § 7-2502.02, D.C. Code § 22-4503, and/or D.C. Code § 22-4504. Any vehicle or conveyance used to possess, transport, or conceal firearms can be seized and forfeited to the District of Columbia. Therefore, any vehicle containing a firearm can be forfeited under this provision. All property forfeited under this statute will follow the same procedures set forth in D.C. Code § 48-905.02 regarding forfeiture for controlled substances.

3. Illegal Gambling – D.C. Code § 22-1705

This statute codifies forfeiture of illegal gambling proceeds and property used to facilitate illegal gambling. Any premises can be seized under this statute if used for the purpose of illegal gambling.

Items that are used for legal, non-gambling purposes, such as a printer or recording device, can be seized as well if it is determined that those items were used to facilitate illegal gambling.

4. Prostitution and Pandering – D.C. Code § 22-2723

All vehicles and conveyances, including aircraft, can be seized if they were used to facilitate an act of prostitution. Under this forfeiture statute, owners are responsible for paying a civil administrative penalty of $150, plus booting, towing, and storage fees pursuant to D.C. Code § 22-2724. However, if the owner of the vehicle can establish the criminal case for prostitution was dismissed, that there was an acquittal, or that the vehicle was stolen at the time of the offense, then some or all of the fees will be refunded.

5. Illegal Dumping – D.C. Code § 8-905

Vehicles used to facilitate illegal dumping can be forfeited under this statute. This statute does not apply to a common carrier unless the owner consents to its use for illegal dumping.

Forfeiture can be mitigated or prevented if the owner can establish that the claimant committed the act negligently or without knowledge.

B. FEDERAL CASES

The most commonly used federal forfeiture provisions are subsections of remedial legislation intended to punish specific types of wrongdoers. See Sedima, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., 473 U.S. 479, 498-99 (1985). Racketeers and drug kingpins are the main focus of attention. "Commonly encountered statutes are the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO")," 18 U.S.C. §§ 1961 et seq.; the Continuing Criminal Enterprise Act ("CCE"), 21 U.S.C. §§ 848 et seq.; and the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act, 21 U.S.C. §§ 853, 881.

The RICO forfeiture provision is an in personam action applied to cover a broad number of illegal acts, including gambling, racketeering, extortion, murder, and drug dealing.

While CCE is to big-time drug dealers what RICO is to racketeers, CCE was broadly drafted to cover all imaginable types of drug offenders from the casual user to the mastermind behind major international drug cartels. Its forfeiture provision, § 853, is an in personam action integrated in a criminal proceeding. See J.W. Goldsmith, Jr. - Grant Co. v. United States, 254 U.S. 505 (1921) (in rem forfeiture valid even if person is innocent). CCE is Congress's most severe enforcement tool in its "war on drugs."

Section 881 forfeitures are the most frequently used. They are technically in rem proceedings, yet include a number of constitutional protections for claimants usually associated with criminal proceedings. Federal prosecutors prefer the § 881 action because it is available even if the defendant is acquitted of the underlying criminal charge. The government need only show probable cause, which shifts the burden to the person maintaining an ownership claim to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the property is not connected with a proscribed activity.

Probable Cause: Federal circuits remain divided over the standard for determining probable cause in forfeiture actions. According to some, the government must make out a prima facie case, suggesting that probable cause depends on the government's ability to overcome a motion to dismiss. Other circuits hold that the government meets the probable cause standard by demonstrating that it is reasonable to believe that the property in question is connected with a proscribed activity. United States v. Two Tracts of Real Property, 665 F. Supp. 422 (M.D.N.C. 1987), aff'd, 856 F.2d 675 (4th Cir. 1988); United States v. 3120 Banneker Drive, 691 F. Supp. 497 (D.D.C. 1988). All federal circuits hold that the government must prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the property is connected to a proscribed activity. Once proved, the burden shifts to the defendant to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that there is no connection between the property and the proscribed activity.[6]

1. RICO Forfeiture Provision

RICO is the federal government's big gun in the war against crime. Among its chief characteristics are broad language and draconian measures. RICO was originally intended to stem the flow of organized crime money into legitimate businesses. United States v. Turkette, 452 U.S. 576 (1981) (expansive interpretation of RICO); see also Russello v. United States, 464 U.S. 16 (1983). Federal prosecutors have all but abandoned such intent, using RICO against criminal activities unconnected with organized crime. Lynch, RICO: The Crime of Being a Criminal, Parts I & II, 87 Colum. L. Rev. 661, 662-63 (1987).

The expansive language of RICO operates to:

- Prohibit the infiltration of dirty money, loan sharking, and extortion into legitimate businesses;

- Facilitate prosecution of a criminal's control and influence over the affairs of legitimate businesses;

[6] For a discussion of trial procedures in criminal forfeiture actions, see United States v. Perholtz, 842 F.2d 343 (D.C. Cir. 1988).

- Broadly define enterprises to include both legal and illegal groups of persons who are associated in fact;

- Expand the traditional definition of racketeer to include anyone who has committed two criminal acts; and

- Impose the most severe sanctions against prohibited activities.

Id. at 680-84; c*f. United States v. Lemm*, 680 F.2d 1193, 1198 (8th Cir. 1982) (limiting interpretation to traditional definition of racketeer and illegal enterprise).

18 U.S.C. § 1963, which provides for RICO criminal forfeitures, is intended to deprive a criminal of any property which is even remotely connected with a proscribed activity. The property itself need not be purchased with tainted proceeds or acquired by prohibited activity. United States v. Ginsburg, 773 F.2d 798 (7th Cir. 1985). This form of deprivation has survived constitutional challenges and is enforced to the fullest extent. For example, in United States v. Anderson, 782 F.2d 908 (11th Cir. 1986), the defendant's entire business dwelling was forfeited even though its basement was used only for legitimate purposes.

RICO imposes civil and criminal penalties upon "any person" who invests income derived from a "pattern of racketeering," § 1962(a); acquires or maintains control or influence over any legal or illegal enterprise through a "pattern of racketeering," § 1962(b); by way of hire or association with such enterprise, conducts or participates in its affairs, 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c); or conspires to violate any of the provisions of 18 U.S.C. § 1962(a)-(d).

a. Pattern of Racketeering

A "pattern of racketeering" includes any two acts of racketeering within ten years of each other, excluding terms of imprisonment. § 1961(5). There must be a continuity of proscribed activity, a threat of such continuity, and a relationship between the acts. Sedima, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., 473 U.S. 479 (1985); see also H.J. Inc. v. Northwestern Bell Telephone Co., 492 U.S. 229 (1989) (pattern is established not upon a particular number, but upon an arrangement or relationship among predicate offenses).

b. Enterprise

"Enterprise" includes both legal and illegal entities associated for the purpose of engaging in a continuous common course of action. Turkette, 452 U.S. at 583. Legal entities include individuals, corporations, partnerships, and other unions and groups. 18 U.S.C. § 1961(4); Turkette, 452 U.S. at 582 n.4; Perholtz, 842 F.2d at 352.

A RICO indictment cannot be sustained against an unassociated entity. See, e.g., Bennett v. United States Trust Co., 770 F.2d 308, 314-315 (2d Cir. 1985) (corporation cannot be defendant and entity because it cannot associate with itself). Some courts advance the position that RICO is predicated on a finding of "continuity of structure and among personnel within the entity."

Accordingly, a disjunctive structure or refusal of personnel to cooperate with one another "militates against a finding of continuity of personnel." Perholtz, 842 F.2d at 354.

Courts will infer the existence of an enterprise from a pattern of requisite offenses (racketeering). In a strict sense, proof of an enterprise can be satisfied when the prosecution demonstrates a common scheme among personnel or an organization, plus continuity. Accordingly, the relaxed test effectively treats two separate concepts as if they were the same. See Turkette, 452 U.S. at 583; Perholtz, 842 F.2d at 363.

C. Continuing Criminal Enterprise (CCE)

CCE, a chapter of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1970, was enacted to augment enforcement tools by taking the profitability out of drug dealing. Like RICO, it is specifically aimed at a special class of offenders, described as "dangerous drug offenders" or "kingpins." Notwithstanding this intent, the scope of the statute and the wide latitude used in interpreting it enable CCE to reach even small-time users. See Garrett v. United States, 471 U.S. 773 (1985). Forfeiture is authorized under 21 U.S.C. § 853 and is mandatory upon conviction. Section 853 allows the court to restrain the disposal of potentially forfeitable property. If the subject property cannot be located, the court can forfeit any property, legal or illegal, owned by the defendant or transferred to a third party.

There is a rebuttable presumption against the "continuous" element of a criminal enterprise. When a crime does not require continuity, there is no presumption that it will continue. For example, a single drug transaction, no matter how large, cannot be a continuing criminal enterprise. See Torcia, Wharton's Criminal Evidence, § 64 (1985); see also H.J. Inc. v. Northwestern Bell Telephone Co., 492 U.S. 229 (1989); Barticheck v. Fidelity Union Bank/First National, 832 F.2d 36 (3d Cir. 1987). A rebuttable presumption exists that any property is subject to forfeiture if it was acquired by the defendant during the period in which the alleged violation occurred, and likely was not derived from another source. 21 U.S.C. § 853(d).

A conviction for a proscribed drug offense must precede forfeiture. The offense must involve at least five persons and large quantities of drugs, and must itself constitute an ongoing illegal drug scheme. Also, the defendant must manage, control, or direct the enterprise, and derive substantial profits from it. The subject property must be derived from or in part be used to facilitate the offense. 21 U.S.C. § 853(a); see 21 U.S.C. § 848.

Before a conviction is obtained, 21 U.S.C. § 853(e) provides for a protective order authorizing the government to restrain or enjoin, or require an execution or performance bond to preserve availability of the subject property. The protective orders are applied upon the filing of an indictment against the person.

Section 853(f) authorizes the government to request a warrant for seizure of subject property in the same manner as provided in a search warrant. Issuance of the warrant is based on probable cause that the subject property is "tainted."

1. Property

Property includes: "1) Real property, including things growing on, affixed to and found on land; and 2) Tangible and intangible personal property, including rights, privileges, interest, claims and securities." 21 U.S.C. § 853(b).

2. Predicate Offenses

Predicate offenses include:

- Manufacture, distribution, or dispensation of any controlled substance, or intent to do so;
- Creation, distribution, dispensation, or possession with intent to distribute any counterfeit substance;
- Use or revelation of any information about trade secrets used to process Schedule I or II drugs;
- Possession of a controlled substance (unless the record was expunged pursuant to 21 U.S.C. § 844(b));
- Distribution to persons under twenty-one years of age;
- Distribution or manufacture in or near a school or college;
- Employment of any person under eighteen years of age; or
- Attempt or conspiracy to commit any offense outlined in the chapter, United States v. (Charles) Jones, 763 F.2d 518 (2d Cir. 1985) (conspiracy suffices); United States v. Sisca, 503 F.2d 1337, 1343-45 (2d Cir. 1974) (conversation about prospective drug purchase).

See 21 U.S.C. §§ 844 et seq.

3. Series

A CCE "series" is roughly equivalent to a RICO "pattern." Its definitional scope includes three or more federal narcotics violations. United States v. Ordonez, 722 F.2d 530, 537 (9th Cir. 1983), modified, 737 F.2d 793 (1984); see also United States v. Phillips, 664 F.2d 971 (5th Cir. 1981). Any prior drug-related conviction can be an element in the series. United States v. Black, 605 F. Supp. 1027 (D.D.C.), stay denied, 759 F.2d 71 (D.C. Cir. 1985). The elements need not be distinct violations. For example, one commits a predicate offense by receiving a telephone call from a potential purchaser of a prohibited drug; if three related calls are received, the requisite number of offenses is met. Cf. United States v. Estrada, 757 F.2d 27 (2d Cir. 1985) (defendant received a telephone call, prepared the drug, and delivered it to a prospective purchaser).

4. Kingpin

The kingpin provision is aimed at leaders of illegal drug associations. A leader need not be the head of a drug cartel; it is sufficient that one supervise, organize, or manage at least five persons in a drug-related activity and derive substantial income from such activity. 21 U.S.C. § 848 (c); United States v. Zavala, 839 F.2d 523 (9th Cir.1988); see also United States v. (Michael) Jones, 801 F.2d 304 (8th Cir. 1986).

5. Substantial Income

According to some circuits, "substantial income" is not limited to actual dollars received or promised. In fact, evidence that an alleged kingpin would have received money, but for government intervention, is sufficient to meet the test. Indeed, the defendant need not have received or even expected to receive money. In United States v. Jeffers, 532 F.2d 1101, 1117 (7th Cir. 1976), modified, 432 U.S. 137, 434 U.S. 880 (1977), the court held that substantial income could be inferred from the magnitude of an enterprise; gross receipts or income could therefore be the measure used to determine substantial income.

6. Third-Party Interest

The United States assumes full right and interest in a property upon the commission of a proscribed act. Therefore, no third party can claim an interest in "tainted" property, although there is an exception for bona fide purchasers for value. The doctrine of "relation back," 21 U.S.C. § 881(h), states that the government's title to property vests (i.e., relates back) to the date of the offense, not the date of seizure, thus avoiding any third-party claims arising between offense and seizure. However, this doctrine was seriously curtailed in United States v. 92 Buena Vista Ave., 507 U.S. 111 (1993), holding that the interceding "innocent owner" was unjustly deprived of a home – given to her as a gift – purchased with the proceeds of drug transactions.

7. Enterprise

A CCE enterprise is the same as that defined under RICO. See Section B.2, supra. It includes any individual, partnership, corporation, association, or other legal entity, and any union or group of individuals associated in fact even though not a legal entity. 21 U.S.C. § 854(c).

C. CIVIL FORFEITURE UNDER 21 U.S.C. § 881

The broad language of 21 U.S.C. § 881 provides a dragnet for capturing virtually any asset, even if remotely connected to a proscribed activity. The forfeiture action can be maintained independent of a criminal proceeding, and may be brought against people who have been acquitted or who have not been criminally charged. United States v. 3120 Banneker Drive, 691 F. Supp. 497 (D.D.C. 1988); United States v. One Clipper Bow Ketch Nisku, 548 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1977). The statute has been consistently construed to extend to property loaned to a person who, without the owner's knowledge or consent, uses the property in a manner proscribed by the act. See United States v. One Mercedes Benz 380 SEL, 604 F. Supp. 1307 (S.D.N.Y. 1984), aff'd, 762 F.2d 991 (2d Cir. 1985). Initially, the government must show probable cause that the property was used in violation of federal drug laws. The burden then shifts to the claimant, who must rebut that showing with preponderant evidence. 3120 Banneker Drive, 691 F. Supp. at 499; United States v. Brock, 747 F.2d 761, 762 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

A prima facie forfeiture case is established when the evidence creates reasonable grounds for belief that the property is connected to a proscribed activity. This test is analogous to the probable cause standard in search and seizure cases, but is limited by the statutory language. Accordingly, the government may initiate a § 881 forfeiture action against an automobile by setting forth a claim that the "vehicle [was] used to facilitate the sale of a controlled substance." See United States v. Fafowora, 865 F.2d 360, 362 (D.C. Cir. 1989); United States v. Pappas, 613 F.2d 324 (1st Cir. 1980). See generally Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 230-31 (1983).[7]

The following are subject to forfeiture:

- Controlled substances made, distributed, dispensed, or acquired in violation of § 881;
- Conveyances, including aircraft, vehicles, or vessels that are used or intended for use to transport or in any manner facilitate the transportation, sale, receipt, possession, or concealment of controlled substances;
- Monies, negotiable instruments, securities, or other things of value, furnished by any person or exchanged for a controlled substance; and
- All real property, and rights, title, and interest thereof, used to facilitate the commission of an act proscribed under § 881.

See 21 U.S.C. § 881(a)(1)-(7). The statute reaches every physical object that is in any manner connected with the drug trade. 3120 Banneker Drive, 691 F. Supp. at 503.

> [P]roperty is subject to civil forfeiture if it is used – even if tangentially used – in connection with a drug transaction . . . Congress did not envision a constricted scope for forfeitures; instead, in keeping with the statute's emphasis on deterring drug transactions by attacking the profitability of crime Congress intended the Act to provide for forfeitures of property used in connection with an illegal narcotics trade, regardless of whether the property was "substantially connected" to the deal or not.

Id. at 501 (footnotes and citations omitted).

[7] The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure apply to relief from a § 881 action. In Re Seizure Warrant of Cyril Onwuasoanya, 830 F.2d 372 (D.C. Cir. 1987), vacated, 488 U.S. 920 (1988). The proper venue for the action is the federal circuit in which the property was seized. United States v. One Cessna Model 310R Aircraft, 432 F. Supp. 364 (D.S.C. 1977).

To maintain a forfeiture action, the government need only establish a reasonable belief that the property was intended for or facilitated a drug transaction. For example, in United States v. Fleming, 677 F.2d 602, 609-10 (7th Cir. 1982), the co-defendant's automobile and $10,000 in cash were forfeited because the car was used to transport the defendant to a place where a drug transaction was to take place. Similarly, United States v. $33,000 U.S. Currency, 640 F. Supp. 898, 900 (D. Md. 1986), held that proceeds from sales of coins, stock, and an Arabian horse were subject to forfeiture because it was reasonable to assume that the items sold were purchased with tainted money. For a comprehensive discussion of forfeiture involving drugs, see Annot., Forfeiture of Personal Property Used in Illegal Manufacture, Processing, or Sale of Controlled Substances and 21 U.S.C. § 881, 59 A.L.R. Fed. 765 (Supp. 1988).

IV. ATTORNEY'S FEES

Authority to forfeit attorneys' fees derives from the Comprehensive Forfeiture Act of 1984 (CFA), the same authority for other federal forfeiture cases. Depending on the underlying offense, the government may use a subchapter of the CFA that particularly applies to the facts of the case. The CCE forfeiture provision, 21 U.S.C. § 853, is most often used in large-scale drug cases. Prosecutors may also elect to use the RICO forfeiture provisions to seize attorney fees. See DuMouchel and Oberg, Defense Attorney Fees: A New Tool for the Prosecution, Det. C.L. Rev. 57 (1986).

Attorney fee forfeitures are distinguishable from most other cases involving real and intangible property rights because they involve substantive constitutional questions, namely the Sixth Amendment right to counsel of choice, as well as bona fide purchasers for value (who are usually exempt from forfeiture). The predominant issue is whether federal forfeiture statutes exempt assets a defendant wishes to use to retain and pay an attorney for legal representation. Federal courts labored over the question for years; in 1989 two five-to-four Supreme Court cases settled the debate.

United States v. Monsanto, 491 U.S. 600 (1989) (Monsanto III), and Caplin & Drysdale Chartered v. United States, 491 U.S. 617 (1989), rejected challenges on Sixth Amendment and due process grounds and found that money that the defendant intended to use to pay an attorney is not exempt from forfeiture. However, in a subsequent decision, the second circuit decided that assets needed for attorney's fees are forfeitable only after the government requests a post-indictment, pre-trial adversarial hearing, at which the government has the burden of demonstrating probable cause that the defendant violated the statute and that the assets are forfeitable. United States v. Monsanto, 924 F.2d 1186 (2d Cir. 1991) (Monsanto IV).

V. DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA FORFEITURES

Forfeiture under the District of Columbia code is a civil, in rem proceeding, authorized under D.C. Code § 48-905.02. It is remedial in purpose and effect. $345.00 in United States Currency v. District of Columbia, 544 A.2d 680 (D.C. 1988). Upon commission of specifically delineated activities, the law vests in the District of Columbia all titles, interests, and rights thereof in property connected to the activity. See D.C. Code §§ 48-901.02 et seq.

The action may be maintained even if the defendant was acquitted on the criminal charges to which the property was allegedly connected. In District of Columbia v. Dunmore, 749 A.2d 740 (D.C. 2000), the District of Columbia initiated proceedings for civil forfeiture of $821 seized from Mr. Dunmore at the time of his arrest. After Mr. Dunmore was acquitted of his possession with intent to distribute (PWID) charge, his attorney prevailed in his Super. Ct. Crim. R. 41(g) motion for return of Mr. Dunmore's property. The Court of Appeals reversed and remanded the case, holding that the trial court should have denied the Rule 41(g) motion and left the question of entitlement to the property to the civil forfeiture proceedings under D.C. Code § 48-905.02 (1998).

Forfeiture of property connected with or derived from a proscribed activity is authorized whenever one violates any of several local statutes, including:

- Controlled substances, including cocaine and its derivatives, LSD, PCP, and chemicals used to manufacture such, D.C. Code § 48-905.02;

- Contraband alcoholic beverages, and motor vehicles used in their transport, D.C. Code § 25-911;

- Drug paraphernalia, including syringes, pipes, roach clips, bongs, and cocaine spoons, D.C. Code § 48-1104;

- Proceeds from gambling, and the premises where gambling takes place, D.C. Code 22-1705;

- Interest derived from loan sharking (usury), D.C. Code § 28-3303;

- Firearms, and motor vehicle used in their transport, D.C. Code § 7-2507.06a;

- Any conveyance and/or U.S. currency used in any manner to facilitate a violation of a prostitution-related offense, D.C. Code § 22-2723; and

- Any conveyance used to facilitate illegal dumping, D.C. Code § 8-905.

D.C. Code § 48-905.02(a) applies to:

- Intrinsically illegal products, such as controlled substances;

- Cars, boats, aircraft, and other conveyances used to facilitate the transportation of controlled substances;

- Raw materials, including natural and synthetic elements and compounds used to make controlled substances, and containers;

- Books, records, or research property, including formulae intended to be used in violation of the law; and

- Anything of value, including cash and negotiable instruments exchanged for controlled substances.

PRACTICE TIP:

Parties involved with criminal cases can often be unsure as to whether or not property seized by the police is the subject of possible asset forfeiture proceedings. One way to ascertain whether or not the property in question may be held in asset forfeiture is to carefully read the narrative portion of the Metropolitan Police Department's Arrest Report, or the Gerstein portion of the PD 163. Often, the narrative will indicate if the property is being held for asset forfeiture.

VI. DEFENSES TO FORFEITURE

A. Affirmative Defenses

Affirmative defenses must be raised in the answer, but the answer may be amended even at the time of trial to conform to the evidence. See Super. Ct. Crim. R. 8(c), 15(b); Fed. R. Crim. P. 8(c), 15(b). It is wise to amend the answer as soon as there appears to be evidence to support an affirmative defense. In addition, claimants can defend forfeiture actions by attacking one or more of the elements of the government's case.

1. Innocent Owner

a. D.C. Statutes

The District of Columbia forfeiture statutes each have provisions for innocent owner defenses. The term "owner" was construed in District of Columbia v. One 1981 Datsun 200SX, 115 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 645, 650 (D.C. Super. Ct. April 2, 1987) (Burgess, J.):

> [T]he ultimate issue is who had the "power and the legal right to permit its use by another." . . . Federal courts, in determining who has standing to raise defenses under the federal forfeiture statute, 21 U.S.C. § 881(a), have first held that to challenge forfeitures, the challenger must own the res. They have then analyzed several factors in determining who is the owner, including, among others, who holds title, who exercises dominion and control, who has possession, and who has a financial stake in the property.

Id. at 649-50 (citation omitted).[8]

[8] Forfeiture statutes are construed liberally in favor of the claimant, and in such a manner "'as to give effect to the objects and purposes of the statute.'" Id. at 649 (quoting Mason v. Automobile Finance Co., 121 F.2d 32, 34 (D.C. Cir. 1941)).

The District of Columbia controlled substances forfeiture statute has a liberal "innocent owner" defense with respect to cases involving controlled substances and/or firearms offenses. The statute provides that "[n]o conveyance is subject to forfeiture under this section by reason of any act or omission established by the owner thereof to have been committed or omitted without his or her knowledge or consent." D.C. Code § 48-905.02(a)(4)(B). "[A]ctual knowledge and consent is the proper standard to be applied."

The innocent owner defense for firearms forfeitures is enumerated in D.C. Code § 7-2507.06a (c)(1) & (2) for firearms offenses. This defense applies to situations in which the seized property is used and/or in the possession of another without the owner's knowledge and consent. Under the firearms statute, a claimant can establish a lack of knowledge of the presence of a firearm in the conveyance by a preponderance of the evidence. A claimant can also establish an innocent owner defense if he or she, upon receiving knowledge that a firearm was in his or her conveyance, took action to "terminate" the presence of the firearm or person with the firearm, from the conveyance. See D.C. Code § 7-2507.06a(c)(1)(B).

The innocent owner defense for illegal dumping provides that no motor vehicle will be subject to forfeiture if the owner establishes that a third party committed the illegal act of dumping without the owner's knowledge and consent. See D.C. Code § 8-905(a)(2). Further, the illegal dumping forfeiture statute provides that an owner may even regain possession of the vehicle if he or she did not know the dumping was illegal or did so negligently.

The innocent owner defense for prostitution and pandering applies only to vehicles that were used to facilitate an act of prostitution. See D.C. Code § 33-2723(a)(1)(C). There is no provision for currency seized under this statute. Common carriers are not applicable under this statute unless the owner had knowledge of and consented to acts of prostitution occurring in the vehicle on or on the premises.

The gambling forfeiture statute does not contain any innocent owner provisions.

PRACTICE TIP:

Innocent owners may be contacted by the Metropolitan Police Department to discuss the return of their vehicle. Defense counsel may also want to contact the Office of the Attorney General to facilitate the return of the property for innocent owners. By doing so, the claimant will avoid the long delays that can result when a civil forfeiture case is litigated in D.C. Superior Court.

Lien holders are considered innocent owners. Often, claimants may hold title to a vehicle jointly with a financing company, bank, credit union or car dealership. In such cases, lien holders can take possession of the vehicle before any proceedings, administrative or judicial, can occur. Claimants should carefully examine financing statement and loan agreements for their vehicle to ascertain whether or not those agreements contain a clause permitting the lien holder to take possession of the vehicle should it be held for asset forfeiture.

b. Federal statutes

The innocent owner defense in 21 U.S.C. § 881(a)(7), dealing with forfeiture of real estate for violations of drug laws, is identical in all significant respects to that used in the District of Columbia statute governing forfeiture of conveyances for drug violations: "[N]o property shall be forfeited under this paragraph, to the extent of an interest of an owner, by reason of any act or omission established by that owner to have been committed or omitted without the knowledge or consent of that owner." Similarly, RICO protects the rights of innocent lienholders.

Most other federal statutes provide little or no protection for the interests of innocent owners and third parties. Furthermore, Bennis v. Michigan, 516 U.S. 442 (1996), held that the absence of an innocent owner defense in a forfeiture statute does not offend the Constitution: "a long and unbroken line of cases holds that an owner's interest in property may be forfeited by reason of the use to which the property is put even though the owner did not know that it was to be put to such use." Id. at 446; see Section II, supra.

2. Personal Use

That the drugs seized were intended for personal use and not for sale used to be a defense to forfeiture of a car under D.C. Code § 48-905.02(a)(4)(C). However, this provision was repealed in 1993, and apparently is no longer a defense. It was never a defense to forfeiture under 21 U.S.C. § 881.

3. Statute of Limitations

In the District of Columbia, the statute of limitations in forfeiture cases is one year. D.C. Code § 12-301(5). However, the statute of limitations is tolled during the pendency of criminal proceedings related to the property. Ward v. District of Columbia, 494 A.2d 666 (D.C. 1985). The federal statute of limitations is five years from the seizure. 19 U.S.C. § 1621. Even if the action is brought within the applicable statute of limitations, it may be time-barred by the Due Process Clause. United States v. $8,850, 461 U.S. 555 (1983) (applying four-factor test of Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514 (1972), in determining reasonableness of delay).

B. Constitutional Defenses

1. Suppression of Evidence

Although not technically a defense, winning a suppression motion may make it difficult or impossible for the government to prevail at trial. The Fourth Amendment applies to forfeiture in the same manner as in criminal cases. One 1958 Plymouth Sedan v. Pennsylvania, 380 U.S. 693 (1965). Contraband, incriminating documents, and money seized as a result of an illegal seizure of the res must be suppressed as evidence in the forfeiture trial. However, illegal seizure of the res does not by itself bar forfeiture, so long as the government presents other, untainted evidence to prove the illegal use.[9]

Because search and seizure issues may be raised at any time, entry of a guilty plea without the benefit of a suppression hearing should not preclude the claimant from litigating a suppression motion in the forfeiture case. See District of Columbia v. One 1980 Blue Jaguar, CA 3256-87 (Beaudin, J.) (illegality of search or seizure can be raised at any time, even during trial). The better practice is to enter a conditional plea under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 11(a)(2), and preserve the suppression issue.

Where there are parallel criminal and civil forfeiture proceedings involving the same parties and issues, resolution of a suppression issue in one case collaterally estops the issue in the other. Collateral estoppel "prohibits parties who have litigated one cause of action from relitigating in a second and different cause of action matters of fact which were, or necessarily must have been, determined in the first litigation." Tutt v. Doby, 459 F.2d 1195, 1197 (D.C. Cir. 1972).

2. Unreasonable Delay

Factors: United States v. $8,850, 461 U.S. 555 (1983), held that the four-factor balancing test of Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514 (1972), used to determine when delay of a criminal trial violates the accused's right to a speedy trial, is the test to be used in determining when delay in forfeiture cases violates the Due Process Clause. The factors are "length of delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's assertion of his right, and prejudice to the defendant." $8,850, 461 U.S. at 564.

Although the delay challenged in $8,850 came between the seizure and the filing of a forfeiture complaint, the same factors apply to delay between the filing of the action and the trial. Requiring prompt filing of a forfeiture action, but allowing indefinite postponement of the trial, would reduce the filing requirement to a nullity. Under the Barker test, there is a due process violation at some point. United States v. Banco Cafetero Panama, 797 F.2d 1154, 1162-63 (2d Cir. 1986).

> [T]here has been no uniformity in deciding what constitutes a reasonable length of time. Delays of five months, nine months, and fourteen months, have been deemed to be reasonable. Generally a majority of the circuits have held that a delay of more than one year is unreasonable in the absence of a compelling reason, such as a lengthy criminal investigation or substantial problems with collecting evidence.

Darmstadter & Mackoff, Some Constitutional and Practical Considerations of Civil Forfeitures Under 21 U.S.C. § 881, 9 Whittier L. Rev. 27, 40 (1987) (footnotes omitted).

Undue delay in instituting forfeiture proceedings after seizure may bar forfeiture. Although extenuating circumstances may lengthen the amount of time allowed for the government to file a [9] An innocent owner may not have standing to challenge the stop and search of a car if the owner was not present at the time of the seizure. United States v. One 1977 Mercedes Benz 450 SEL, 708 F.2d 444, 448 (9th Cir. 1983) (owner relinquished expectation of privacy when she lent her automobile to third party).

complaint, delays of more than six months have generally been sufficient to trigger successful "deprivation of due process" defenses. In reviewing the merits of a defense of unreasonable delay, the determination of reasonableness is a finding of fact. The court will generally allow time for investigating and processing petitions for mitigation and remission. The courts are divided on whether the delay must cause harm before it can be found unconstitutional. A claimant's dependency on the property may strengthen the claim. Courts also look less favorably on delay when the property seized is a wasting asset, such as an automobile. Note, An Analysis of Federal Drug-Related Civil Forfeiture, 34 Maine L. Rev. 435 (1982).

3. Double Jeopardy

United States v. Ursery, 518 U.S. 267 (1996), held that in rem civil forfeitures are neither punishment nor criminal for purposes of the Double Jeopardy Clause. Id. at 278. Thus, after a person is convicted, the government may commence a separate, civil in rem proceeding against property used in the underlying offense without offending the Double Jeopardy Clause.

The mere denomination of a forfeiture statute as "in rem" does not end the analysis. Rather, the court employs a two-part analytical construct to determine whether "in rem" forfeiture statutes are in substance "in personam" criminal penalties, subject to the proscriptions of the Double Jeopardy Clause. Id. at 7. First, the courts must look to whether the legislature designed the forfeiture statute as a remedial civil sanction. See id.; see also United States v. One Assortment of 89 Firearms, 465 U.S. 354, 363 (1984). Second, courts must look to "whether the statutory scheme was so punitive either in purpose or effect as to negate [the legislature's] intention to establish a civil remedial mechanism." Ursery, 518 U.S. at 278 (internal citations and quotations omitted).

VII. FORFEITURE PROCEDURES

A. Terminology

The following terms are commonly used in forfeiture statutes and are defined, interpreted, or distinguished in the cases cited:

"Intended for use": United States v. Ader, 520 F. Supp. 313, 325 (E.D.N.C. 1980) (in connection with 21 U.S.C. § 881).

"Proceeds traceable to a drug transaction": This language "has been interpreted to include a requirement that the property have a substantial connection to illegal drug trafficking." United States v. A Single Family Residence, 803 F.2d 625, 628 (11th Cir. 1986).

"Proximity to drugs": D.C. Code § 48-905.02(a)(7)(B), which creates a presumption that money found in close proximity to drugs was used or intended for use in violation of the drug laws, was found unconstitutional in District of Columbia v. $987 (Purvis Williams), 115 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 1393 (D.C. Super. Ct. July 8, 1987) (von Kann, J.).

Quantity of drugs necessary to effect a forfeiture: Under the terms of federal and District of Columbia statutes, the amount of drugs involved is immaterial to the forfeiture case. United States v. One 1976 Porsche 911S, 670 F.2d 810, 812 (9th Cir. 1979); United States v. One Clipper Bow Ketch Nisku, 548 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1977); United States v. One 1975 Chevrolet K-5 Blazer, 495 F. Supp. 737, 740 (W.D. Mich. 1980); United States v. One 1977 Chevrolet Pickup, 503 F. Supp. 1027, 1030 (D. Colo. 1980); United States v. One 1975 Mercury Monarch, 423 F. Supp. 1026, 1029 (S.D.N.Y. 1976). These cases merely construed the statutes; they did not address the issue of whether the Eighth Amendment proportionality requirement is implicated.

Substantial connection requirement: United States v. One 1994 Cadillac Eldorado Sedan, 548 F.2d 421 (2nd Cir. 1977); United States v. One 1972 Datsun, 378 F. Supp. 1200 (D.N.H. 1974).

"To facilitate": United States v. 1990 Toyota 4 Runner, 9 F.3d 657 (7th Cir. 1993); United States v. One 1972 Chevrolet Corvette, 625 F.2d 1026 (1st Cir. 1980); Platt v. United States, 163 F.2d 165, 166-67 (10th Cir. 1947); United States v. One Dodge Coupe, 43 F. Supp. 60 (S.D.N.Y. 1942).

"Used in a gambling operation": Vasille v. District of Columbia, 296 A.2d 443 (D.C. 1972).

B. Seizure Warrants, Restraining Orders, and Warrantless Seizures

Property subject to forfeiture under this chapter may be seized by law enforcement officials, as designated by the Mayor, upon process issued by the Superior Court of the District of Columbia having jurisdiction over the property, or without process if authorized by other law.

D.C. Code § 48-905.02(b). Presumably, the "other law" referred to is the body of search and seizure law, developed in criminal cases, authorizing warrantless searches and seizures. See 21 U.S.C. § 881(b) for similar federal provisions.

1. Seizure Warrants

In federal cases, property subject to forfeiture may be seized with a warrant obtained pursuant to the procedures outlined in Rule C of the Supplemental Rules for Certain Admiralty and Maritime Claims of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, by filing a verified complaint meeting the specificity requirements of Rule E. Until 1985, Rule C required the clerk to issue the warrant; there was no provision for judicial determination of probable cause. This rule has been found unconstitutional by numerous courts.[10] The Supplemental Rules have preserved admiralty law's

[10] United States v. $38,000, 816 F.2d 1538 (11th Cir. 1987); United States v. Device, Labeled Thermatic, 641 F.2d 1289 (9th Cir. 1981); Application of Kingsley, 614 F. Supp. 219 (D. Mass. 1985), appeal dismissed, 802 F.2d 571 (1st Cir. 1986); United States v. Life Insurance Co. of Virginia, 647 F. Supp. 732 (W.D.N.C. 1986); United States v. $128,035, 628 F. Supp. 668 (S.D. Ohio), appeal dismissed, 806 F.2d 262 (6th Cir. 1986); United States v. 4880 S.E. Dixie Highway, 612 F. Supp. 1492 (S.D. Fla. 1985). See also Cupl, Charting a New Course: Proposed Amendments to the Supplemental Rules for Admiralty Arrest and Attachment, 103 F.R.D. 319 (1984); Batiza & Partridge, The special procedures of arrest and attachment, but have been challenged as violating the principles of procedural due process enunciated in a line of decisions involving state attachment and provisional remedies statutes. See North Georgia Finishing, Inc. v. Di-Chem, Inc., 419 U.S. 601 (1975); Mitchell v. W.T. Grant Co., 416 U.S. 600 (1974); Fuentes v. Shevin, 407 U.S. 67 (1972); Sniadach v. Family Finance Corp., 395 U.S. 337 (1969). The rule was amended in 1985 to require a determination of probable cause by a disinterested magistrate, except in forfeiture cases. The questions regarding the constitutionality of this procedure continue to occur in forfeiture cases. Many federal courts have solved this problem by local rule. In some federal jurisdictions, local rules also provide post-seizure probable cause hearings at which the claimant can put on evidence. Strafer, Civil Forfeitures: Protecting the Innocent Owner, 37 U. Fla. L. Rev. 841, 850-52 (1985).

2. Restraining Orders

Under the RICO and CCE criminal forfeiture statutes, once an indictment has been filed, the criminal court has jurisdiction to enter restraining orders, injunctions, or prohibitions; to require posting of performance bonds; or to take any other action it deems proper to prevent dissipation of forfeitable assets before the conclusion of the case. See 18 U.S.C. § 1963(e); 21 U.S.C. § 848(d).

Under RICO, a restraining order may be obtained before indictment if: (1) persons holding interests in the property are given notice and an opportunity for a hearing; (2) the court finds a substantial probability that the government will prevail, and that failure to enter a restraining order will result in dissipation of the property; and (3) the need to preserve the availability of the property outweighs the hardship on any party against whom the order is to be entered. 18 U.S.C. § 1963(d)(1).[11]

3. Warrantless Seizures

Both D.C. Code § 48-905.02(b) and 21 U.S.C. § 881(b)(4) provide exceptions to the warrant requirement in the seizure of assets for forfeiture. Generally, the power to seize is co-extensive with the power to search without a warrant, provided the search leads to probable cause to seize. The same exceptions to the warrant requirement apply to searches for evidence and seizures for forfeiture. Thus, if a search is proper under an exception to the warrant requirement and it turns up evidence leading to probable cause to support a forfeiture of the automobile, container, etc., the evidence may be seized. There are, however, a few qualifications to that general rule.

It has been held that seizure of the res must occur contemporaneously with the event giving rise to probable cause for seizure, and there must be a showing of exigent circumstances.

Constitutional Challenge to Maritime Seizures, 26 Loy. L. Rev. 203 (1980); Morse, The Conflict Between the Supreme Court Admiralty Rules and Sniadach-Fuentes: A Collision Course?, 3 Fla. St. U. L. Rev. 1 (1975).

[11] The constitutionality of these provisions has been the source of a great deal of controversy because, at least in post-indictment restraining order cases, they fail to provide a prompt post-seizure probable cause hearing. See Note, RICO Post-Indictment Restraining Orders: The Process Due Defendants, 60 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1162, 1166 (1985). District of Columbia law has no similar provisions.

> Since § 881(b)(4) creates an exception that threatens to swallow § 881(b)'s warrant requirement, we would be reluctant to give it an absolutely literal reading. . . . We think it reasonable to read the "probable cause" exception as justifying the warrantless seizure of an automobile only when the seizure immediately follows the occurrence that gives the federal agents probable cause to believe that the automobile is subject to forfeiture under section 881(a) and the exigencies of the surrounding circumstances make the requirement of obtaining process unreasonable or unnecessary.

United States v. Pappas, 613 F.2d 324, 327, 329-30 (1st Cir. 1979). United States v. One 1977 Lincoln Mark V Coupe, 643 F.2d 154 (3d Cir. 1981), held that a short delay after the incident giving rise to probable cause does not invalidate a warrantless seizure. However, the ruling is undermined by the court's reliance on language from an older case indicating that the body of search and seizure law applicable to criminal cases does not apply to civil forfeiture, a contention clearly rejected in One 1958 Plymouth Sedan v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 380 U.S. 693 (1965).[12]

C. The Period Between Seizure and Commencement of Proceedings

1. Suspension of Right to Replevin

The forfeiture statutes specifically prohibit a property owner from bringing a replevin action (a civil suit seeking return of the property) when the property is seized under a forfeiture statute.[13] The trade-off requirement that the government file the forfeiture action "promptly" is without teeth. The length of delay before filing the forfeiture complaint is limited only by the Due Process Clause and $8,850, 461 U.S. 555. However, $8,850 motions cannot be filed until the government files the complaint or libel of information. Claimants can be rendered destitute by the seizure and indefinite detention of property.

2. Post-seizure Probable Cause Determination

The problem with allowing warrantless seizures of property for forfeiture is that, in most courts, there is no probable cause determination at any time prior to trial.[14] The res may be detained for years without any judicial finding of probable cause. When the res is the claimant's only car, or [12] Because real estate does not fit within the automobile exception, or any other exception relating to portable property (thus removing the exigency), a warrant is generally required for seizure of real estate for forfeiture. United States v. $128,035, 628 F. Supp. 668, 675 (S.D. Ohio), appeal dismissed, 806 F.2d 262 (6th Cir. 1986); see also Sinoway, Seizures of Houses and Real Property Under Marijuana Forfeiture Laws, 14 Search & Seizure L. Rpt. 113 (May 1987). Warrants are also generally obtained when the forfeitable property, such as a bank account, is held by another.

[13] Property taken or detained under this section shall not be repleviable, but shall be deemed to be in the custody of the Attorney General, subject only to the orders and decrees of the court or the official having jurisdiction thereof. 21 U.S.C. § 881(c); see also D.C. Code § 48-905.02(d)(2) ("Property, other than controlled substances, taken or detained under this section shall not be subject to replevin, but is deemed to be in the custody of the Mayor.") even virtually all of the claimant's assets – as RICO and CCE authorize – this deprivation is extremely severe. The amount of process "due" increases with the severity of the deprivation. Numerous articles have argued that the denial of a right to a post-seizure probable cause hearing is unconstitutional. See Strafer, End-Running the Fourth Amendment: Forfeiture Seizures of Real Property Under Admiralty Process, 25 Am. Crim. L. Rev. 59 (1987); Note, Criminal Forfeiture and the Necessity for a Post-Seizure Hearing: Are CCE and RICO Rackets for the Government?, 57 St. Johns L. Rev. 776 (1983); Kandaras, Due Process and Federal Property Forfeiture Statutes: The Need for Immediate Post-Seizure Hearing, 34 Sw. L.J. 925 (1980).

[14] But see Monsanto IV for exception regarding requirement of probable cause hearing for assets needed to retain counsel of choice.

Patterson, 117 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 741, ruled that the Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable seizures requires that a forfeiture claimant receive a prompt probable cause determination on demand. This determination appears to be something in the nature of a Gerstein proffer. Id. at 746.

No corresponding remedy exists in the federal courts, except for motions for return of property brought in the criminal case, or where the court provides such remedies by local rule. In both federal and local courts, motions for return of property, filed in the criminal case under Criminal Rule 41, sometimes provide a probable cause determination, although they are often ineffectual. See infra Section VIII.A.

D. Notice

Published notice is of negligible value to property owners, and is insufficient under the Due Process Clause when the names and addresses of owners of interests in property are readily ascertainable.[15]

> An elementary and fundamental requirement of due process in any proceeding which is to be accorded finality is notice reasonably calculated under all the circumstances to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action and afford them an opportunity to present their objections . . . The notice must be of such a nature as reasonably to convey the required information . . . and it must afford a reasonable time for those interested to make their appearance . . .
> But when notice is a person's due, process which is a mere gesture is not due process . . .

[15] Names and addresses are "readily ascertainable" if they are available in the deed records and tax rolls. Schroeder v. City of New York, 371 U.S. 208, 210 (1962). See also Vance v. United States, 676 F.2d 183, 186 (5th Cir. 1982) (police and DEA agents knew claimant's name and address; published notice alone insufficient*); Jaekel v. United States*, 304 F. Supp. 993, 998-99 (S.D.N.Y. 1969) (same). If the claimant is incarcerated by the state that is attempting to forfeit the property, the government has knowledge of the person's whereabouts and must send notice to the person at the institution. Robinson v. Hanrahan, 409 U.S. 38, 40 (1972). However, this does not seem to be the government's general practice. To be on the safe side, a prisoner should have someone watching the mail at the prisoner's residence from the time the property is seized. It is also a good idea to notify the government in writing of a change of address, including place of incarceration.

> Where the names and post office addresses of those affected by a proceeding are at hand, the reasons disappear for resort to means less likely than the mails to apprise them of its pendency.

Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank, 339 U.S. 306, 314-15, 318 (1950) (citations omitted).

In the District of Columbia cases, the first notice that the claimant's property is being seized for asset forfeiture is called a Notice of Intent to Administratively Forfeit Property or a Form PD 149 issued from the Metropolitan Police Department. Pursuant to D.C. Code § 48-905.02(d)(3)(A), this Notice must be sent by registered or certified mail to the registered owner of the property and to the person from whom the property was physically seized. Pursuant to SCR 71A-I, the Metropolitan Police Department must publish this Notice for two (2) successive weeks in a local newspaper. Most property is held at the Metropolitan Police Department's Evidence Control Branch located at 2235 Shannon Place, S.E. Vehicles are held at the Metropolitan Police Department's Blue Plains Impound Lot located at 5001 Shepherd Parkway, S.W.

1. District of Columbia

In District of Columbia cases, the first notice the claimant will receive is the "Libel of Information," the equivalent of a civil complaint. Claimants must file a claim and post a bond within 30 days of receiving notice. The Libel of Information must be sent by first-class mail to the last known address of:

> any lienholder of record . . . any person who has made written claim to the res to Office of the Attorney General, and . . . any other person who is known or in the exercise of reasonable diligence should be known to the Office of the Attorney General to have a right of claim to the res.

Failure to post a bond will result in an administrative forfeiture. The property will be retained by the Mayor of the District of Columbia. The property will be administratively forfeited to the District of Columbia if the interested party does not post a bond in a timely fashion. The Mayor will sell, retain for official use, or destroy the forfeited property. See D.C. Code § 48-905.01(d)(4).

Super. Ct. Civ. R. 71A-I. Libels of information are usually eight or nine pages, and include a large number of unrelated property seizures grouped together into one case. The claimant must file an answer with D.C. Superior Court Civil Clerk's Office (Room JM-220) by the "return date." The return date is listed on the page captioned "The President of the United States to the Marshal for Said District, Greetings," usually the last page of the Libel of Information. Pursuant to SCR 71A-I, the date of return shall be at least twenty (20) days from the date of publication of notice.

If the claimant does not file a timely answer, the Office of the Attorney General will obtain a default judgment and the property will automatically be forfeited and sold at auction or put into government use. This is known as a Default Decree of Condemnation and Forfeiture.

2. Federal Cases

The notice of seizure may be sent at any time. In most cases, it arrives six months or more after seizure. The claimant must respond by filing a claim. The notice is mailed to the claimant just before the first publication date, and specifies the publication in which notice will appear.

E. Claim and Cost Bond

In the District of Columbia cases, pursuant to D.C. Code § 48-905.02(d)(3)(B), claimants of seized property must post a bond in order to seek redress for the seizure of the property to be forfeited. The bond for the property can range from a minimum of $250 to a maximum of $2,500. For vehicles, the bond can range from $250 to ten (10) percent of the value of the vehicle. The value of the vehicle is assessed by the Metropolitan Police Department.

Under federal law, the Civil Asset Forfeiture Reform Act of 2000, 18 U.S.C. § 981, abolished the claimant's requirement of the posting of a bond in order to proceed with a federal civil forfeiture case. Previously, to obtain a judicial proceeding, a claimant had to file a written claim with the administrative agency and post a cost bond.

PRACTICE TIP:

Claimants who are indigent or are otherwise unable to pay the bond may file an application known as an Application for Waiver or Reduction Bond with the Metropolitan Police Department to have the bond reduced or waived. Applications are available at the MPD Evidence Control Branch.

F. Administrative Procedure

1. District of Columbia Cases

The Metropolitan Police Department conducts the administrative forfeiture of seized property for District of Columbia criminal cases. The Notice of Intent to Administratively Forfeit Property will also contain a cursory description of the property that the Metropolitan Police Department seeks to have forfeited. In order to prevent an administrative forfeiture, the claimant must post a bond with the MPD Evidence Control Branch for the property that is sought to be forfeited. Once the bond is posted, the Metropolitan Police Department will make a determination whether or not to release the property under the innocent owner statutes or to forward the case to the Office of the Attorney General for litigation in D.C. Superior Court.

2. Federal Cases

The notices sent out by the agency (DEA, FBI, or Customs) give only a cursory description of the possible remedies. They explain that one can avoid paying the cost bond by pursuing administrative remedies and waiving any judicial remedies. What they do not make clear is that if the claimant files only a petition for remission, there will be no hearing and the agency's decision will be unreviewable. The only evidence that will be considered is what the claimant submits with the petition for remission. Also, there is no discovery of the government's case. The agencies deny many petitions for remission or mitigation without giving detailed reasons. Claimants may pursue this administrative route along with the judicial route if they post the cost bond or qualify for in forma pauperis treatment. Petitions for remission or mitigation must comply with the requirements of 21 CFR §§ 1316.79 through 1316.81 in DEA and FBI cases, or 19 CFR §§ 171.12 through 171.14 for customs seizures.

G. Judicial Procedure – Civil Forfeiture

1. The Complaint or Libel of Information

Forfeiture cases under District of Columbia law are commenced with the filing of a Libel of Information, which must:

> allege a description of the property seized, the date and place of the seizure, the person or persons from whom the property was seized, and that the property was used, or was to be used, in violation of the District of Columbia Code, specifying the applicable section(s).

Super. Ct. Civ. R. 71A-I(a).

The standard libel of information is not verified, but alleges "on information and belief." It does not clearly set out the procedures to be followed to contest the forfeiture. It directs the claimant to "duly intervene[16] and file an answer by the return date of such process," but does not specify the return date. The return is found in the Order for Issuance of Warrant and Advertising of Seizure, which is on the page entitled, "The President of the United States to the Marshal for Said District, Greetings." The return date is usually sixty (60) days after the case has been filed.

In federal cases, judicial forfeiture proceedings commence with the filing of a complaint, whose contents are governed by Supplemental Rules C and E.

> In actions in rem the complaint shall be verified on oath or solemn affirmation. It shall describe with reasonable particularity the property that is the subject of the action and state that it is within the district or will be during the pendency of the action. In actions for the enforcement of forfeitures for violation of any statute of the United States the complaint shall state the place of seizure and whether it was on land or on navigable waters, and shall contain such allegations as may be required by the statute pursuant to which the action is brought.

Supp. R. C(2).

[16] This language is misleading. A claimant who receives this notice is virtually always named as a party respondent, in which case there is no need to move to intervene. An unnamed claimant who wishes to intervene should follow the procedures of Super. Ct. Civ. R. 24.

> [T]he complaint shall state the circumstances from which the claim arises with such particularity that the defendant or claimant will be able, without moving for a more definite statement, to commence an investigation of the facts and to frame a responsive pleading.

Supp. R. E(2). Non-compliance with the requirements of verification and specificity subjects the complaint to dismissal, though courts disagree about the level of specificity required. United States v. 1625 S. Delaware Ave., 661 F. Supp. 161, 163 (E.D. Pa. 1987); United States v. $39,000 in Canadian Currency, 801 F.2d 1210, 1222 (10th Cir. 1986); United States v. One 1980 Ford Mustang, 648 F. Supp. 1305, 1308 (N.D. Ind. 1986). The court may dismiss the complaint on these grounds sua sponte if it gives the government notice and an opportunity to amend the complaint. Id. However, if an amended complaint is filed, it will relate back to the date of the original filing and will not be necessary to release the property from seizure. 1625 S. Delaware Ave., 661 F. Supp. at 163.

2. Claim and Answer

Although Rule 71A-I(c) states that a default may be entered "if no answer or claim" is filed before the return date; the word "claim" does not appear elsewhere in the rule. In accepted practice, one document, commonly entitled "Claim and Answer to Libel" or "Answer," is filed in response to a libel of information.[17]

Under federal law, the claimant must file:

> a claim within 10 days after process has been executed, or within such additional time as may be allowed by the court, and shall serve an answer within 20 days after the filing of the claim. The claim shall be verified on oath or solemn affirmation, and shall state the interest in the property by virtue of which the claimant demands its restitution and the right to defend the action. If the claim is made on behalf of the person entitled to possession by an agent, bailee, or attorney, it shall state that the agent, bailee or attorney is duly authorized to make the claim.

Supp. R. C(6). Failure to file under Rule C deprives the claimant of standing to defend against the forfeiture. One 1980 Ford Mustang, 648 F. Supp. at 1307; United States v. Fourteen Handguns, 524 F. Supp. 395, 397 (S.D. Texas 1981). The claim required here should not be confused with the claim filed with the administrative agency along with the cost bond, which is insufficient to satisfy the Rule C(6) requirement because it was not submitted to the court. One 1980 Ford Mustang, 648 F. Supp. at 1306 (but late filing permitted because government had alleged no facts to show probable cause, id. at 1307, 1309).

[17] Neither the statute nor the rules specify how much time must be provided for filing an answer. The rule merely requires that the libel specify the return date, which is usually twenty (20) days after the warrant of seizure is issued by the court pursuant to SCR 71A-I. The form and contents of the answer are governed by the ordinary rules of civil procedure. See Super. Ct. Civ. R. 3-I, 8, 9, 10, 12, and 13.

3. Counterclaims

There is conflicting authority on whether claimants may counterclaim for loss of use and depreciation of the res during detention. When the forfeiture is later determined to be void, the government is liable for depreciation. United States v. One 1965 Chevrolet Impala Convertible, 475 F.2d 882 (6th Cir. 1973). However, the federal government and officials are immune from liability if the court issues a certificate of probable cause for the seizure. 28 U.S.C. § 2465. Detention without probable cause is a temporary taking for which just compensation must be paid. See also 28 U.S.C. § 2680(c) (exempting from Federal Tort Claims Act's waiver of sovereign immunity claims arising out of detention of goods or merchandise by customs, excise, or other law enforcement officers); Kosak v. United States, 465 U.S. 848 (1984).

The District of Columbia and its officers and employees are immune from liability for > damage to any property resulting from the removal of such property from public space, or the transportation of such property into the custody of the Property Clerk, Metropolitan Police Department, or for damage to any such property while such property is in the custody of the Property Clerk . . . when such custody is maintained pursuant to the requirements of law, except that the government . . . or any such officer or employee may be liable for damage to such property as a result of gross negligence . . . "[G]ross negligence" means a willful intent to injure property, or a reckless or wanton disregard of the rights of another in his property.

D.C. Code § 5-119.11. This language deals only with damage, not depreciation. To the extent that it purports to immunize the government for temporary takings, it is probably unconstitutional. Even if it does provide a degree of immunity, it would not completely bar the counterclaim because the claimant might be able to prove gross negligence.

The Office of the Attorney General usually files a boilerplate motion to dismiss the counterclaim, arguing that because forfeitures are in rem actions, the defendant is the property and the claimant is not a party. The motion has been denied in a few Superior Court cases, e.g., District of Columbia v. One 1986 Mitsubishi, CA 3435-87 (King, J.), and District of Columbia v. One 1980 Blue Jaguar, CA 3256-87 (King, J.), but written opinions were not issued.

4. Jury Demand

Claimants have a right to a jury trial.[18] However, when the government has impounded an automobile or another asset that depreciates rapidly or is vital to the claimant's livelihood, most claimants desire a trial as soon as possible. Demanding a jury trial puts the case on a slower track – the first trial date is often three or more years after the answer is filed, compared to less than two years on the non-jury calendar.

[18] Pernell v. Southall Realty, 416 U.S. 363 (1974); United States v. One 1976 Mercedes Benz 280S, 618 F.2d 453 (7th Cir. 1980); One Plymouth Automobile v. United States, 165 F.2d 186 (5th Cir. 1947).

A jury trial is waived unless demanded in the answer or within ten days after filing the answer. If the demand does not specify a jury of twelve, a jury of six is provided. A fee of $75 must be paid when the demand is filed, unless the court has granted permission to proceed in forma pauperis. If the case does not go to trial, the $75 may be refunded.

5. Vacating Default Judgments

In District of Columbia cases, if the claimant does not file a timely answer, the Office of the Attorney General will obtain a "default decree of condemnation." Currently, the court does not require the government to put on ex parte proof in default cases. In fact, because Rule 71A-I allows service by first-class mail, without return receipt, the court does not even require the government to prove notice. Lack of notice, however, is grounds for vacating a default judgment.

A motion to vacate a default judgment must be accompanied by:

> a verified answer setting up a defense sufficient if proved to bar the claim in whole or in part . . . No answer need be filed if the movant accompanies the motion with a settlement agreement or a proposed consent judgment signed by both parties . . . [nor] when the movant asserts a lack of subject-matter or personal jurisdiction or when the default was entered after the movant had filed an answer.

Super. Ct. Civ. R. 55(c). Requiring a litigant who has not received notice to file a verified answer in order to vacate a default judgment is unconstitutional:

> Where a person has been deprived of property in a manner contrary to the most basic tenets of due process, "it is no answer to say that in his particular case due process of law would have led to the same result because he had no adequate defense upon the merits."

Peralta v. Heights Medical Center, Inc., 485 U.S. 80, 86-87 (1988) (citation omitted).

Pro se claimants can pick up forms for vacating a default judgment in the Civil Actions Clerk's office on the John Marshall level. The clerks there are generally helpful in telling people how to fill them out, although the lines of people waiting for information and assistance limits the amount of attention they can give individual claimants.

6. Discovery

Discovery in civil forfeiture cases is governed by the civil rules, which are much broader than criminal discovery rules. The government often cites this ability to obtain discovery to which the claimant would not be entitled in the criminal case in arguing for a stay of forfeiture proceedings pending disposition of related criminal charges.

PRACTICE TIP:

Discovery includes depositions of witnesses, including police officers; requests for production of documents, including un-redacted police reports; and interrogatories. The discovery available in a civil case can prove highly beneficial to defense counsel in the criminal proceeding.

a. Discovery and the Fifth Amendment

The government's discovery from the defendant is also broader under the civil rules; however, the privilege against self-incrimination applies.

> "[P]roceedings instituted for the purpose of declaring the forfeiture of a man's property by reason of offenses committed by him, though they may be civil in form, are in their nature criminal" for Fifth Amendment purposes . . . In both instances, money liability is predicated upon a finding of the owner's wrongful conduct; in both cases, the Fifth Amendment applies with equal force.

United States v. United States Coin & Currency, 401 U.S. 715, 718 (1971) (citation omitted). While the privilege may be asserted in answer to interrogatories, this does not mean that the forfeiture action must be dismissed.

> "[G]overnment cannot penalize assertion of the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination by imposing sanctions to compel testimony which has not been immunized . . . [T]he touchstone of the Fifth Amendment is compulsion, and direct economic sanctions and imprisonment are not the only penalties capable of forcing the self-incrimination which the Amendment forbids . . . The Supreme Court has disapproved of procedures which require a party to surrender one constitutional right in order to assert another."

United States v. United States Currency, 626 F.2d 11, 14 (6th Cir. 1980) (citations omitted).

b. Failure to Cooperate

Many pro se forfeiture claimants fail to answer interrogatories or otherwise comply with discovery requests. The government then generally moves to compel discovery under Super. Ct. Civ. R. 37(a), requesting sanctions.

A party who prevails on a motion to compel discovery is entitled to attorneys' fees and costs. Super. Ct. Civ. R. 37(a)(4). However, the rule exempts the government (District of Columbia or federal) from having to pay fees or costs for abuse of discovery. Super. Ct. Civ. R. 37(f). The equivalent federal rule was repealed.

7. Motions

Motions practice is also governed by the civil rules. However, quasi-criminal issues, such as denial of speedy trial or suppression of evidence, do not fit tidily into any of the civil motions rules. Because there are issues of fact that must be resolved by an evidentiary hearing, a motion for summary judgment is not appropriate for these issues. The motions authorized by Super. Ct. Civ. R. 12 are also inappropriate. Claimants in several Superior Court cases have successfully argued that the criminal rules should be applied to quasi-criminal motions, and have captioned their motions as if the case were a criminal case, e.g., Motion to Suppress or Motion to Dismiss for Denial of Due Process. See, e.g., District of Columbia v. One Blue Jaguar, CA 3256-87 (Beaudin, J.) (oral ruling made during trial).

In the Superior Court Civil Division, there is a filing fee of ten dollars for every motion unless the claimant has been granted leave to proceed in forma pauperis. The government does not have to pay filing fees.

8. Burden of Proof

In criminal forfeiture cases (e.g., RICO, CCE, and the criminal forfeiture provision of the federal drug laws), the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the property is subject to forfeiture. Under the civil forfeiture statutes, the government's burden is to show "probable cause," as defined in connection with the Fourth Amendment. Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 175-76 (1949). The burden then shifts to the claimant to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the property is not subject to forfeiture. United States v. $2500, 689 F.2d 10, 12 (2d Cir. 1982), and Bramble v. Richardson, 498 F.2d 968 (10th Cir. 1974), held that proof beyond a reasonable doubt is not constitutionally required in civil forfeiture cases; neither specifically addressed the issue of whether probable cause was too low a burden of proof for the deprivation of such valuable property rights. See McClendon v. Rosetti, 460 F.2d 111, 116 (2d Cir. 1972) (shifting burden to claimant violated due process).

9. Stays During Pendency of Criminal Case

Because the broad discovery rules applicable in civil forfeiture cases can be used to obtain evidence that is not discoverable under the criminal rules, the government often requests a stay of the civil forfeiture proceeding pending disposition of the criminal case. A stay should not be automatically granted because undue delay in holding the forfeiture trial implicates the Due Process Clause. United States v. Banco Cafetero Panama, 797 F.2d 1154 (2d Cir. 1986). Rather, the court must:

> weigh competing interests and maintain an even balance. True, the suppliant for a stay must make out a clear case of hardship or inequity in being required to go forward, if there is even a fair possibility that the stay for which he prays will work damage to some one else. Only in rare circumstances will a litigant in one cause be compelled to stand aside while a litigant in another settles the rule of law that will define the rights of both. Considerations such as these, however, are counsels of moderation rather than limitations upon power . . . Impressed with the > likelihood or danger of abuse, some courts have stated broadly that, irrespective of particular conditions, there is no power by a stay to compel an unwilling litigant to wait upon the outcome of a controversy to which he is a stranger. Such a formula . . . is too mechanical and narrow. All the cases advancing it could have been adequately disposed of on the ground that discretion was abused by a stay of indefinite duration in the absence of a pressing need.

Landis v. North American Co., 299 U.S. 248, 254-55 (1936) (citations omitted).

The calculus changes if the forfeiture case includes a third party not involved in the criminal action. When other means could be employed to protect the criminal prosecution from the risk of revealing undiscoverable information – protective orders, in camera discovery, sealed files, and other restrictions on dissemination of discovery materials – the government's need for the stay is outweighed by the claimant's due process rights under $8,850, 461 U.S. 555.

10. Expediting the Civil Forfeiture Process

While there is no formal procedure to expedite the trial date in either the federal or local system, things can be done to speed up the process. The "squeaky wheel" concept helps. Filing a motion for return of property or to dismiss for denial of speedy trial may bring immediate results. Even if the motion is denied, it makes a record that the claimant is asserting rights to speedy resolution of the case.

PRACTICE TIP:

In the event that the claimant is an innocent owner, defense counsel should take the affirmative step of contacting the Office of the Attorney General to set the process in motion for return of the property. Even with circumstances in which the claimant has plead guilty in the criminal matter, contacting the Office of the Attorney General to start settlement negotiations can prevent long delays in the return of some or all of the property.

11. Stays Pending Appeal

Stay pending appeal of orders of forfeiture, or denying forfeiture, are governed by Super. Ct. Civ. R. 62. Some courts have held that when a claimant loses a forfeiture trial and fails to obtain a stay, the resulting sale or disposal of the vehicle deprives the court of jurisdiction. United States v. $57,480.05, 722 F.2d 1457 (9th Cir. 1984); Canal Steel Works v. One Drag Line Dredge, 48 F.2d 212 (5th Cir. 1931). This rule is particularly harsh if the res is a depreciating asset, such as a car, and there is no mechanism by which a substitute res (such as a surety bond) can be posted to preserve the court's jurisdiction. An extension of this rule to situations where the claimant prevails at trial and the government appeals would produce absurd results. This is another area in which the court should tailor a remedy – such as a stipulation of jurisdiction, or a substitute res – so that the value of the property is not dissipated during the pendency of the appeal.

The District of Columbia courts have not specifically adopted this doctrine.[19] However, to be on the safe side, claimants wishing to appeal a judgment of forfeiture should take immediate steps to stay the judgment, lest the rule later be applied to deprive the appellate court of jurisdiction.

VIII. COLLATERAL REMEDIES

A. Motions for Return of Property

The prosecutor assigned to the criminal case can file a PD 81c to have property released. However, if a prosecutor is unwilling to submit this form, then defense counsel can file a Motion for Return of Property under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 41. Some judges deny such motions without a hearing, requiring instead that the government file a forfeiture action within a specified period of time. However, a few favorable rulings have been obtained, giving claimants some remedy for prolonged detention of property seized without a determination of probable cause to believe it is forfeitable. United States v. Golden, 115 Wash. D.L. Rptr. 733 (D.C. Super. Ct. Apr. 13, 1987) (von Kann, J.), held, after a criminal defendant pled guilty to a misdemeanor, that an automobile owned by the defendant's father would be returned to him pending trial in the forfeiture case, upon the posting of a bond sufficient to cover the losses to the District in the event the government prevailed at trial.

> [T]he evidence . . . overwhelmingly established that the use of this automobile to facilitate the transportation of controlled substances was carried on wholly without the owner's knowledge or consent. Accordingly, absent additional evidence which might change this conclusion, the subject vehicle is indeed exempt from [forfeiture] under D.C. Code § 48-905.02 . . .
> [I]n view of the strong showing made by defendant at the hearing on this motion, it seems unfair to require that the vehicle remain parked on the District's impoundment lot for the months or years that may pass before the civil forfeiture proceeding is concluded. Doing so would deprive defendant and his family of the use of the vehicle for a long time while its value gradually declines. Even if they ultimately recover the vehicle after successfully prevailing in the libel action, there is no provision in § 48-905.02 to compensate them for the loss of the use of the vehicle during this time or its diminished value.

Id. at 738-39.

Even if the court denies a hearing on the motion, it will usually require the government to file a forfeiture action by a certain time, which expedites the case to some extent. Furthermore, filing [19] The government argued it in one Superior Court case in opposition to a motion for reconsideration. The court ruled for the government, but did not specify which of several alternative grounds it relied upon. District of Columbia v. One 1984 Toyota Cressida, CA 6063-86 (Burnett, J.).

a motion for return of property is a way to assert a demand for a speedy trial for purposes of a later $8,850 motion.

PRACTICE TIP:

Ask the prosecutor in the criminal case to file a Property Release Form, PD 81c, before filing a Motion for Return of Property. However, the release of the property in the criminal matter will not authorize the release of the property in an asset forfeiture proceeding.

B. Collateral Attacks on Forfeitures

Because the forfeiture statutes themselves bar claimants from filing replevin actions (civil suits for the return of property, see note 12, supra, and accompanying text), the claimant generally has only two options to secure relief – through a motion for return of property in the criminal case or through the forfeiture action itself. A number of courts have held that claimants who receive notice of the forfeiture process cannot ignore those procedures and file a collateral suit.

1. Lack of Notice

The court must provide relief if property is forfeited without constitutionally adequate notice, by either vacating the default judgment or allowing a collateral suit. Seguin v. Eide, 720 F.2d 1046 (9th Cir. 1983); Wiren, 542 F.2d 757; Glup v. United States, 523 F.2d 557 (8th Cir. 1975); Menkarell v. Bureau of Narcotics, 463 F.2d 88 (3d Cir. 1972); Jaekel, 304 F. Supp. at 999. The complainant need not demonstrate a meritorious defense in order to get relief.

> [I]t is not denied by appellee that . . . a judgment entered without notice or service is constitutionally infirm . . .
>
> The Texas courts nevertheless held, as appellee urged them to do, that to have the judgment set aside, appellant was required to show that he had a meritorious defense, apparently on the ground that without a defense, the same judgment would again be entered on retrial and hence appellant had suffered no harm from the judgment entered without notice. But this reasoning is untenable. As appellant asserts, had he had notice of the suit, he might have impleaded the employee whose debt had been guaranteed, worked out a settlement, or paid the debt. He would also have preferred to sell his property himself in order to raise funds rather than suffer it sold at a constable's auction. . . .
> Where a person has been deprived of property in a manner contrary to the most basic tenets of due process, "it is no answer to say that in his particular case due process of law would have led to the same result because he had no adequate defense upon the merits." . . . [O]nly "wip[ing] the slate clean . . . would have restored the petitioner to the position he would have occupied had due process of > law been accorded to him in the first place." The Due Process Clause demands no less in this case.

Peralta, 485 U.S. at 84-87 (citations omitted).

2. Void Forfeitures

When a forfeiture is void, the claimant may collaterally attack it and obtain return of the property or compensation for its value. United States Coin & Currency, 401 U.S. 715, declared unconstitutional a statute that required gamblers to register and pay a gambling tax and that provided for forfeiture of proceeds as an additional sanction. The Court relied on the criminal cases of Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39 (1968), and Grosso v. United States, 390 U.S. 62 (1968), in holding that penalizing the failure to register as a gambler unconstitutionally burdened the privilege against self-incrimination. Because the statute was unconstitutional, the forfeiture was void.

While a statute may be saved by reading into it the appropriate constitutional requirements, individual forfeitures may be vacated if the statute as applied violates the Constitution.

3. Statute of Limitations

Collateral suits should be entertained when the statute of limitations for initiating a forfeiture action has passed without the government having taken the necessary action. Forfeiture provisions that suspend the claimant's rights to replevin also require the government to institute proceedings "promptly."[20]

Collateral suits have been brought in a variety of other forms, including Bivens-type actions, Seguin, 720 F.2d 1046; actions under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Ford v. Turner, 531 A.2d 233 (D.C. 1987); and inverse condemnation actions under the Just Compensation Clause of the Fifth Amendment and the Tucker Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1346(a)(2), United States v. One 1965 Chevrolet Impala Convertible, 475 F.2d 882 (6th Cir. 1973); United States v. One 1961 Red Chevrolet Impala Sedan, 457 F.2d 1353 (5th Cir. 1972); Jaekel, 304 F. Supp. at 997.

IX. PROPERTY CLERK PROCEEDINGS

A. Administrative Forfeiture Statutes

There are a number of statutes, other than the drug, firearms, prostitution and gambling laws, under which the government can permanently deprive persons of property. Forfeiture statutes administered by the MPD Property Clerk include D.C. Code §§ 5-119.02 et seq. (lost, [20] "In the event of seizure pursuant to subsection (b) of this section, proceedings under subsection (d) of this section shall be instituted promptly . . . Property, other than controlled substances, taken or detained under this section shall not be subject to replevin, but is deemed to be in the custody of the Mayor. " D.C. Code § 48-905.02(c), (d)(2).

abandoned, and stolen property); 22-1630 (hunting and fishing equipment); 22-4517 (dangerous articles); 25-803 (alcoholic beverages);[21] and 47-2320 (untaxed gasoline).[22]

These statutes differ drastically from the drug and gambling statutes in both substance and procedure. They are not governed by the procedures in Super. Ct. Civ. R. 71A-I, and generally never appear in Superior Court at all. Instead, the procedures terminating property interests are conducted entirely within an administrative agency.

Several other statutes, though not forfeiture statutes, authorize the police to take property into their possession. Once the property is in the custody of the Property Clerk, it is disposed of in accordance with D.C. Code §§ 5-119.02 et seq., which means in most cases that the property is sold at auction, without any judicial proceedings. See D.C. Code §§ 22-3214 (dangerous weapons) and 23-525 (evidence seized pursuant to a search warrant).

As written, the administrative forfeiture statutes lack minimum due process safeguards. The Court of Appeals has read into them the requirements of notice, "reasonably calculated" to inform owners of interests in the property of the reasons for the seizure and ways in which to contest the forfeiture, and an opportunity to be heard. Ford, 531 A.2d at 237-38. It is unclear whether the government has instituted any major changes in notice practices and procedures in response to Ford. MPD General Order 601.1, "Recording, Handling and Disposition of Property Coming into the Custody of the Department," requires notice to the owner only in certain situations, and has not been revised since 1981. Special Order 88.27, effective July 26, 1988, added internal regulations, but applies only to drug and gambling forfeiture cases under D.C. Code §§ 48-905.02 and 22-1705(c).

Because these takings occur without judicial or any other scrutiny that might bring to light failures of notice or the opportunity to be heard, attorneys should be particularly wary when property fitting one of these categories is seized, and should warn potential claimants to take affirmative action to assert their claims in writing to the Property Clerk, the Office of the Attorney General, or both.

B. Office of the Property Clerk

D.C. Code §§ 5-119.01 et seq. created the Office of the Property Clerk and defines its powers and responsibilities. Section 5-119.05 empowers the Clerk to administer oaths and certify depositions that may be necessary to establish the ownership of any property or money lost, [21] Section 25-803 authorizes forfeiture of alcoholic beverages sold, consumed, or held for sale in violation of the ABC laws, as well as "other property designed for use in connection with the unlawful manufacture," etc., of alcoholic beverages. The property is to be returned upon acquittal or forfeited upon conviction of the underlying criminal offense. D.C. Code § 25-803(o).

[22] Section 47-2320 declares as contraband all motor vehicle fuels on which required taxes have not been paid; any vehicles used to transport such fuels are subject to forfeiture. The statute expressly negates any judicial remedies: "The Mayor shall not in any way be held responsible for the seizure or the confiscation . . . under this chapter." To the extent it purports to deprive claimants of notice and a hearing, it is unconstitutional. While the Mayor has discretion to return property if the failure to comply with the fuel tax requirements is excusable, D.C. Code § 47-2320(c), this provision may not be enough to save the statute from successful challenge on due process grounds.

abandoned, or returned to the clerk under the directions of the Mayor, including property that is alleged to have been feloniously obtained or to be the proceeds of crime.

The Clerk has the power to adjudicate the status of the property. If the property is owned by someone other than the person it was taken from, it is returned to its adjudicated owner; if the owner is unknown, it reverts to the District. Lost or abandoned property is summarily forfeited to the District unless someone comes forward with sufficient proof of ownership. Proceeds of crime are returned to the owner, if the owner is not the criminal defendant; if the owner does not come forward, the government retains the property. "Dangerous articles" may be transferred to a District or federal agency to be put to use, or destroyed if they have no value. D.C. Code § 22-4517; see infra Section C.1.b.

The Clerk is immune from liability for any official action performed in good faith under the Property Clerk statute. D.C. Code § 5-119.06(c). The Clerk and the District of Columbia are immune from liability for damages to the property while it is in the custody of the District, "when such custody is maintained pursuant to the requirements of law." D.C. Code § 5-119.11. However, the government and its officers are liable for damages from gross negligence ("a willful intent to injure property, or a reckless or wanton disregard of the rights of another in his property"). Id.

C. Procedures in the Property Clerk's Office

Sections 5-119.06 to 5-119.10 set out the procedures generally used by the Property Clerk. Some of the administrative forfeiture statutes have their own distinct procedures. Others dovetail with the Property Clerk statute procedures at some point – that is, usually the earlier proceedings are governed by the specific statute and, if the owner is not found, the property is treated as if abandoned, following the procedures of D.C. Code § 5-119.10.

1. Release to the Owner

In general, the Property Clerk must return property to its owner (or the owner's representative) "upon satisfactory evidence of ownership." D.C. Code § 5-119.06(a).

> [S]eizure or impoundment of property by the Metropolitan Police Department from an individual is prima facie evidence of that person's ownership of the property. The prima facie evidence shall constitute a presumption of ownership by possession and in the absence of other evidence or claims of others shall be satisfactory evidence of ownership.

D.C. Code § 5-119.06(a-1). When two or more persons claim ownership, the Clerk must give notice of a hearing to both by registered mail, receive evidence, and determine ownership. There are a number of exceptions depending on the type of property, who claims ownership, how the property is characterized, and other variations.

a. Property allegedly feloniously obtained or proceeds of crime

No property alleged to be feloniously obtained or the proceeds of crime may be released to an alleged victim of crime until the criminal trial is over, or one year after its seizure, unless the United States Attorney certifies in writing that it is no longer needed as evidence. D.C. Code §§ 5-119.08, 157(d). There are exceptions. A complainant can secure the release of property, other than money or perishable property, by presenting sufficient evidence that it is "necessary for the current use of the owner and not for sale," and posting a bond of twice the value of the property, conditioned on producing the property at trial. D.C. Code § 5-119.14. Perishable property and goods for sale with a value of over $50 are governed respectively by D.C. Code § 5-119.15, providing for return "on ample security being taken by the court for his appearance to prosecute the case," and D.C. Code § 5-119.16, providing for return "on ample security to prosecute the case."

If the property was taken from an accused and the judge is:

> satisfied from evidence that the person arrested is innocent of the offense alleged, and that the property rightfully belongs to him, the judge may, in writing, order such property or money to be returned, and the Property Clerk, if he has it, to deliver such property or money to the accused person himself, and not to any attorney, agent, or clerk of such accused person.

D.C. Code § 5-119.07.

If someone other than the accused claims ownership under oath before the court, the Property Clerk must retain custody until the conclusion of the case. D.C. Code § 5-119.08. The defendant should be notified before any intended release of the property to someone else. See United States v. Averell, 296 F. Supp. 1004, 1020-22 (E.D.N.Y. 1969).

Unless the defendant claims ownership of property held as proceeds within a year of its seizure, the property will be treated as abandoned and summarily forfeited. D.C. Code § 5-119.18.

b. Dangerous articles

"Dangerous articles" include silencers and "[a]ny weapon such as a pistol, machine gun, sawed-off shotgun, blackjack, slingshot, sandbag or mental knuckles." D.C. Code § 22-4517(a). Such articles are declared to be nuisances, which police may confiscate and deliver to the Property Clerk. D.C. Code § 22-4517(b), (c). The owner can file a written claim within thirty days. The Clerk must notify each claimant of the date and place of a hearing to determine entitlement to possession; the Clerk hears evidence within sixty days of the seizure, then renders a written decision and sends it to each claimant by registered mail. D.C. Code § 22-4517(d).

To prevail, the claimant must produce satisfactory evidence that: (1) the claimant is the lawful owner or owner's "accredited representative" (having a power of attorney); (2) at the time it was seized, the property was not illegally owned or illegally "possessed or carried by the claimant or with his knowledge or consent;" and (3) receipt of the property by the claimant will not cause the property to be a nuisance. D.C. Code § 22-4517(e).

The claimant may file an appeal with the Superior Court within thirty days of when the decision is mailed, with notice to the Property Clerk. The Clerk may not dispose of the property pending appeal. D.C. Code § 22-4517(d)(3).

The notice requirements in D.C. Code § 22-4517(d)(1) are insufficient to satisfy the requirements of due process. Ford, 531 A.2d at 237. The statutory silence on notice is premised on a fallacious assumption that any possible claimant will somehow have constitutionally adequate notice of the seizure and be able to make a timely claim. "This failure . . . to inform [Ford] of the reasons why the Property Clerk held the guns and of the means by which Ford could challenge appellees' continued custody of them violated due process." Id. at 237-38.

c. Lost property

"Lost property" is "any personal property, tangible or intangible, except a motor vehicle, the owner of which is unknown and which has been casually or involuntarily parted with through negligence, carelessness, or inadvertence." D.C. Code § 5-119.01(b)(1). A "finder of lost property" may be anyone other than a police officer. D.C. Code § 5-119.01(b)(2).

When lost property comes into the hands of the police and is held over ninety days (sixty days for motor vehicles) without being claimed, the Property Clerk must publish notice once a week (in a newspaper of general circulation and by posting at the Police Department) for two consecutive weeks that the property must be claimed within forty-five days or it will be given to the finder, after deductions for expenses of storing, or will belong to the District government. D.C. Code § 5-119.10(a). This substituted service is not sufficient under the Due Process Clause and Ford, and counsel should be alert for instances where the government followed only the statutory procedures.

As described above, the owner may claim lost property by presenting the Property Clerk with "satisfactory evidence of ownership." D.C. Code § 5-119.06(a).

> If neither the rightful owner nor the finder appear[s] to claim the lost property, title to such property shall transfer to the District government and the property may be retained by the Mayor for official government use or may be sold at public auction . . . The Property Clerk need not offer any property for sale if, in the Property Clerk's opinion, the probable cost of sale exceeds the value of the property.

D.C. Code § 5-119.10(b).

d. Abandoned property

Abandoned property is disposed of under the same procedures as lost property, with notice by publication and posting. D.C. Code § 5-119.10(a). Property held as proceeds of crime that is not claimed within one year and not called for as evidence may be treated as abandoned. D.C. Code § 5-119.18. A lot of property seized under other statutes, authorities, and pretexts ends up treated as abandoned after a certain period of time elapses without the owner asserting a claim. For example, under MPD General Order 601.1, Part III.B, >   a. Although time is not the only element that determines abandonment, a lapse of time may be considered as evidence of the owner's intent to abandon.

> 2. An "Abandoned Vehicle" is any motor vehicle in which the owner has relinquished all right, title, claim and possession.
>
>
>   b. There must be factors other than mere non-use of the vehicle that indicate the owner's intent to disclaim the vehicle (e.g., stripped of parts, incapable of being operated, or the owner has intentionally removed the license plates, registration, or identification from the vehicle.)
>
> 3. A "Junk Vehicle" can be defined as a vehicle which has outlived its usefulness as originally manufactured or engineered, even though the vehicle's parts have salvage or scrap value, and such vehicle constitutes a nuisance to the health and welfare of the public.

Officers processing abandoned or junk vehicles must make a thorough investigation to determine ownership, including a canvass of the area in which it was parked and a check of the license number and vehicle identification number. General Order 601.1, Part III.B.5. Owners are warned to remove the property through PD Form 783. The order does not specify how long the owner has to claim the property before it may be towed away. "The Department of Environmental Services has been granted the authority to remove junk vehicles to a scrap processor and tow abandoned vehicles to the Blue Plains Impounding Lot." General Order 601.1, Part III.B.6.

e. Property set out during eviction

The police cannot remove property set on public space as a result of eviction unless it "creates a hazard to public travel and the owner cannot be located or refuses to have the property removed, or the property's significant value dictates that it should be safeguarded." General Order 601.1, Part III.C.1. The Watch Commander on duty at each organizational element determines whether or not to take property into custody. Id., Part III.C.3. Part III.C.4 sets out the procedures for safeguarding property.

f. Property of deceased persons

If property of a deceased person of a value less than $1000 comes into the hands of the Property Clerk and is not claimed within six months, it will be disposed of "as lost or abandoned property." D.C. Code § 5-119.09. If the property is valued at more than $1000 and remains in custody six months, the records must be referred to the Office of the Attorney General, which institutes proceedings to have an administrator of the estate appointed. D.C. Code § 5-119.09(b)(2). If no one claims it within three years after the time for final settlement of the estate, it belongs to the District of Columbia. If there is pending in Superior Court a petition for appointment of a legal representative, the Clerk may not dispose of the property pending final action on the petition. (The same rule applies if the Clerk has actual notice of pendency of a similar petition in a court outside the jurisdiction.) D.C. Code § 5-119.09(b)(1).

g. Property of incompetent persons

When property belonging to an incompetent person comes into the hands of the Clerk, and a committee has been appointed but fails to take possession of the property within six months, the Clerk gives the committee sixty days notice by registered or certified mail. If the committee does not claim it within that time, the Clerk may sell the property at public auction; deduct expenses of sale, maintenance, and custody of the property, and any expenses due the District for the care of the incompetent person, and pay the remainder to the committee. If the property has no value, the Clerk may dispose of it in compliance with any regulations authorized by the Mayor. D.C. Code § 5-119.09(c).

2. Summary Forfeiture

Several provisions allow for summary forfeiture without a hearing. Property held as proceeds of crime which "shall not be called for as evidence by any proceeding in the courts of the District within 1 year from the date of such return, may, unless specially claimed by the owner within that time," be treated as abandoned and summarily forfeited. D.C. Code § 5-119.18.

If an owner is notified by registered or certified mail to pick up property within thirty days and fails to do so, the property will be disposed of or, if it has no resale value, destroyed. D.C. Code § 5-119.06(e).

Property other than "perishable property, animals, firearms and property of insane persons, not otherwise disposed of in accordance with D.C. Code § 5-119.09," remaining in the Clerk's custody for more than ninety days without being claimed and repossessed is summarily forfeited if forty-five days pass after publication of notice that the owner must pick up the property. D.C. Code § 5-119.10. The Constitution requires notice by mail when the owner's name and address is readily ascertainable from public records. See supra Section VII.D.

Property stored at a commercial warehouse pursuant to D.C. Code § 5-119.09(d)(2) & (3) may be sold at auction when the storage fees exceed 75% of its value, regardless of the amount of time that other sections require the Clerk to hold such property. D.C. Code § 5-119.09(2). Animals taken by the police and unclaimed after twenty days may be advertised and sold on ten days notice. D.C. Code § 5-119.12. Perishable property taken and unclaimed is sold at once. D.C. Code § 5-119.13.

3. Auctions and Other Final Dispositions

Property is auctioned monthly at the Blue Plains Impound Lot. Before the auction, the government must notify holders of any liens noted in the records of the Recorder of Deeds to claim the vehicle within forty-five days; if they fail to respond, their liens are deemed null and void, and the sale at auction is free and clear "from all claims of the rightful owner or the finder of the property and all persons claiming through and under the rightful owner or finder." D.C. Code § 5-119.10(c)(e).

Proceeds of the sale are distributed in this order: (1) the cost of storage and expenses for custody and sale, to the District; (2) the payments of liens declared null and void by the forfeiture; (3) the payment of the owner or finder, if such is determined under D.C. Code § 5-119.10(a); and (4) the remainder to the District. D.C. Code § 5-119.10(e).

D. Due Process in the Property Clerk's Office

The Property Clerk's office has responsibility for determining the disposition of a large volume of property. Despite the enormous volume of property that is subject to these provisions, hearings at the Clerk's office are rare. A probable explanation for the paucity of persons demanding hearings is lack of notice of the remedies. Several of the statutes administered by the Clerk include insufficient notice requirements; some do not require notice at all, while others require published notice alone, which is insufficient when the names and addresses of interest holders are readily ascertainable from public records. Under Ford, 531 A.2d at 238-39, the constitutional requirements for notice are read into the statute; if they are not followed, the procedures are ineffective in terminating property rights. However, if the person never learns of these rights, it is unlikely that the deprivation of due process will ever come to light.

CHAPTER 17

IMMIGRATION ISSUES FOR CRIMINAL DEFENSE ATTORNEYS

INTRODUCTION

In recent years, public policy in the United States has grown increasingly more stringent with respect to the enforcement of immigration law, and immigration consequences for criminal conduct have become ever harsher. As a direct result, collateral immigration consequences have increased in number and severity for non-citizens entangled in the criminal justice system. Once convicted, non-citizens may face any number of harsh consequences, including automatic deportation, permanent bars to returning to the United States, and indefinite detention by the Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services ("USCIS") (formerly the Immigration and Naturalization Service, or "INS"). Certain factors may trigger such severe consequences even when a non-citizen pleads guilty to a seemingly low-level misdemeanor offense.

The vast majority of non-citizen defendants convicted of a criminal offense do not have an immigration attorney to represent them in their immigration proceedings before the USCIS and the immigration courts. Moreover, the majority of non-citizens facing removal for crimes will be subject to mandatory detention during the duration of their immigration proceedings. See 8 U.S.C. 1223(c); INA § 236(c). Oftentimes, the criminal defense attorney provides the sole source of guidance to the non-citizen client as to what immigration consequences may lie ahead after he or she is convicted of a particular criminal offense. As such, it is imperative that criminal defense attorneys determine, from the outset of representation, their client's citizenship status and understand their obligations to include any possible immigration issues in their defense plans. In most cases, the criminal defense lawyer who is knowledgeable in constructing an immigration-safe record of conviction in a criminal case is the non-citizen's only hope of avoiding or mitigating these harsh immigration consequences.

The Supreme Court has recognized that defense counsel should competently advise his or her non-citizen clients of the potential immigration ramifications of a conviction. See INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 323 n.50 (2001). In addition, many states, including California, Georgia, Indiana, and New Mexico, have recognized that defense counsel has a duty to provide non-citizen defendants with competent legal advice regarding immigration consequences in addition to advice regarding the pending criminal matter.[1] See, e.g., United States v. Kwan, 407 F.3d 1005 (9th Cir. 2005); New Mexico v. Paredez, 101 P.3d 799 (N.M. 2004); Rollins v. State, 591 S.E.2d 796 (Ga. 2004); Crabbe v. State, 546 S.E.2d 65 (Ga. 2001), Williams v. State, 641 N.E.2d 44 (Ind. 1995). Although some cases have not found ineffectiveness in a failure to advise a client of the deportation consequences of guilty pleas, see, e.g., Bermudez v. State, 603 So. 2d 657 (Fla. 1992); Commonwealth v. Frometa, 555 A.2d 92 (Pa. 1989), the interest of any client who may be subject to deportation demands that the attorney be aware of and inform the client as to any possible consequences. See also People v. Correa, 485 N.E.2d 307, 310-11 (Ill. 1985); Lyons v.

[1] The following states have also passed laws to ensure that non-citizens are advised that certain consequences may result from a conviction: Connecticut, Florida, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Montana, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Texas, Washington, and Wisconsin. See also Dan Kesselbrenner & Lory Rosenberg, Immigration Law & Crimes (West Group 2000), pp. 4.44-14 & 4.44-15.

Pearce, 694 P.2d 969, 977 (Or. 1985) (en banc). But see United States v. Del Rosario, 902 F.2d 55 (D.C. Cir. 1990); Alpizar v. United States, 595 A.2d 991 (D.C. 1991). Accordingly, the future of a non-citizen criminal defendant in the United States rests heavily on the quality and depth of defense counsel's representation. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia held in Goodall v. United States, 759 A.2d 1077 (D.C. 2000), that defense counsel's mis-advice regarding the consequences of collateral matters, such as immigration and parole, resulting from a guilty plea can be substantial grounds for a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. For that reason, today more than ever before, criminal defense attorneys must remain abreast of collateral immigration consequences. An understanding of the fundamental principles of immigrant defense is crucial to the development of effective defense strategies to avoid adverse immigration consequences.

Immigration Status and Criminal Defense:

- ✓ The criminal defense attorney MUST be aware of the non-citizen client's status during criminal proceedings as this will impact her client's ability to remain in the U.S.
  - The client's immigration status will also inform counsel's defense strategies and options
- ✓ "Conviction" and "aggravated felony" in the immigration context do not necessarily mean the same thing as they do in the criminal context

I. REMOVAL PROCEEDINGS BASED ON CRIMES

The Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA") established the basic structure of immigration law in the United States and is enumerated in Title 8 of the United States Code. The INA governs every aspect of entitlements and benefits for all non-citizens living in the United States and its territories. Over the past five decades, Congress has legislated successive amendments to the INA targeted at limiting the rights of non-citizens and creating more penalties for non-citizens involved in the criminal justice system. It is important for criminal defense attorneys to be aware of the various statutes that government immigrant defense and the immigration consequences which flow from these statutes.

Passed by Congress in 1996 as an amendment to the Immigration and Naturalization Act, the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996 ("IIRIRA") is often marked as one of the harshest statutes affecting immigration law in U.S. history. This legislation has been devastating to immigrant communities across the country by exponentially increasing the number of removable offenses in a very short period. Various provisions of this statute enhance the enforcement of immigration laws with more stringent provisions for exclusion while increasing the number of grounds for deportation. Moreover, it has reduced the number of available options for relief from removal from the United States.

The IIRIRA created substantial penalties for non-citizens who are "unlawfully present" in the United States, either because they overstayed their visas or entered the country illegally. If an individual is unlawfully present in the United States for a period of time from 180 and 365 days, he or she is then barred from reentering, or from changing or adjusting his or her immigration status, for three years. Individuals unlawfully present for more than one year are barred for ten years. Non-citizens who enter without inspection are determined to be unlawfully present from the date of the illegal entry; however, no period of unlawful presence that occurred before the non-citizen's 18th birthday will be counted toward the three and ten year bars. As such, a person's immigration status is oftentimes the most significant factor in determining what immigration consequences he or she will face from a criminal conviction. The term "immigration status" refers to a non-citizen's classification under United States immigration laws. The immigration status of many non-citizens facing criminal prosecution is that of an undocumented person (illegal alien). Other possible classifications for non-citizens include the following: refugee; asylee; permanent resident who holds a "green card"; person with a work permit; person who has lost his or her citizenship through expatriation[2] or denaturalization[3]; and person with a nonimmigrant visa (includes visitors, students, and skilled and unskilled temporary workers).

For the non-citizen client charged with a criminal offense, removal from the United States will be the potential immigration consequence of greatest concern. Indeed, removal from the United States as a result of the commission or conviction of certain criminal offenses is an extreme measure and has been compared to banishment or exile, and the loss of "all that makes life worth living." Ng Fung Ho v. White, 259 U.S. 276, 284 (1922). See also INS v. Cardoza-Fonseca, 480 U.S. 421 (1987); Jordan v. DeGeorge, 341 U.S. 223 (1951). Depending on a client's immigration status and the nature of the criminal offense, removal proceedings may be initiated based on one of two separate grounds – "deportability" or "inadmissibility." In 1996, Congress significantly amended the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) to strengthen the negative effects of criminal convictions and conduct for non-citizen defendants. The Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act (IIRIRA), which became effective April 1, 1997, dramatically changed the landscape of immigration law by adopting stricter measures to enhance the negative immigration consequences for the non-citizen. Prior to the IIRIRA, the grounds for deportability applied to non-citizens who had "entered" the United States, whether the entry was lawful or not. The new law has significantly revised the definition of deportation. Removal proceedings based on deportability grounds now apply only to the non-citizen who entered the United States lawfully, for example, as a legal permanent resident ("LPR").

Also under the new law, the term "inadmissibility" has been introduced, replacing the old term "excludability" which applied only to the non-citizen seeking lawful admission from outside the United States or at a port or entry. Removal based on inadmissibility grounds includes not only non-citizens falling under the old definition of excludability, but, more significantly, non-citizens who are unlawfully present in the United States, because they either entered the United States illegally or overstayed their visas.[4] Moreover, prior to the IIRIRA, the concept of "admission"

[2] 8 U.S.C. § 1481; see Kahane v. Sec'y of State, 700 F. Supp. 1162 (D.D.C. 1988).

[3] 8 U.S.C. § 1451; see Costello v. INS, 365 U.S. 265 (1961) (loss of naturalization, due to conviction, rendered defendant Costello an alien).

[4] For practical purposes, a non-LPR, such as a valid visitor or student, who has been lawfully admitted to the United States, should be concerned with possible removal based on inadmissibility as his or her lawful status will likely expire or be terminated during or subsequent to criminal proceedings.

was a crucial factor in determining whether a non-citizen would be subject to deportation or exclusion proceedings. Generally, a non-citizen who had been placed in deportation proceedings was afforded more rights and relief than an individual subjected to exclusion proceedings. The IIRIRA destroys this differentiation and creates a process known as "removal proceedings" that covers the entire mechanism for dealing with non-citizens who are in violation of the INA.

The grounds of removal (deportation or inadmissibility) will be determined by the non-citizen's classification status. For example, a permanent resident will be subject to removal based on the grounds of deportability, which incorporates an aggravated felony definition, while an undocumented person will be subject to removal based on criminal grounds of inadmissibility and/or the aggravated felony definition. It is important to keep in mind the distinction between these grounds of removal because the grounds of deportability and the grounds of inadmissibility each trigger different immigration consequences for convictions.

A Non-citizen is a:

Refugee; asylee; permanent resident who holds a "green card"; person with a work permit; person who has lost his or her citizenship through expatriation or denaturalization; and person with a non-immigrant visa (including visitors, students, and skilled and unskilled temporary workers)

A. Grounds of Removal Relating to Crimes

Removal based on the grounds of deportability include the following: (1) an aggravated felony (see infra Section IV.A); (2) a crime involving moral turpitude ("CIMT") committed within five years of admission to the United States, for which sentence of one year or longer may be imposed; (3) two CIMTs committed at any time regardless of sentence, but not arising out of a single scheme of criminal conduct; (4) a controlled substance offense, other than a single offense of simple possession of 30 grams or less of marijuana; (5) a firearm or destructive device offense, whether a felony or misdemeanor; (6) a crime of domestic violence or stalking, whether a felony or misdemeanor; (7) a crime of child abuse, neglect, or abandonment, whether a felony or misdemeanor; or (8) violation of an order of protection, whether issued by a civil or criminal court. See INA § 237, 8 U.S.C. § 1227. Additionally, criminal convictions may be relevant to the grounds of deportability if the defendant is determined to be a drug abuser. See Section 237 of the INA, which governs the deportation of non-citizens from the United States.

Removal based on the grounds of inadmissibility include the following: (1) a conviction or admitted commission of any controlled substance offense, whether a felony or misdemeanor (waiver available for a single offense of simple possession of 30 grams or less of marijuana); (2) a conviction or admitted commission of a crime involving moral turpitude, whether a felony or misdemeanor (subject to (a) a petty offense exception where the possible sentence is not more than one year and the person did not receive more than six months; and (b) a juvenile exception for a juvenile offense committed more than five years before request for admission); (3) conviction of two or more offenses of any type with an aggregate sentence of imprisonment of five years or more; or (4) engagement in prostitution or commercialized vice. See INA § 212(A)(2); 8 U.S.C. § 1182(a)(2). Additionally, criminal convictions may be relevant to the grounds of inadmissibility if the defendant is determined to: (1) have a physical or mental disorder that may pose or has posed a threat to the safety of the non-citizen or others; or (2) be a drug abuser. See INA § 212(a)(1). See generally Section 212 of the INA, which governs the inadmissibility of non-citizens from the United States.

Additionally, the IIRIRA expanded the list of offenses that count as "aggravated felonies" for immigration purposes. See 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a). It also broadened the scope of certain offenses for sentencing purposes. For example, the IIRIRA significantly amended the consequences of a conviction for a crime of violence by lowering the term of imprisonment from five years to one year. See INA § 101(a)(43)(F).

2014 Supplement

Fretes-Zarate v. United States*, 40 A.3d 374 (D.C. 2012). Court did not plainly err in not providing jury trial to defendant where conviction for simple assault made her subject to deportation under federal immigration law.

B. Other Immigration Consequences

There are several other immigration consequences arising from criminal cases that are not as severe as the threat of removal. Nonetheless, these consequences can be equally devastating to a non-citizen who aspires to become an American citizen or wishes to sponsor family members to live in the United States. The Supreme Court has recognized that defense counsel should competently advise his or her non-citizen clients of the grounds of inadmissibility or deportability stemming from the outcome of a criminal case. See INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 323 n.50 (2001). Consequences other than deportation include exclusion from or denial of admission to the United States, ineligibility to become a citizen, loss of legal permanent resident status, or loss of legal immigration status altogether. A criminal case may also result in a non-citizen's disqualification from political asylum from his or her country of origin or the denial of relief from deportation, among numerous other losses of benefits available to non-citizens legally present in the United States.

C. The Fifth Amendment Right to Remain Silent

While Congress continues to enact legislation that dramatically increases the number of criminal offenses and activities for which non-citizens can be removed, the Supreme Court has long recognized that the Fifth Amendment protects non-citizen defendants from being compelled to disclose their "alienage" or immigration status and manner of entry. Ramon-Sepulveda v. INS, 743 F.2d 1307 (9th Cir. 1984); United States v. Alderete-Deras, 743 F.2d 645 (9th Cir. 1984); Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972). The Court reasons that a non-citizen's right to remain silent is protected under the Fifth Amendment because answers to questions concerning alienage subjects non-citizens to criminal prosecution. For example, entry into the United States without inspection or admission is a criminal offense under 8 U.S.C. § 1325, and alienage is an element of the offense. In light of these concerns, the Supreme Court has expressly stated that non-citizens may invoke the privilege "in any proceeding, civil or criminal, administrative or judicial, investigatory or adjudicatory." Kastigar, 406 U.S. at 444 (1972). As such, this right attaches to both removal proceedings, which are civil in nature, and criminal proceedings, though the scope of the privilege may vary.

On the other hand, where removal from the United States is a possible consequence, the need to negotiate a certain offense or sentence to avoid or mitigate harsh immigration consequences may only be accomplished during the course of criminal proceedings. During the course of criminal proceedings, defense counsel must be mindful of maintaining a "safe record" for the client. Further, given the nature of the criminal acts committed by the non-citizen defendant, it is possible that neither the court nor the government will desire to have removal proceedings initiated against the non-citizen defendant. Under these circumstances, both the court and the prosecutor may already be aware of possible immigration issues, and may wish to consider the immigration consequences during resolution of the criminal matter, even though it is "collateral" to the criminal proceeding.

D. Enforcement

In response to the terrorist attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001, Congress passed the Patriot Act, which substantially expanded the federal government's ability to enforce immigration laws by allowing criminal investigators and intelligence officials to share information for the stated purpose of deterring and punishing terrorist acts. See Pub. L. No. 107-56, 115 Stat. 272 (Oct. 26, 2001). After September 11, 2001, Congress also created the Department of Homeland Security ("DHS"), which gave the federal government a wide range of authority in enforcing immigration law. The Department of Homeland Security absorbed and currently functions in part through two previously-established agencies: the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE") and the Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services ("USCIS") (formerly the Immigration and Naturalization Service, or "INS").

1. Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE")

The Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, or ICE, is the agency responsible for the enforcement aspects of migration laws. Specifically, ICE is responsible for issuing "Notices to Appear," or summons for removal hearings. It also issues detainers on non-citizens detained in jails and prisons, thereby ensuring that criminally-detained non-citizens will be transferred into ICE custody at the conclusion of the criminal case. ICE is also responsible for the detention and removal of non-citizens.

2. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Service ("USCIS")

Any time that a non-citizen applies for and receives a change in immigration status, e.g., changing from a visa holder to a legal permanent resident, he or she receives what is known as "adjustment of status." The Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services, or USCIS, has jurisdiction over the approval of petitions for visas, naturalization, asylum, and all other types of status adjustment. USCIS works with the State Department in conducting consular interviews and reviewing petitions for adjustments of status.

II. LEVELS OF IMMIGRATION STATUS

Every non-citizen falls into a specific category or class under the Immigration and Nationality Act. See 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(15). Immigration consequences arising from a criminal conviction depend upon the non-citizen's immigration status. In addition, there are various forms of relief available that depend on immigration classification. Therefore, it is critical for a criminal defense attorney to be aware of the non-citizen client's status during criminal proceedings as it may mean the difference between removal and being able to remain in the United States. The levels of immigration status most relevant to the indigent non-citizen client are discussed below.

A. Undocumented Persons ("Illegal Aliens")

A person who does not have legal status under U.S. immigration laws is termed "undocumented person," or "illegal alien." The most common type of undocumented person is one who did not enter the United States at a designated port of entry, and thus entered without inspection.[5] An undocumented persons is immediately subject to automatic or "expedited" removal, but will often be afforded some due process if there are immigration charges pending other than unlawful presence. For purposes of removal from the United States, these persons are subject to the criminal grounds of inadmissibility and the aggravated felony definition.

The other category of undocumented person is the individual who entered the United States lawfully, but whose nonimmigrant visa has expired or been terminated. A non-citizen is considered "undocumented" when he or she "falls out of status." To fall out of status means that the non-citizen has failed to maintain his or her non-immigrant status and has thus become removable. See INA § 237. Falling out of status can happen in many ways. Examples of this include overstaying the time limit of a visa, failure to comply with the statutory conditions of one's immigration status, marriage fraud, or becoming a public charge. A public charge is a non-citizen who within five years of admission applies for and receives public benefits from a government agency and fails to repay the government for those services. See Matter of L, 6 I&N Dec. 349 (BIA 1954). However, the definition of public charge does not extend to non-citizens who have been hospitalized or institutionalized due to mental illness within five years of admission. See Matter of Kowalski, 10 I&N Dec. 159 (BIA 1963). For purposes of removal from the United States, these persons are subject to the criminal grounds of deportability, which incorporates the aggravated felony definition.

B. Permanent Resident ("Green Card Holder")

Permanent resident status is defined at INA § 101(a)(20) and 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(20) as "the status of having been lawfully accorded the privilege of residing permanently in the United States." Id. Any such non-citizen accorded this privilege is commonly known as a legal permanent resident ("LPR"), or green card holder. An I-551, known as a "green card," is the only evidence of the possessor's status as a legal permanent resident of the United States. LPRs are permitted to work and receive government benefits as part of their legal status. Each time an

[5] For non-citizen Spanish speaking clients who have an extremely limited English language vocabulary, a common term for a person without legal immigration documentation for admission to the U.S. is "sin papeles," which literally translates to "without papers."

LPR seeks admission into the United States at a port of entry, that LPR must prove his or her admissibility by showing his or her green card. See INA § 101(a)(13)(C); 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(13)(C). For purposes of removal from the United States, an LPR is subject to the criminal grounds of deportability, regardless of the length of time that the LPR has lived legally in the United States.

C. Visa Holders: Immigrants and Non-immigrants

There are two classes of non-citizens who hold visas: immigrants and non-immigrants. The conditions for these types of visa holders are enumerated in INA § 221. An immigrant is a non-citizen who intends to live permanently in the United States, while a non-immigrant is a non-citizen who is present in the U.S. for a specific, temporary purpose. Usually, visas are issued by a U.S. consulate or embassy in the non-citizen's country of origin. When applying for a non-immigrant visa, the applicant must state his or her purpose for a visit to the U.S. (i.e., business, tourist, student, etc.). The various classes of visas are listed in the INA and correspond to a letter in the alphabet from the letter "A" through the letter "V." Once in the United States, the visa holder generally cannot switch to another type of visa without a new visa application and another consular interview in his or her country of origin. For purposes of removal from the United States, nonimmigrant visa holders are subject to the criminal grounds of deportability.

D. Asylees and Refugees – INA §§ 207, 208; 8 U.S.C. §§ 1157, 1158

The United States has a lengthy history of providing protection to non-citizens seeking asylum and refuge from persecution in their countries of origin. For that reason, there are several federal statutes and governmental policies in place to assist non-citizens fleeing persecution. Non-citizens who are fleeing persecution from their countries of origin are known as asylees and refugees. A refugee is a non-citizen who applies for protection while being physically present outside of the United States. An asylee is a non-citizen who physically comes to the United States and subsequently applies for protection. Both asylees and refugees must establish a "well-founded fear of persecution." When applying for protection, both asylees and refugees must establish that they suffered persecution because of race, religion, membership in a social group, political opinion, or national origin at the hands of their country's government or an organization that cannot be controlled by their country's government. An immigration judge or officer can grant asylum. Asylum permits a non-citizen to live and work in the United States indefinitely under a grant of protection from persecution. For purposes of removal from the United States, refugees and asylees are subject to the criminal grounds of deportability.

III. IMMIGRATION COURT

A. Immigration Court

Immigration consequences stemming from a criminal conviction are often thought of as collateral criminal consequences. In fact, immigration law is a type of civil law with inadmissibility and removal as civil consequences arising from criminal convictions. Immigration court also involves administrative law because it is governed by the Department of Justice with an immigration judge adjudicating immigration hearings under the auspices of the Executive Office of Immigration Review ("EOIR"). The procedures for removal proceedings are enumerated in INA § 240. See INA § 240; 8 U.S.C. § 1229(a). Appeals of an immigration judge's ruling are heard at the Board of Immigration Appeals, or the "BIA." The BIA is an appellate body within the EOIR that hears appeals from immigration judges. Appeals of BIA decisions based on a question of law are heard by federal courts of appeal on a case-by-case basis.[6] The Attorney General of the United States has the final decision in those cases from the BIA that do not merit appeal to the federal courts. See 8 C.F.R. §§1003.1 (h)(1)(i)-(iii); see also Matter of D-J-, 23 I&N Dec. 572, 575 (A.G. 2003).

The immigration hearing will commence only after the criminal case has been concluded by exhaustion of both the appellate and post-conviction processes. In many situations, a non-citizen client may complete a prison sentence and be released before the removal process begins. In other situations, ICE will issue a detainer to hold the non-citizen in his or her designated penal institution while he or she is serving a sentence. The removal process will begin once ICE takes the client into its custody. However, the ICE detainer allows ICE only 48 hours to take the non-citizen into custody after completion of the criminal case, and an additional 72 hours in emergency circumstances. See 8 C.F.R. § 287.3(d).

B. What is a Conviction for Immigration Purposes?

A conviction for immigration purposes is defined pursuant to INA § 101(a)(48)(A) and 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(48). The definition of a conviction in immigration law is quite distinguishable from a conviction for criminal law purposes. INA § 101(a)(48)(A) defines a conviction as follows:

> … with respect to [a non-citizen], a formal judgment of guilt of the [non-citizen] entered by a court or, if adjudication of guilt has been withheld, where –
> (i) a judge or jury has found the [non-citizen] guilty or the [non-citizen] has entered a plea of guilty or nolo contendere or has admitted sufficient facts to warrant a finding of guilt, and > (ii) the judge has ordered some form of punishment, penalty, or restraint on the [non-citizen]'s liberty to be imposed.
>
>
> Any reference to a term of imprisonment or a sentence with respect to an offense is deemed to include the period of incarceration or confinement ordered by a court of law regardless of any suspension of the imposition or execution of that imprisonment or sentence in whole or in part.

---

[6] See Calcano-Martinez v. INS, 533 U.S. 348 (2001) (under IIRIRA, two permanent legal residents who had been convicted of aggravated felonies could not seek direct review in a federal court of appeals, but could file habeas petitions in district court seeking release). See also Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678 (2001) (constitutional law requires that the INA contain an implicit reasonableness limitation on the period of post-removal detention for aliens who gained admission to the United States, but who were subsequently ordered removed after convictions for aggravated felonies). Federal courts have the authority to determine if a specific period of removal detention is reasonable, subject to a presumptive limit of six months. Federal habeas review is available to test the reasonableness of a post-removal order detention period. Id.

INA § 101(a)(48)(B).

There is a two-prong test to determine whether a conviction for immigration purposes has occurred. The first prong of the INA definition is when a court enters a finding of guilt against a non-citizen. A finding of guilt can be found where a client enters a plea of guilty or an Alford plea (nolo contendre), admits facts sufficient to warrant a finding of guilt by a judge, or has a finding of guilt entered against him or her after a trial by either judge or jury. The second prong of the INA definition is that the judge must order some form of punishment, penalty, or restraint to be imposed on a non-citizen's liberty. This form of punishment can range from a fine or probation to a suspended sentence or imposition of a prison term.

Case law used to determine what state dispositions were considered convictions for immigration purposes. This new statutory definition overrules the previous definition of conviction in the seminal case of Matter of Ozkok, 19 I&N Dec. 546 (BIA 1988). In Ozkok, the BIA excluded from the definition of conviction certain dispositions where the adjudication of guilt had been withheld based on fulfillment of certain conditions. The new statutory definition of conviction includes nearly any conviction, regardless of the type of sentence imposed. The prior requirement under Ozkok that the conviction be final – i.e., that appellate review be exhausted – may also be in doubt. The BIA in In Re Punu, 22 I&N Dec. 224 (BIA 1998), held that a conviction exists under Texas' deferred adjudication statute even where further appellate review remains possible.

The term of imprisonment an individual is sentenced to often determines if a conviction is an aggravated felony for immigration purposes. For example, a crime of violence with a term of imprisonment of one year or more is considered an aggravated felony. The new statutory definition of "criminal conviction" eliminates the distinction between imposition of sentence (ISS) and execution of sentence (ESS). Under this new provision, either sentence constitutes a conviction. What this means is that, under some circumstances, a client may be considered an aggravated felon and, thus, deportable without ever serving a day in jail. The length of the sentence and the maximum penalty for each offense determine whether or not a client is deportable and under which category or categories he or she can be deported.

C. Evidence of a Conviction for Immigration Court

INA § 240(c)(3)(B) and 8 U.S.C. §1229(c)(3)(B) set forth what evidence to establish a conviction may be admissible in an immigration hearing. The INA statute mandates that, "In any proceeding under this Act, any of the following documents or records (or a certified copy of such an official document or record) shall constitute proof of a criminal conviction:

(i) An official record of judgment and conviction.
(ii) An official record of plea, verdict, and sentence.
(iii) A docket entry from court records that indicates the existence of the conviction.
(iv) Official minutes of a court proceeding or a transcript of a court hearing in which the court takes notice of the existence of a conviction.
(v) An abstract of a record of conviction prepared by the court in which the conviction was entered, or by a State official associated with the State's repository of criminal justice records, that indicates the charge or section of law violated, the disposition of the case, the existence and date of conviction, and the sentence.

(vi) Any document or record prepared by, or under the direction of, the court in which the conviction was entered that indicates the existence of a conviction.

(vii) Any document or record attesting to the conviction that is maintained by an official of a State or Federal penal institution, which is the basis for that institution's authority to assume custody of the individual named in the record."

INA § 240(c)(3)(B).

Taylor v. United States, 495 U.S. 575, 600 (1990), held that courts should focus on the statutory definitions of prior offenses – not the particular facts – when assessing the applicability of a penalty enhancement. The Court further clarified this position in Shepard v. United States, 544 U.S. 13 (2005), holding that documents used in collateral matters must be part of a judicial record; police documents do not qualify. Thus, for immigration court, the following judicial documents and records from the Superior Court of the District of Columbia would be applicable: the charging document, including an Information or Indictment; the signed plea agreement; jury instructions; a Sup. Ct. Crim. R. 11 plea colloquy, including admissions; the transcript of the plea or trial; and the judgment of the trial court, including the verdict form and the Judgment and Commitment Order.

According to Shepard and Taylor, documents such as police reports and pre-sentence reports may not be admissible in immigration court because they not part of the judicial record of conviction in the criminal court. See Matter of Texeira, 21 I&N Dec. 316 (BIA 1996).

D. What Types of D.C. Superior Court Criminal Dispositions Constitute Convictions for Immigration Purposes?

Various types of agreements are made in D.C. Superior Court between defendants, with the help of defense counsel, and the United States Attorney's Office ("USAO") with respect to criminal cases. While these various agreements often prove advantageous to defendants in their criminal cases, defense counsel should be aware that there may be imminent pitfalls for the client that may result from such agreements. Therefore, defense counsel must fully advise the non-citizen of the immigration consequences that may arise from these agreements.[7]

1. Agreements Constituting Convictions – "Win-Lose Situations"

There are several types of agreements between defendants and the USAO that may prove disastrous for a non-citizen client. Although an agreement may be advantageous for the criminal case, that same agreement may constitute a conviction for immigration purposes and result in removal. These agreements pose a "win-lose" situation for many non-citizen clients, and are thus not advisable for non-citizen clients to undertake.

[7] For more information on "safe haven" pleas for non-citizen clients, see Safe Havens: How to Identify and Construct Non-Deportable Convictions, by Norton Tooby and Joseph Justin Rollin, Law Offices of Norton Tooby, Norton Tooby, 2005.

a. Deferred adjudication

The Board of Immigration Appeals determined in Matter of Roldan, 22 I&N Dec. 512 (BIA 1999), that agreements such as deferred adjudications constitute convictions for immigration purposes. The BIA found that where a deferred adjudication statute requires admission of sufficient facts to warrant a finding of guilt and some form of punishment is ordered (i.e., the program itself), such an adjudication is considered a conviction for immigration purposes. Id. The United States Attorney's Office's Domestic Violence Intervention Program ("DVIP") requires the defendant to enter a plea before the court and imposes a form of punishment such as anger management classes, restitution, or drug testing. Therefore, defense counsel should be aware that a non-citizen client's participation in the DVIP will potentially pose a risk of removal because of the resulting conviction.

b. Expungements

Convictions that have been expunged may be considered convictions for immigration purposes. Matter of Roldan, 22 I&N Dec. 512, 520 (BIA 1999),[8] held that the BIA will not recognize any "state action, whether it is called setting aside, annulling, vacating, cancellation, expungement, dismissal, discharge, etc. of the conviction . . . that purports to erase the record of guilt of an offense pursuant to a state rehabilitative statute." Id. What this means is that, if an expungement has been granted because an individual has been "rehabilitated" or complied with certain rehabilitative requirements under a state statute or code, the resulting expungement will not work to avoid removal. However, if a conviction has been expunged because of constitutional or procedural infirmities with the conviction, then the expungement will avoid removal. In Superior Court, drug convictions with expungement provisions such as § 48-904.1(e) are still convictions for immigration purposes. Id.; see also INA § 101(a)(48).

2. Agreements not Constituting Convictions – "Win-Win Situations"

Some agreements in Superior Court are advantageous to the client in both criminal court and immigration court. These agreements are pre-trial agreements that do not require the client to enter a plea of guilty before the court, but set forth conditions with which the client must comply. Examples of these conditions include community service, a stay away order, drug treatment, counseling, or restitution. If the client complies with these conditions to the satisfaction of the USAO, then the USAO will dismiss the criminal case nolle prosequi. These agreements are a "win-win" for the non-citizen client in both criminal and immigration courts.

a. "Stet Docket" agreements

In some cases, the United States Attorney's Office will extend an offer known as a "Stet Docket" to certain defendants. The Stet Docket entails a pre-trial agreement between the client and the USAO under which the client agrees to certain conditions set forth by the USAO for a specified period of time. The trial court will approve the agreement and schedule a status hearing to take place at the end of the specified period of time. At that hearing, the USAO will determine whether or not to dismiss, or nolle prosequi, the criminal case based on the client's satisfactory compliance with the Stet Docket agreement. In this situation, there will be no conviction for either the criminal or immigration court.

[8] The Ninth Circuit has reversed Roldan, but this reversal applies only to those cases in the Ninth Circuit. There has been some recent activity by the BIA in published and unpublished decisions which appear to indicate a willingness on its part to reassess its position in Roldan. See In Re Rodriguez-Ruiz, 22 I&N Dec. 1378 (BIA 2000).

b. Pre-Trial Diversion Program with the USAO

Pre-trial diversion is another means by which a non-citizen client can dispose of a criminal case without sustaining an immigration conviction. This program often requires the client to admit criminal wrongdoing in order to participate. Defense counsel should be aware that a non-citizen client's admissions are admissible against him or her in immigration court as an admission by a party-opponent. Defense counsel should make sure that the non-citizen client does not make any admissions to criminal wrongdoing as part of his or her participation in the Pre-Trial Diversion Program.

c. Juvenile adjudications & juvenile dispositions

Juvenile delinquency adjudications are not considered convictions for immigration purposes. Matter of Ramirez-Rivero, 18 I&N Dec. 135 (BIA 1981). See also 22 C.F.R. §§ 40.21(a)(2) and 40.22(a). Under some circumstances, sentences under the Youth Act do not constitute convictions for immigration purposes. The BIA in Matter of Devison, 22 I&N Dec. 1362 (BIA 2000), held that an adjudication of youthful offender status under New York law which corresponds to a determination of juvenile delinquency under the Federal Juvenile Delinquency Act does not constitute a judgment of conviction for immigration purposes.

E. Categories of Deportable Criminal Offenses Under INA § 237

Section 237 of the INA enumerates five distinct classifications of removable offenses. These classifications are: (1) aggravated felonies; (2) crimes of moral turpitude; (3) domestic violence offenses; (4) drug offenses; and (5) firearms offenses. See infra Section V. The most severe of the five categories is the first, aggravated felonies, a conviction for which will bar the client for life from re-entering the U.S. once deported. The statute for each offense must be analyzed to determine the immigration classification for each.

F. Analysis of Divisible and Ambiguous Criminal Statutes

A conviction for a criminal offense can fall under more than one category of offenses for immigration purposes and determining which category or categories can be a complicated matter. An immigration judge will generally not look behind the conviction to determine additional possible grounds for removal. Matter of Short, 20 I&N Dec. 136 (BIA 1989). The immigration court instead focuses on the criminal statute to ascertain whether or not a criminal conviction falls into one or more of the five categories of immigration offenses. Some criminal statutes have only one set of elements and are therefore "indivisible." However, many criminal statutes are ambiguous because they have more than one set of elements, one of which must be proven in order to sustain a conviction. These ambiguous statutes are known as "divisible" statutes for immigration purposes, meaning that they have more than one set of elements that will constitute a particular offense. If a statute is divisible, then the immigration court will examine the record of conviction and ascertain the part of the statute under which the client was convicted.

Defense counsel should focus upon the elements of the statute to determine whether the conviction will trigger immigration consequences.

Example:

A simple assault conviction pursuant to D.C. Code § 22-504 is a divisible statute.

- ✓ It includes the elements of force, violence, or threat of such, or a non-sexual touching as indicated by subsections A, B, and C of the statute
- ✓ It is not punishable by one year or more
- ✓ It is not an aggravated felony, nor a crime involving moral turpitude
- ✓ It is not a domestic violence offense because the statute does not make reference to persons protected under domestic violence statutes
- ✓ Simple assault does not satisfy the elements for a firearms offense or a drug offense

Defense counsel must determine which set of elements is applicable to the conviction.

IV. CATEGORIES OF REMOVAL OFFENSES

2014 Supplement

Descamps v. United States*, 133 S. Ct. 2276 (2013). Where statute of conviction has a single, indivisible set of elements, a court (and presumably also an immigration judge) may not apply the modified categorical approach by looking to the underlying court record, which approach is only used for divisible statutes, and only where it is necessary to look to the underlying court record to determine of which statutory offense or section the person was convicted and not to determine the facts or conduct of the offense.

A. Aggravated Felonies: Immigration Kiss of Death

The Anti-Drug Abuse Amendment Act of 1988[9] created a new category of removable criminal offenses known as aggravated felonies. See 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A)(iii). Subsequent provisions in the Immigration Act of 1990, the Immigration and Nationality Technical Corrections Act of 1994, and the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 ("AEDPA") have broadened the scope of crimes in this category. Aggravated felonies can and do include almost all possible criminal offenses. In fraud-related crimes, the definition of "aggravated felony" depends upon the sentence and the dollar amount involved. An LPR or any other non-citizen is removable if convicted of an aggravated felony at any time after admission or entry to the United States. The term "aggravated felony" applies to an offense described above whether in violation of state or federal law. Matter of Ponce de Leon, 21 I&N Dec. 154 (BIA 1996).

"Aggravated felony" is an immigration term of art, and does not necessarily conform to what would be classified as a felony under D.C. (or other state) law. Aggravated felonies for immigration purposes are defined and enumerated in 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(43), and include:

- Murder, rape, or sexual abuse of a minor;
- Illicit trafficking in a controlled substance;
- Illicit trafficking in firearms or destructive devices or in explosive materials;
- Certain offenses related to the laundering of monetary instruments or engaging in monetary transactions in property derived from specific unlawful activity IF THE AMOUNT OF THE FUNDS EXCEEDS $10,000;
- Certain offenses related to explosive materials or firearms;
- Crime of violence for WHICH THE TERM OF IMPRISONMENT IS AT LEAST ONE YEAR;
- Theft offense, including receipt of stolen property, or burglary offense FOR WHICH THE TERM OF IMPRISONMENT IS AT LEAST ONE YEAR;
- Certain offenses related to the demand for or receipt of ransom;
- Certain offenses related to child pornography;
- Certain offenses related to RICO, or certain gambling offenses, FOR WHICH A SENTENCE OF ONE YEAR IMPRISONMENT OR MORE MAY BE IMPOSED;
- Offense related to the owning, controlling, managing, or supervising of a prostitution business; certain offenses related to transportation for the purpose of prostitution or to peonage, slavery, and involuntary servitude, and trafficking in persons;
- Certain offenses related to gathering or transmitting national defense information or disclosure of classified information; sabotage or treason;
- Offense that involves fraud or deceit IN WHICH THE LOSS TO THE VICTIM OR VICTIMS EXCEEDS $10,000; offenses relating to tax evasion IN WHICH THE REVENUE LOSS TO THE GOVERNMENT EXCEEDS $10,000;
- Certain offenses relating to non-citizen smuggling, except in the case of a first offense for which the non-citizen has affirmatively shown that the non-citizen committed the offense for the purpose of assisting, abetting, or aiding only the non-citizen's spouse, child, or parent;

- Certain improper entry or illegal reentry offenses committed by a non-citizen who was previously deported on the basis of an aggravated felony conviction;

- Falsely making, forging, counterfeiting, mutilating, or altering a passport or instrument, or certain other offenses relating to document fraud, FOR WHICH THE TERM OF IMPRISONMENT IS AT LEAST 12 MONTHS, except in the case of a first offense for which the non-citizen has affirmatively shown that the non-citizen committed the offense for the purpose of assisting, abetting, or aiding only the non-citizen's spouse, child, or parent;

- Offense relating to the failure to appear by a defendant for service of sentence if the underlying offense is punishable by imprisonment for a term of five years or more;

- Commercial bribery, counterfeiting, forgery, trafficking in vehicles the identification numbers of which have been altered for which the term of imprisonment is at least one year;

- Obstruction of justice, perjury or subornation of perjury, or bribery of a witness, FOR WHICH THE TERM OF IMPRISONMENT IS AT LEAST ONE YEAR;

- Offense relating to failure to appear before a court pursuant to a court order to answer to or dispose of a felony charge for which a sentence of two years of imprisonment or more may be imposed;

- Attempt or conspiracy to commit any of the above offenses.

Id.

If arrested by agents of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE"), persons considered aggravated felons are subject to mandatory detention without bond and to being placed in removal proceedings for expeditious removal. Aggravated felons may remain eligible for some very limited forms of relief under the immigration laws. Non-citizens convicted of aggravated felonies are barred from many forms of relief from removal, including the following:

- An "aggravated felon" is barred from applying for or receiving political asylum. 8 U.S.C. § 1158(b)(2)(B). However, aggravated felons may seek relief from removal under the Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, and Degrading Treatment or Punishment. U.N. Doc. No. 571 Leg/SER.E/13, IV.9 (1995).

- Aggravated felons are ineligible for cancellation of removal. 8 U.S.C. §§ 1229b(a)(3) & (b)(1)(C). However, non-citizens with convictions which pre-date AEDPA's effective date of April 24, 1996, may continue to be eligible for what was then called 212(c) Relief.

- Aggravated felons are ineligible for voluntary departure. 8 U.S.C. §§ 1229c(a)(1) & (b)(1)(C).

- Aggravated felons are not entitled to judicial review of removal orders that are based on such convictions. 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(C). The issue of whether the federal courts have jurisdiction to review final orders of removal of aggravated felons has been and continues to be challenged in the federal courts. Although many courts of appeals have held that they may not have jurisdiction over criminal non-citizen cases, many district courts have held that they retain habeas corpus jurisdiction to review final orders of removal in criminal non-citizen cases.

2014 Supplement

Moncrieffe v. Holder*, 133 S. Ct. 1678 (2013). Illicit drug trafficking offense does not include a state criminal statute that extends to the social sharing of a small amount of marijuana and so noncitizen's conviction for marijuana-distribution offense that failed to establish that offense involved either remuneration or more than a small amount of marijuana held not to be aggravated felony making alien deportable under 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A)(iii).

1. Analysis of an Aggravated Felony – Divisible & Ambiguous Statutes

At times, an immigration court must review the record of conviction to determine whether a conviction can be qualified as an aggravated felony. Matter of Sweetser, 22 I&N Dec. 709 (BIA 1999). An offense becomes an aggravated felony when one of the elements involves a crime of violence against a person and when the sentence imposed is one year or more. Id. A crime of violence is defined as:

(a) an offense that has as an element the use, attempted us, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another, or
(b) any other offense that is a felony and that, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense.

18 U.S.C. § 16. See also Matter of Martin, 23 I&N Dec. 491 (BIA 2002). Defense counsel must also analyze whether the offense would be considered a felony under federal law. If a state offense is considered a felony under federal law, then that offense is an aggravated felony. A state felony offense may also qualify as an aggravated felony in certain circumstances, even if the offense is considered a misdemeanor under federal law. For example, if the sale of marijuana is a state felony (though not punished harshly) and also a drug-trafficking crime, then it is deemed an aggravated felony for immigration purposes.[10]

2. Analysis of a Divisible Statute for Aggravated Felonies

When the conviction is under a statute that is divisible, it is necessary to look to the record of conviction (not the facts), and to other documents admissible as evidence in proving a criminal conviction to determine whether a specific offense constitutes an aggravated felony. Id. For example, where a criminal statute includes offenses that may, but do not necessarily include firearm offenses, the determination of whether a person was convicted of a firearms offense can only be done through the admission of the record of conviction or other documents admissible to prove a record of conviction under 8 C.F.R. § 3.41. A police report cannot be used to prove a conviction. Matter of Teixeira, 21 I&N Dec. 316 (BIA 1996). Whether or not a sentence is imposed or suspended is irrelevant for aggravated felonies – any time imposed may be considered in making an offense an aggravated felony. See INA § 101(a)(48)(B), 8 U.S.C. §1101(a)(48)(B). Straight probation does not create a sentence qualifying the offense as an aggravated felony.

PRACTICE TIP:

If your client is an LPR, he or she may be barred from cancellation of removal based on an aggravated felony conviction. However, if your client is not yet an LPR, it may be possible for him or her to have an aggravated felony conviction that is not a drug conviction, with the exception of 30 grams of marijuana or less. See Matter of Kanga, 22 I&N Dec. 1206 (BIA 2000); see also In re Michel, 21 I&N Dec. 1101 (BIA 1998). An aggravated felony offense is not an impediment to adjustment of status unless the offense forms some independent basis of inadmissibility. An aggravated felony is grounds for deportability, not for inadmissibility. Thus, a person cannot be barred from adjustment of status on the basis of an aggravated felony unless the offense is also a CIMT, a drug offense, or money laundering. See Matter of Torres-Varela, 23 I&N Dec. 78 (BIA 2001); Matter of Kanga, 22 I&N Dec. 1206 (BIA 2000); Matter of Michel, 21 I&N Dec. 1101 (BIA 1998). An adjustment of status can serve as a waiver to deportation for non-LPRs.

B. Crimes Involving Moral Turpitude

A crime involving moral turpitude, or "CIMT" or "CMT," "refers generally to conduct which is inherently base, vile, or depraved, and contrary to the accepted rules of [societal] morality." Matter of Franklin, 20 I&N Dec. 867, 868 (BIA 1994), aff'd, 72 F.3d 571 (8th Cir. 1995). A non-citizen is not subject to removal if the conviction is for a "petty offense," a conviction for which the maximum penalty possible does not exceed imprisonment for one year and the actual term of imprisonment does not exceed six months.[11] Although non-citizens with convictions of crimes of moral turpitude may be subject to removal, there are several remedies under the immigration laws to obtain relief from removal or seek waivers of the crimes to secure entry or re-entry into the United States.

[11] The Petty Offense Exception is enumerated in INA § 212(a)(2)(A)(ii)(II) and applies to certain crimes involving moral turpitude, thus allowing a non-citizen to remain admissible despite the conviction for offenses under this provision.

There is no statutory definition – CIMTs are defined by BIA caselaw. CIMTs may be felony or misdemeanor offenses. CIMTs all involve an element of moral depravity, bad character, or violence. A CIMT may involve an element of theft, an element in which great bodily harm is intended or threatened, "malice" as an element, sex offenses in which "lewdness" is an element, or crimes of domestic violence. The characteristic of a CIMT relevant for removal purposes is timing: a conviction for a CIMT that was committed within five (5) years of the non-citizen's last admission into the U.S., or 10 years if the citizen was admitted with an "S" visa, will likely lead to removal. The maximum possible sentence must be one (1) year or more in jail. Deportation for misdemeanors pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A)(ii) must involve two or more CIMTs that are separate offenses, i.e., not arising from a single scheme of misconduct. In other words, the misdemeanor convictions must be two or more convictions that are not temporally related, or occur as separate acts of criminal wrongdoing. A non-citizen client may adjust his or her status with one CIMT conviction if the maximum sentence is not more than one year and the sentence imposed is not more than six months in jail.

In Matter of Silva-Trevino, 24 I&N Dec. 687 (A.G. 2008), the Attorney General greatly modified the CIMT analysis used to determine whether a given conviction constitutes a crime involving moral turpitude for removal purposes. The new CIMT analysis provides that to determine whether a conviction is for a crime involving moral turpitude, immigration judges and the Board of Immigration Appeals should: (1) look to the statute of conviction under the categorical inquiry and determine whether there is a "realistic probability" that the criminal statute pursuant to which the alien was convicted would be applied to reach conduct that does not involve moral turpitude; (2) if the categorical inquiry does not resolve the question, engage in a modified categorical inquiry and examine the record of conviction, including documents such as the indictment, the judgment of conviction, jury instructions, a signed guilty plea, and the plea transcript; and (3) if the record of conviction is inconclusive, consider any additional evidence deemed necessary or appropriate to resolve accurately the moral turpitude question. Id. at 704.

The Attorney General specifically limited this new decision to CIMT cases: "This opinion does not, of course, extend beyond the moral turpitude issue—an issue that justifies a departure from the Taylor/Shepard framework because moral turpitude is a non-element aggravating factor. . . ." Id.

Removal may be based on a conviction of a CIMT committed[12] within five years after the date of entry and for which a sentence of one year or longer may be imposed. See 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A)(i). Removal may also be based on convictions of more than one crime involving moral turpitude occurring at any time after entry, not arising out of a single scheme of misconduct,[13] whether or not the convictions resulted from a single trial. See 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(A)(ii).[14]

C. Controlled Substances Offenses

Immigration consequences for controlled substances offenses, or drug offenses, are divided into two categories: (1) conviction-based grounds of removal; and (2) conduct-based grounds of removal. Persons convicted of a narcotics-related offense may be subject to removal under 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(B)(i) or under 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(43)(B). Specifically, if the controlled substance conviction constitutes a drug trafficking offense as defined in 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(2), a non-citizen will be subject to removal as an aggravated felon regardless of the date of conviction. See 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(B)(i), (ii); 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(43). However, under this statutory provision, there is one exception – possession of 30 grams or less of marijuana – that does not subject a non-citizen to removal. This exception is often referred to as the "John Lennon" statute. In federal court, possession of cocaine is not considered an aggravated felony, but possession of crack cocaine is because of the length of sentence available for each offense. See also Lopez v. Gonzalez, 549 U.S. 47 (2007) (conduct made a felony under state law but a misdemeanor under the federal Controlled Substances Act is not a criminal offense removable under the INA); Matter of Aruna, 24 I & N Dec. 452 (BIA 2008) (state law misdemeanor offense of conspiracy to distribute marijuana qualifies as an "aggravated felony" under section INA § 101(a)(43)(B), 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(43)(B), where its elements correspond to the elements of the federal felony offense).

1. Conviction-based Grounds for Removal

Any conviction for a drug offense constitutes grounds for deportation. See INA § 237(b)(2)(B)(I); 8 U.S.C. § 1227(b)(2)(B)(I). Any conviction for a drug offense can render a non-citizen inadmissible at ports of entry; a drug conviction can also disqualify a non-citizen INS*, 910 F.2d 614 (9th Cir. 1990) (two bank robberies within two days of each other, at the same bank); Sawkow v. INS, 314 F.2d 34 (3d Cir. 1963) (two cars stolen within 24 hours); In re Pataki, 15 I&N Dec. 324 (BIA 1975) (voluntary manslaughter and assault with intent to do great bodily harm); Matter of F.G. and C.D., 8 I&N Dec. 447 (BIA 1959) (false statements made one week apart to obtain unemployment compensation, resulting in two convictions under single statutory provision); and Matter of G., 7 I&N Dec. 171 (BIA 1956) (convictions for statutory rape and incest based on same act). But see Akindemowo v. INS, 61 F.3d 282 (4th Cir. 1995) (rejecting Gonzalez and more expansive view of Second, Third, and Ninth Circuits, which require only a common plan or intent pursuant to which multiple crimes are committed). Separate schemes were found in Nguyen v. INS, 991 F.2d 621 (10th Cir. 1993) (possessing stolen car and assault with intent to kill); Matter of Gutnick, 13 I&N Dec. 412 (BIA 1969) (burglaries of different cars on different dates and in different cities); Matter of McLean, 12 I&N Dec. 551 (BIA 1967) (two convictions for issuing fraudulent checks, weeks apart, in different cities, against different complainants); Matter of O'Gorman, 11 I&N Dec. 6 (BIA 1965); and Matter of C., 9 I&N Dec. 524 (BIA 1962) (filing fraudulent tax returns in different years), rev'd on other grounds, Costello v. INS, 376 U.S. 120 (1964). See also Matter of B., 8 I&N Dec. 236 (BIA 1958); Matter of M., 7 I&N Dec. 144 (BIA 1956). But see Iredia v. INS, 981 F.2d 847 (5th Cir. 1993); Balogun v. INS, 31 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 1994); In re Adetiba, 20 I&N Dec. 506 (BIA 1992) ("a single scheme of criminal conduct … mean[s] that when an alien has performed an act, which, in and of itself constitutes a complete, individual, and distinct crime, he is deportable when he again commits such an act, even though one may closely follow the other, be similar in character, and even be part of an overall plan of criminal misconduct"). See generally Patel's Immigration Law Digest, Decisions from 1940 § 7.25 (1985).

[14] See Matter of Ibarra-Obando, 12 I&N Dec. 576 (AG 1967) (expungement of second conviction precludes deportation based upon conviction of two crimes after entry); Matter of Mascorro-Perales, 12 I&N Dec. 228 (BIA 1967); Matter of P., 8 I&N Dec. 424 (BIA 1959) (no requirement of sentence or confinement where there have been two separate convictions); Matter of H., 6 I&N Dec. 614 (BIA 1955).

from relief from deportation. However, there is one major exception to this provision of the INA – a conviction for a drug offense involving 30 grams or less of marijuana for personal use will not trigger deportation and inadmissibility. See 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(B)(i), §§ 1182(a)(2)(A)(i)(II), (h). The BIA distinguishes between state misdemeanor convictions and felony convictions in determining whether the drug offense is also an aggravating felony for immigration purposes.

2. Conduct-based Grounds for Removal

Drug abuse and addiction can trigger grounds of deportability for non-citizen clients.[15] No conviction is necessary to deport a non-citizen for drug abuse and addiction. Deportability grounds for drug addiction and abuse are listed in 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(4)(A)(ii) and apply at any time after entry into the United States. Drug abuse is defined for immigration purposes as any non-medical use of a controlled substance, including marijuana. Drug addiction is defined as non-medical use resulting in physical or psychological dependence, or both. An admission of drug use in court or to a probation officer may be used to establish drug abuse and addiction. Non-medical use is more than experimentation – use must be casual or even sporadic. Drug abuse can also affect a non-citizen's ability to become a legal permanent resident and can affect admissibility if he or she leaves the U.S. Counsel should be sure to seal any proceeding in which his or her client makes an admission of drug abuse, thereby necessitating immigration investigators to seek to unseal the proceedings in order to use the in-court admission as evidence. Counsel should advise non-citizen clients that drug use, even casual or sporadic, could result in denial of admission into the U.S. Defense counsel should advise non-citizen clients of these consequences when such clients enter a program like the Superior Court's Drug Court.

PRACTICE TIP:

Counsel should assist their non-citizen clients in avoiding a drug conviction if at all possible. When possible, counsel should negotiate for a plea agreement in which the non-citizen enters a plea to a non-drug charge in exchange for the dismissal of the drug charge. A client will not be able to get cancellation of removal or adjustment of status if he or she is convicted of a drug offense involving trafficking or if there is a "reason to believe" that the client is involved in drug trafficking. See INA § 212(a)(2)(C). Even if a non-citizen has been acquitted of a drug offense(s) or if the drug offense(s) has been dismissed, the BIA may still deny that non-citizen admission into the United States if the BIA finds that there are facts sufficient to substantiate suspicion that the client has been involved in either drug trafficking or distribution of controlled substances, or both.

[15] An addict is "any person who habitually uses any habit-forming narcotic drug so as to endanger the public morals, health, safety, or welfare, or who is, or has been, so far addicted to the use of such habit-forming narcotic drugs as to have lost the power of self-control with reference to his addiction." 42 U.S.C. § 201(k).

D. Domestic Violence Offenses

Offenses charged in Domestic Violence court that do not reference household and family members or a minor as elements of the offenses are not domestic violence crimes for immigration purposes. Although there are very few offense statutes in the District of Columbia pertaining specifically to domestic violence offenses for immigration purposes, defense counsel should still be aware of any existing domestic violence offenses that could place a non-citizen client in danger of removal. Convictions for domestic violence, stalking, and child abuse render a non-citizen deportable. See INA § 237 (a)(2)(E), 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(E). This new ground of removal was included in IIRIRA and applies to convictions or violations occurring after September 30, 1996.

1. Federal Law

INA § 237(a)(2)(E)(i) and 8 U.S.C. § 1127(a)(2)(E)(i) enumerate the domestic violence offenses triggering removal. This provision of the INA states that any non-citizen is deportable if he or she, "at any time after admission, is convicted of a crime of domestic violence, a crime of stalking, a crime of child abuse, a crime of child neglect, or a crime of child abandonment." Id. A crime of domestic violence is defined as follows:

> For purposes of this clause, the term "crime of domestic violence," means any crime of violence [as defined in 18 U.S.C. § 16] against a person committed by a current or former spouse of the person, by an individual with whom the person shares a child in common, by an individual who is a person cohabiting with or has cohabited with the person as a spouse, by an individual similarly situated to a spouse of the person under the domestic or family violence laws of the jurisdiction where the offense occurs, or by any other individual against a person who is protected from that individual's acts under the domestic or family laws of the … United States or any State, Indian tribal government, or unit of local government."

Id.

To determine whether an offense charged can be classified as a domestic violence crime for immigration purposes, defense counsel must focus on the elements of the offense statute. For example, whether someone is removable on the basis of a conviction for a "crime of child abuse,"[16] is determined by the elements of the offense, as reflected in the statutory definition of the crime or admissible portions of the conviction record—the criminal statute, or at least the record of conviction, must specify the victim as a minor, i.e., under 18 years old. Matter of Velazquez-Herrera, 24 I&N Dec. 503 (BIA 2008). Counsel should check for specific language in the statute regarding acts committed against family or household members or children.

[16]Matter of Velazquez-Herrera, 24 I&N Dec. 503 (BIA 2008) ("For purposes of the ground of removal set forth in INA § 237(a)(2)(E)(i) and 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(E)(i), the term 'crime of child abuse' means any offense involving an intentional, knowing, reckless, or criminally negligent act or omission that constitutes maltreatment of a person under 18 years old or that impairs such a person's physical or mental well-being, including sexual abuse or exploitation.").

Counsel should also be aware that the sentence is irrelevant in the classification of domestic violence crimes for immigration purposes.

2. Civil Protection Order ("CPO") Violations

INA § 237(a)(2)(E)(ii) and 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(E)(ii) provide that a non-citizen is removable for violation of a civil protection order or stay away order issued by a trial court. The statute defines a protection order as "any injunction issued for the purpose of preventing violent or threatening acts of domestic violence, including temporary or final orders issues by civil or criminal courts." Id. This category of offenses includes violation of a protective order, regardless of whether a sentence of imprisonment is imposed. A court's factual finding that a non-citizen has violated a CPO will trigger removal proceedings. No conviction is necessary for a non-citizen client to become removable for such a violation; the immigration court needs only a finding of fact by a civil court to find a non-citizen removable. See INA § 237(a)(2)(E)(ii); 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(e)(ii). This provision is effective for violations of CPOs occurring after October 1, 1996.

PRACTICE TIP:

Defense counsel should be sure to advise a non-citizen client to strictly abide by stay away orders as part of pre-trial release. Counsel should also be sure to advise the non-citizen client that any judicial finding – criminal or civil – of a violation of a protection order (i.e., a CPO or a stay away) may result in removal. A conviction for domestic violence may expose a non-citizen to three separate grounds for removal: first, he or she will be subject to the ground mentioned in this subsection; second, he or she may be subject to removal as a person convicted of a crime of moral turpitude; and third, if a term of imprisonment of one year or more is imposed, he or she may be charged by ICE as an aggravated felon. There are potential defenses to removal under the first two grounds, but few if any defenses to removal as an aggravated felon.

E. Firearms Offenses

There are two types of firearms offenses that may expose your client to removal. One is for illicit trafficking in firearms as defined in 18 U.S.C. § 921 and is considered an aggravated felony. The other is broader and defined under 8 U.S.C. § 1227(a)(2)(C) as "purchasing, selling, offering for sale, exchanging, using, owning, possessing or carrying, or of attempting or conspiring to purchase, sell, offer for sale, exchange, use, own, possess, or carry, any weapon, part, or accessory which is a firearm or destructive device [as defined in 18 U.S.C. § 921(a)] in violation of any law." Id. Convictions for attempt or conspiracy to commit firearms offenses are grounds for removal.[17]

[17] Matter of St. John, 21 I&N Dec. 593 (BIA 1996).

1. Possession-related Firearms Offenses

INA § 237(a)(2)(C) and 8 U.S.C. §§ 1227 (a)(2)(B) and (C) relate only to the possession of firearms. Use of a firearm must be an original element of the offense to qualify as a firearms offense for immigration purposes. Offenses must relate to the possession, carrying, purchasing, sale of, exchanging, using, ownership of, or attempting to do so involving a firearm. Id. Where use of a firearm is an essential element of the crime (i.e., where use of a firearm subjects the charge to more serious penalties), the conviction is a firearm offense.[18] A conviction for which the statute is divisible (e.g., possession of a dangerous weapon) is not considered a ground of removal unless the record of conviction establishes the crime involved a firearm.[19] Examples of deportable firearms offenses in the District of Columbia include carrying a pistol without a license in violation of D.C. Code § 22-4504, unlawful possession of a pistol in violation of D.C. Code § 22-4503, possession of an unregistered firearm in violation of D.C. Code § 7-2502.11, and possession of a firearm during a crime of violence in violation of D.C. Code § 22-4502. Defense counsel should be aware that firearms possessions as well as "while armed" penalty enhancements, will trigger removal. Matter of Martinez-Zapata, 24 I&N Dec. 424 (BIA 2007). In Martinez-Zapata, the court held that, "any fact (including a fact contained in a sentence enhancement) that serves to increase the maximum penalty for a crime . . . is to be treated as an element of the underlying offense, so that a conviction involving the application of such an enhancement is a conviction for the enhanced offense." Id.

PRACTICE TIP:

Defense counsel should try to avoid a firearms conviction if at all possible. Possession of ammunition is not classified as a firearms offense for immigration purposes and, thus, a plea offer including possession of ammunition instead of a firearm is more advantageous to the non-citizen client. Counsel should negotiate for a plea agreement on the non-firearms charge in exchange for dismissal of the firearms charge(s).

A firearms conviction does not trigger inadmissibility and, thus, does not bar a non-citizen client from adjusting his or her status. See Matter of Rainford, 20 I&N Dec. 598 (BIA 1992). A non-citizen convicted of a non-trafficking firearm offense may be eligible for relief from removal. Also, if the client has a United States citizen spouse or parent who can file a petition for a green card on the client's behalf, the immigration judge will have the discretion to waive the conviction and grant the client lawful permanent residence at the judge's discretion. Therefore, counsel should carefully examine the elements of the crime to avoid an aggravated felony charge.

V. EFFECTIVE REPRESENTATION OF NON-CITIZEN CLIENTS

A. Effective Representation during the Pre-trial Phase of a Criminal Case

When defendants are not U.S. citizens, it is imperative that defense counsel be aware of the potential immigration consequences of a conviction. Even though there are cases in other jurisdictions holding that there is no ineffectiveness in defense counsel's failure to advise a client of the removal consequences of guilty pleas, counsel must be alert to the unique problems facing non-citizens accused of criminal offenses throughout appointment, arraignment, plea bargaining, entering a plea or going to trial, and sentencing. Subsequent to appointment, defense counsel should gather all the facts and circumstances surrounding the person's status in the United States. Appendix B of this chapter contains a sample interview sheet with instructions to guide the defense attorney through questioning a client about his or her immigration status. Defense counsel should, whenever possible, consult with immigration practitioners in order to carefully determine a client's status, if the crime with which he or she is charged will subject him or her to removal from the United States, and if there are any measures to avoid or ameliorate the harsh immigration consequences stemming from a possible conviction.

The following section includes tips on effective representation of non-citizen clients in the pre-trial stage of a criminal case.

1. Be Sure to Ask the Client about His or Her Immigration Status

One of the first things a criminal defense attorney should do is ascertain the non-citizen client's immigration status. Knowledge of the client's immigration status is essential to the assessment of the potential immigration consequences the non-citizen may face as a result of criminal charges. Specifically, the attorney should obtain legal documentation of the client's immigration status. For example, if a client state that he or she is an LPR, then counsel should request that the client produces his or her "green card."

Not all clients are aware of their immigration status. There are many situations in which non-citizen clients may have immigrated to the United States early in their lives, and thus have no memory or knowledge that they lived in another country or that the U.S. is not their country of origin. Consequently, they may falsely believe that they are citizens or legal permanent residents when, in reality, they have no documentation of legal immigration at all. This can have devastating immigration consequences for the non-citizen client. Therefore, investigation into a possible non-citizen client's immigration history is crucial. Investigation may mean speaking with members of the client's family about immigration status or requesting immigration documentation of the client's legal immigration status. Defense counsel should ask all clients about their immigration status, whether or not counsel believes the client is a citizen.

It is imperative that counsel does not advertise the client's immigration status to law enforcement or court personnel as this may lead to the involvement of immigration authorities. Non-citizen clients have a privilege against self-incrimination, which includes talking to officials from the ICE, MPD, the FBI, or any other law enforcement agency regarding immigration status.

2. Ascertain the Non-citizen Client's Criminal History

Acquiring all details of a client's criminal history is crucial to a defense attorney's ability to provide the client with effective assistance of counsel in a current criminal matter. This is doubly important to a non-citizen client. In some cases, the non-citizen client may already have a criminal history and, thus, may already be removable as a result of prior convictions. Obtaining the client's complete criminal history is essential to providing accurate advice to the client concerning potential immigration consequences that might stem from a subsequent criminal conviction. When advising the client, defense counsel should emphasize that not only can prior convictions render the client removable, but they can also prevent the client from being able to become a citizen or to gain admission into the U.S. at designated ports of entry. Investigation of criminal history is also important because the client may have to answer to a history of arrests and convictions in a removal hearing in immigration court.

3. Ascertain any Likely Dispositions of the Case

With any client, defense counsel should immediately begin to assess the strengths and weaknesses of the case to ensure the most favorable outcome for the client. This is very important with non-citizen clients because of the possible collateral immigration consequences that may arise as a result of the criminal case. In many cases, a conviction may be unavoidable; however, for a non-citizen client, formulating a defense strategy early in the case could mean the difference between deportation and being able to remain in the U.S. As part of formulating an effective defense strategy, defense counsel should research adverse immigration consequences and consult with an immigration attorney regarding such consequences as necessary.

4. Find out what is Important to the Client

Is the client concerned about the possible removal or exclusion consequences of the disposition? Is the client willing to do more time to prevent possible immigration consequences arising from a sentence? More time in custody could mean saving the client from adverse immigration consequences. Defense counsel should properly advise the client on the specific adverse consequences that can result from a criminal case. Counsel should not provide the client with general advice of immigration consequences such as "this might lead to deportation," "don't leave the country," or "this might prevent you from becoming a citizen."

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia held in Goodall v. United States, 759 A.2d 1077 (D.C. 2000), that defense counsel's mis-advice regarding the consequences of collateral matters, such as immigration and parole, resulting from a guilty plea can be substantial grounds for a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. In keeping with the decision in Goodall, defense counsel should provide specific advice to the non-citizen client regarding the specific consequences that may result from a conviction, such as the various grounds of removability and inadmissibility as well as the denial of adjustments of status. Counsel should advise the client as to the actual consequences that will result from any possible disposition that may result from the case (from both a plea bargain and a trial). Counsel should also make sure that the non-citizen client understands his or her options in the case and how such a disposition will affect his or her immigration status.

5. Be Aware of Cultural Differences

If the client does not speak English or does not have a sufficient grasp of it, counsel will have to rely upon an interpreter in whom he or she has confidence. Counsel should make sure that he or she obtains the services of an interpreter with whom both counsel and the client feel comfortable. Counsel should also remember that shyness, non-aggressiveness, or a reluctance to defend oneself might be signs that the client comes from a culture that defers to authority. Such behavior may not mean indifference or disrespect. The client may not initially trust the attorney, particularly if the client has entered the U.S. without authorization, as he or she may see the attorney as part of the system that is seeking eventually to deport him or her or, at least, not protect his or her interests. Such suspicions and apprehensions may be heightened if the defense attorney is court-appointed: i.e., because the "government" is paying the attorney, the attorney is on the prosecutor's side.

Uneducated clients, particularly peasant farm workers, often have a literal interpretation of questions and answers. For example, on the witness stand, the client is asked if he is working. He answers no but counsel knows that he holds down two jobs. Why the answer? The client is not working now, at the time of the trial. Confronted with such clients, defense counsel will have to make extra efforts to ensure that effective communication is established.

Clients coming from war-torn societies or fleeing political persecution may have psychological baggage that could significantly impact criminal defense and immigration matters. Individuals from El Salvador, Guatemala, Ethiopia, and Somalia, among others, have often either witnessed or suffered terrible destruction and torture. The defense attorney should quiz the client and look for signs of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) for a defense based on culture.[20]

6. Analyze the Elements of Current Charges

Defense counsel should complete the following checklist to determine if the client is subject to removal and why.

- Do the elements of the offense for which the client is charged constitute an aggravated felony?
- Do the elements of the offense for which the client is charged constitute a crime involving moral turpitude?
- Do the elements of the offense for which the client is charged constitute a drug offense?
- Do the elements of the offense for which the client is charged constitute a domestic violence offense?

[20] See Tarnao, Sharon M., The Cultural Defense: Tradition or Formal?, GEO. IMMIGR. L.J. (Winter, 1996).

- Do the elements of the offense for which the client is charged constitute a firearms offense?

- Is the conviction a conviction for immigration purposes?

Counsel should be sure to examine the potential sentence for each offense when determining if the client fits into any of the above categories.

7. Ensure that the Non-citizen Client understands what has happened Counsel should explain to the client as thoroughly as possible what his or her obligations are if he or she is given probation or diversion, or if the case is dismissed. Counsel must ensure that the client understands that a conviction for DWI, battery, and other "minor" offenses represents a criminal conviction with possible immigration consequences. Counsel should explain that criminal records are often maintained indefinitely and that the USCIS has access to them. Non-citizens are frequently required to submit their fingerprints for criminal background checks when applying or reapplying for immigration papers. Material misrepresentations at ICE examinations and on immigration documents are grounds for denying immigration benefits. The client must be warned that if asked by immigration authorities, he or she must admit to arrests and criminal charges even if the case was dismissed.

B. Trial and Plea Negotiations

There are several issues that defense counsel should be aware of when advising a non-citizen client to enter a plea of guilty or to go to trial.

1. Going to Trial

A verdict of not guilty will not affect a person's immigration status in the United States. If the charges are very serious or the Assistant United States Attorney refuses to negotiate, counsel should consider going to trial. If the non-citizen client elects to go to trial, defense counsel should fully advise the client of the potential consequences that might result from any and all convictions in the case. Defense counsel should also advise the client that being found guilty at trial might foreclose the non-citizen client to certain forms of relief from removal stemming from the conviction.

2. Plea Negotiations

After counsel has determined the client's immigration status and carefully determined that he or she may be subject to removal, counsel should begin discussions with the Assistant United States Attorney (AUSA) in order to negotiate a plea to avoid or ameliorate possible harsh immigration consequences of a conviction. Defense counsel should primarily strive to avoid a conviction for a deportable offense by doing the following:

a. Negotiate a plea to a lesser-included offense that does not involve a crime of violence or other key element that renders it a deportable offense. For example, a burglary conviction will not be a CIMT unless the record reflects that the breaking and entering was done to commit a CIMT, i.e., theft. See Matter of G, 1 I&N Dec. 403 (BIA 1943).

b. Negotiate for a sentence of just under one year if a one-year sentence is the "triggering effect" for an aggravated felony. Stack counts consecutively so that no one conviction carries a sentence of more than one year. If the non-citizen client has been detained pre-trial, waive credit for time served in order to obtain a lower jail sentence. Advise the client to spend more time in jail rather than pushing for a suspended sentence of over one year. Remember, the goals of saving a client from immigration consequences can be quite different from those in a criminal case. In many cases, serving more time can prevent adverse consequences in immigration court.

c. Negotiate for pleas that are binding upon the court pursuant to Super. Ct. Crim. R. 11(e)(1)(C). A binding plea can ensure that the court does not impose a sentence with potentially damaging immigration consequences for the client.

d. Include an immigration expert in the plea negotiations. In many situations, the AUSAs and judges do not understand or believe that many crimes now result in almost automatic removal. In attempting to negotiate a good plea with the AUSA, consider submitting an affidavit from an immigration expert explaining the consequences of a plea. Alternatively, ask an immigration attorney to participate in a meeting with the AUSA. Defense counsel should also consider calling an immigration expert as a witness during sentencing so that the judge will be better able to understand the consequences.

C. The Plea Colloquy and Sentencing

Defense counsel must be vigilant to protect the non-citizen's rights during this phase of a criminal case because it will make all the difference in immigration court.

1. Sanitize the Judicial Record during any Plea Colloquy

Counsel should ask the AUSA to issue a new charging document so that the contents of the new charging document do not trigger immigration consequences. Counsel should make sure that the plea colloquy does not contain any references to offenses that would result in immigration consequences and ask the AUSA to omit from the factual proffer all references to other charges to which the client is not pleading guilty. It is imperative to remember that the plea colloquy is admissible against the client in immigration court.

2. Make Sure that the Plea Colloquy Complies with the Alien Sentencing Act

D.C. Code § 16-713 requires every trial court to advise non-citizens of immigration consequences that may occur as the direct result of either a guilty plea or a plea of nolo contendre. See D.C. Law 4-202, March 10, 1983. The specific language regarding this advisement is as follows:

> If you are not a citizen of the United States, you are advised that conviction of the offense for which you have been charged may have the consequence of deportation, exclusion from admission to the United States, or denial of naturalization pursuant to the laws of the United States.

Id. This statute also permits a non-citizen defendant to withdraw his or guilty plea if the court fails to administer the advisement, based on a presumption that the non-citizen did not receive the advisement from any other source. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals has determined that the purpose of this statute is "to ensure notice to [non-citizens] of the consequences of a guilty plea." Daramy v. United States, 750 A.2d 552, 556 (D.C. 2000). The Court of Appeals requires that the trial court provide sufficient advisement, not legal advice, on immigration consequences. Id. at 557. In Van Slytman v. United States, 804 A.2d 1113, 1117-1118 (D.C. 2002), the Court of Appeals determined that a non-citizen defendant was entitled to withdraw his guilty plea because the trial court had failed to provide a complete advisement of immigration consequences pursuant to D.C. Code § 16-713.

Judges often misconstrue this statute to mean that the person pleading guilty must state whether he or she is a citizen. However, the sentencing judge can make reference to the non-citizen's immigration status when fashioning a sentence.[21] It is imperative that counsel object to the client being asked whether he or she is a United States citizen, as the client has a Fifth Amendment privilege against answering. All that is required of the court is to advise defendants that, if they are not citizens, then the conviction could have adverse immigration consequences.

3. Urge the Court to Impose a Sentence that will not Trigger Removal

If possible, defense counsel always should urge the court to impose straight probation, as probation is not a term of imprisonment of one year for immigration purposes. Counsel should remember to ask for a sentence in terms of days instead of months because twelve (12) months equals one year in immigration court.

[21] See Yemson v. United States, 764 A.2d 816 (D.C. 2001). No error, let alone plain error, for sentencing judge to comment on defendant's national origin and status as illegal alien where those comments bore a reasonable relationship to his pattern of misconduct and did not evince a clear intent to punish the defendant because of his status; that misconduct included twice fleeing abroad after guilty pleas and twice being deported. Also, no error for sentencing judge to remind the prosecutor to take steps to deport the defendant after his sentence was served or to make a notation on the judgment to that effect. The reminder and notation were not a part of the sentence.

VI. POST-CONVICTION RELIEF FROM REMOVAL

There are certain options available to non-citizens convicted of removable defenses in criminal court. Defense counsel should be aware of these options and should make the non-citizen client aware of them as well.

1. Look for flaws in the trial record as a basis to vacate the conviction. Make sure that the judge's order to vacate does not state immigration consequences as the only reason to vacate the conviction, i.e., that the language in the order implying social stigma or inability to find employment is beneficial. See Matter of Pickering, 23 I&N Dec. 621 (BIA 2003).

2. File an appeal if possible.

3. Seek modification of the original sentence. File a Rule 35 Motion if the triggering effect results from the length of the sentence. Make sure that the sentence is not modified solely for immigration purposes; however, the immigration court will still recognize the sentence reduction. See Matter of Song, 23 I&N Dec. 173 (BIA 2001).

VII. RELIEF FROM REMOVAL IN IMMIGRATION COURT

A. Cancellation of Removal

Cancellation of removal is a term of art for relief from deportation. Depending upon immigration status, there are different conditions that must be satisfied to be eligible for this relief. The immigration judge has wide discretion in deciding whether to grant relief and may look at a variety of different factors when accessing cancellation of relief for the deportable client. Defense counsel should be aware of the types of cancellation of relief that may be available to the non-citizen client when accessing the strengths and weaknesses of a potential plea offer or decision to go to trial.

1. For Legal Permanent Residents

The following conditions must all be met for an LPR to be eligible for cancellation of removal:

a. The LPR must have held this status for at least five (5) years and have resided continuously in the U.S. for seven (7) years in any legal status.
b. The LPR must not have been convicted of an aggravated felony and must have cancellation available in all removal grounds.
c. The LPR must not have received cancellation of removal on a prior occasion.

See INA § 240; 8 U.S.C. § 1229b(a); 8 C.F.R. §§ 1240.11, 1240.20.

2. Cancellation of Removal & Adjustment of Status for Non-Permanent Residents

Clients who are non-permanent residents are eligible if they meet all of the following conditions:

a. The non-LPR must have been present in the U.S. continuously for at least ten (10) years preceding the application for cancellation of removal.
b. The non-LPR must demonstrate good moral character for the past ten (10) years.
c. The non-LPR must not have been convicted of an offense rendering a non-citizen inadmissible or removable (deportable).
d. The non-LPR must establish that removal will result in exceptional and extremely unusual hardship to his or her spouse, parent, or child, who is either a U.S. citizen or an LPR.

See INA § 240; 8 U.S.C. § 1229b(a); 8 C.F.R. §§ 1240.11, 1240.20.

B. Relief for Asylees and Refugees, INA § 209(c), 8 U.S.C. § 1159(c)

There is a special waiver or adjustment of status for refugees and asylees seeking a waiver from removal. This provision does not require establishing hardship to a relative for approval and can be used by refugees and asylees convicted of certain offenses, such as simple possession of controlled substances. See Matter of Jean, 23 I&N Dec. 373 (A.G. 2002).

C. Violence Against Women Act of 1994 ("VAWA")

This provision was enacted as part of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994. It was subsequently amended with the enactment of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000. It provides relief to women and children subjected to battery and cruelty by a spouse or parent who is either a U.S. citizen or an LPR. See INA § 245. The complainant must apply for VAWA relief with allegations of abuse inflicted by the citizen or LPR spouse; the accused and defense counsel for the accused are not permitted knowledge of the application. Applying for VAWA relief enables women and juveniles to apply for waivers to removal proceedings. See INA §§ 212(g), (h), & (I); § 237(a)(7). To support the VAWA application, the applicant will often include police reports and other documents alleging instances of abuse.

D. Asylum Relief, INA § 208, 8 U.S.C. § 1158

Section 208 of the INA provides that any non-citizen physically present in the U.S. may apply for asylum if that individual fears persecution in his or her country of origin. There are certain convictions that will bar a non-citizen from applying for asylum, and a non-citizen may apply for asylum as a form of relief during removal proceedings.

E. Withholding of Removal, INA § 241(b)(3), 8 U.S.C. § 1231

"Withholding" means that the order of removal will be "withheld" if the deportable non-citizen can establish a credible fear of persecution if he or she were to be returned to a country of origin or a proposed country of removal. Persons with aggravated felony convictions are not barred from applying for this relief. A higher standard of proof is involved in establishing a credible fear of persecution under INA § 241(b)(3) than § 208.

F. Convention Against Torture ("CAT"), INA § 241(b)(3)(B), 8 U.S.C. § 241(B)(3)

The Convention Against Torture ("CAT") is a treaty governed by international law to which the United States is a signatory. CAT provides protection to persons who fear torture by their government or proposed country of removal. CAT's procedures are enumerated in 8 CFR § [1]208.16. CAT comes in two forms: (1) withholding of removal; and (2) deferral of removal. Withholding of removal was discussed previously in this chapter. Deferral of removal means that removal will be deferred until the United States government can locate a country to which the non-citizen can be removed without fear of torture and persecution.

G. Removal in Lieu of Incarceration or Voluntary Removal

The Anti-Terrorism Enforcement and Death Penalty Act of 1996 ("AEDPA"), Pub. L. 104-132, 110 Stat. 1214, provides for the removal of nonviolent offenders prior to the completion of a sentence of imprisonment. The provision reads as follows:

> (i) in the case of [a non-citizen] in the custody of the Attorney General, if the Attorney General determines that (I) the [non-citizen] is confined pursuant to a final conviction for a nonviolent offense [other than non-citizen smuggling] and (II) the removal of the [non-citizen] is appropriate and in the best interest of the United States; or (ii) in the case of [a non-citizen] in the custody of a State (or a political subdivision of a State), if the chief State official exercising authority with respect to the incarceration of the [non-citizen] determines that (I) the [non-citizen] is confined pursuant to a final conviction for a nonviolent offense [other than non-citizen smuggling], (II) the removal is appropriate and in the best interest of the State, and (III) submits a written request to the Attorney General that such [non-citizen] be removed.

8 U.S.C. § 1231(a)(4)(B).

H. Special Relief for Juveniles in Immigration Court and Special Immigrant Act for Children in Foster Care, 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(27)(J), 8 C.F.R. § 204.11(a)

The Immigration Act of 1990 and subsequent amendment created an option to help non-citizen juveniles in the neglect system. These juveniles qualify as "Special Immigrant Juveniles" pursuant to this legislation. Special Immigrant Juveniles are eligible to become LPRs and receive green cards. To qualify, the court must decide that family reunification is not in the juvenile's best interests, that the juvenile will remain in foster care, and that it would be inadvisable for the juvenile to return to his or her home country.

This act can be applied to juveniles in the criminal justice system who are committed to Department of Homeland Security ("DHS") custody. Counsel should advocate, under Superior Court's One Family-One Judge policy, that the delinquency proceeding be closed in favor of a neglect proceeding for the juvenile client. This act also acts as a waiver for drug abuse and dependency for deportation purposes. If there is a guardian ad litem (GAL), then he or she will be the party who applies for Special Immigrant status for counsel's juvenile client.

Defense counsel should take special care to ensure that special immigrant status is what the juvenile client wants. Commitment to DHS as an abused and neglected juvenile can result in termination of parental rights of the non-citizen parents and could expose the parents to negative immigration consequences as a result of the commitment.

VIII. BARS TO RELIEF FROM REMOVAL

Defense counsel should be aware that various criminal convictions render a non-citizen client ineligible for forms of relief from removal available in immigration court.

A. Bars to Naturalization

An applicant for citizenship cannot have any conviction for an aggravated felony or crime involving moral turpitude after November 29, 1990, and no murder conviction at any time. In addition, an applicant cannot have had any incidents preventing good moral character during the five (5) years immediately prior to the application, including:

a. aggravated felony convictions;
b. crimes involving moral turpitude convictions;
c. reason to believe a person is a drug trafficker;
d. a habitual drunkard;
e. an illegal gambler;
f. a person who gives false testimony for immigration benefits;
g. a person who engages in prostitution or non-citizen smuggling; or
h. a person who received confinement to a penal institution for an aggregate period of more than 180 days.

See 8 U.S.C. § 1101(f).

B. Bars to Relief for Persons with Temporary Protected Status ("TPS")

In certain circumstances, bars to relief from removal are applicable to persons who receive temporary protected status pursuant to the Nicaraguan Adjustment & Central American Relief Act ("NACARA"). Non-citizens with legal immigration status pursuant to this statute will be rendered ineligible for relief from removal under the following circumstances:

a. aggravated felony convictions;
b. crimes involving moral turpitude convictions;
c. reason to believe a person is a drug trafficker;
d. a habitual drunkard;
e. an illegal gambler;
f. a person who gives false testimony for immigration benefits;
g. a person who engages in prostitution or non-citizen smuggling; or
h. a person who received confinement to a penal institution for an aggregate period of more than 180 days.

See 8 C.F.R. § 240.61(b); 8 U.S.C. § 1101(f).

C. Bars to Asylum Relief

Bars to relief from deportation for persons seeking asylum as a form of relief from deportation include a conviction for an aggravated felony or a conviction for a "particularly serious crime," i.e., violence in the record of conviction. See 8 U.S.C. §§ 1158(b)(2)(A)(ii), (B)(i).

D. Bars to Withholding of Removal

A client seeking "withholding of removal" cannot have had a conviction for a "particularly serious crime," including:

a. An aggravated felony with a sentence of an aggregate period of at least five (5) years;
b. A drug trafficking conviction, See Matter of Y-L-, 23 I&N Dec. 270 (A.G. 2002); or
c. An act of violence in the record of conviction.

See 8 U.S.C. § 1231(b)(3)(B).

E. Bars to Voluntary Departure

A non-citizen client cannot receive voluntary departure if the client has an aggravated felony or a conviction that "suggests" terrorist activity. In addition, voluntary departure is not available to non-citizens who previously received voluntary departure, but failed to leave the United States.

IX. GROUNDS OF INADMISSIBILITY

A. INA Grounds of Inadmissibility

The Illegal Immigration Reform and Responsibility Act of 1996 ("IIRIRA") greatly expanded the grounds of exclusion, or "inadmissibility," listed in the INA. This section applies specifically to "on-citizens unlawfully present" in the United States. The following list includes some of the new grounds of inadmissibility that have been implemented by IIRIRA and incorporated into the Immigration Nationality Act (INA):

- A non-citizen present in the United States without being admitted or paroled, or who arrives in the U.S. at any time or place other than as designated by the Attorney General is inadmissible. See INA § 212(a)(6)(A)(i).

- A non-citizen who falsely represents him or herself to be a U.S. citizen for any purpose under the INA or any federal or state law is inadmissible for five years from the non-citizen's departure or removal. See INA § 212(a)(6)(C)(ii).

- A non-citizen admitted as a nonimmigrant who obtains benefits through fraud or misrepresentation under federal law for which the non-citizen is ineligible is inadmissible for five years from the non-citizen's departure or removal. See INA § 212(a)(6)(C)(iii).

- A non-citizen subject to a final order for violation of section 274(C) is inadmissible. See INA § 212(a)(6)(F).

- A non-citizen who obtains the status of a student (F-1) and violates the terms or conditions of such status is inadmissible for five years from the date of the violation. See INA § 212(a)(6)(G).

- A non-citizen who votes in violation of any federal, state, or local statute or regulation is inadmissible. See INA § 212(a)(10)(D).

- A former citizen of the U.S. is inadmissible if he or she renounced U.S. citizenship for the purpose of avoiding U.S. taxation. See INA § 212(a)(10)(E).

B. Bars to Re-entry

Once a non-citizen is deported or voluntarily leaves the United States, he or she, depending upon the reason for the deportation, may either be barred from re-entering the U.S. for a statutorily specified period of time or receive a lifetime bar.

- A non-citizen ordered removed from the U.S. is inadmissible for five years and inadmissible for twenty years for any subsequent removal, or if removed due to a conviction of an aggravated felony defined by INA § 101(a)(43). See INA § 212(a)(9)(A)(i).

- A non-citizen not described above who has been ordered removed, or who has departed the U.S. while an order of removal was outstanding, is inadmissible for 10 years and 20 years for any subsequent removal, and permanently for non-citizens convicted of an aggravated felony. See INA § 212(a)(9)(A)(ii).

- A non-citizen who is unlawfully present in the U.S. for more than 180 days, but less than one year, who voluntarily departs from the U.S. prior to the commencement of removal proceedings is inadmissible for three years. See INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(i)(I). A non-citizen who is unlawfully present in the U.S. for more than one year, who voluntarily departs from the U.S. prior to the commencement of removal proceedings, is inadmissible for ten years under INA § 212(a)(9)(B)(i)(II). The time in unlawful status before April 1, 1997, is not counted.

PRACTICE TIP:

If the non-citizen is deported based on an aggravated felony, it will mean a lifetime bar (except perhaps to visit, but that would require a waiver of the criminal conviction). Although the non-citizen may not want to stay in jail or fight his or her case, if the non-citizen has the opportunity to argue against an aggravated felony charge, it might be worth fighting the immigration case if the client ever wants to return legally to the U.S.

X. NON-CITIZEN WITNESSES IN CRIMINAL CASES

The Immigration and Nationality Act has provisions to grant visas to non-citizens who cooperate with law enforcement officials or are the victims of crime. The purpose of these visas is to help the non-citizen and his or her family members to remain in the United States during the pendency of a criminal investigation and trial. These visas can benefit non-citizen witnesses who might otherwise be deportable.

A. S Visa: "Cooperator" Visa, INA § 101(a)(15)(S), 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(15)(S)

Pursuant to 8 CFR § 214.2(t), a non-citizen witness in a criminal proceeding can receive a visa with an S-5 status. Family members of a witness receiving S-5 status may receive visas with an S-7 status as derivative beneficiaries of the principle S visa holder. The application for this status must be completed by an agent from a state or federal law enforcement agency and prosecutors may sponsor these non-citizen witnesses for an S visa. The visa is approved by the Assistant Attorney General of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice.

1. Conditions

The non-citizen S visa witness must report regularly to law enforcement agents and fulfill the terms of the cooperation agreement with law enforcement. The principal holder and derivative holders may not change the S status to another visa status. In addition, as a condition of receiving this visa, the witness and his or her family must waive their right to a removal hearing and to contest a removal action, other than on the basis of withholding of removal. The principal and his or her derivatives may apply for asylum if either party is ordered deported.

If the S non-immigrant is deportable because of a crime, only withholding is available.

2. Benefits

The S non-immigrant witness and his or her family are able to remain in the U.S. during the pendency of the investigation and prosecution. The witness and his or her family, while in S status, can adjust to LPR status as a reward for cooperation. The same sponsoring law enforcement agent can apply for LPR status for the witness and family. See INA § 245(j); 8 U.S.C. § 1255(j). The requirements and procedure for cooperating witnesses adjusting to LPR are found in 8 CFR § [1]245.11.

B. U Visas: Government Witnesses, INA § 101(a)(15)(U), 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(15)(U)

The U status is intended for the complainants in a wide array of crimes who are helpful or willing to be helpful to law enforcement. This provision was enacted as part of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000.

An applicant for a U visa must have suffered substantial physical or mental abuse as a result of having been a victim of a specified criminal activity. The applicant (or where the witness is a child under the age of 16, the parent, guardian, or "next friend" of the witness) must possess information concerning the specified criminal activity. The applicant must have been, be currently, or be likely to be helpful to a federal or state law enforcement official, prosecutor, or judge in investigating or prosecuting the criminal activity. The criminal activity described must be in violation of the law of the United States or its territories or possessions. Endorsement of the application by a law enforcement agency is the best form of primary evidence to support the application. U visa status for non-immigrant status lasts for three years and holders may adjust to LPR status after that time. In addition, government officials are encouraged not to institute removal proceedings against possible U visa applicants. See INS Memorandum "Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000" (Aug. 30, 2001), posted on AILA InfoNet at Doc. No. 02011734 (Jan. 17, 2002).

C. T Visas for Victims of Human Trafficking, INA § 101(a)(15)(T), 8 U.S.C. § 1101(a)(15)(T)

The Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000 is available to assist victims of severe human trafficking offenses who are present in the U.S. as a result. The applicant must be either willing to cooperate with law enforcement and comply with investigations and prosecutions of human trafficking, or be under 15 years of age and likely to suffer extreme hardship if removed from the U.S. Procedures are found in 8 CFR § 214.11.

XI. CONCLUSION

Prior to the passage of IIRIRA and AEDPA, immigration attorneys stepped in post-conviction to represent the immigration interests of their clients before the immigration courts. At that time, persons with all types of convictions, including aggravated felonies, were able to request and receive relief from removal. Although some criminal practitioners consulted with immigration counsel prior to trial or plea negotiations, the majority rightly believed that immigration issues could be addressed and fixed post-trial. This no longer the case. Criminal defense attorneys must represent both their clients' due process rights and interests and their immigration interests during the criminal process. Criminal attorneys are now the first defense against potential removal. What defense counsel does in criminal court is gravely important and will have a serious, long-term impact on the non-citizen client. Therefore, it is essential that counsel review and address the issues enumerated in this chapter and consult with an immigration expert in all criminal cases involving non-citizens.

APPENDIX A

CRIMES HELD NOT TO INVOLVE MORAL TURPITUDE

1. Against the Person

Assault – simple assault and battery

United States ex rel. Griffo v. McCandless, 28 F.2d 287 (E.D. Pa. 1928); In re B., 5 I&N Dec. 538 (BIA 1953); United States ex rel. Zaffarano v. Corsi, 63 F.2d 757 (2d Cir. 1933); Ciambelli ex rel. Maranci v. Johnson, 12 F.2d 465 (D. Mass. 1926).

Assault with an unknown weapon

Matter of B., 1 I&N Dec. 52 (A.G. 1941).

Homicide – by reckless conduct

APPENDIX B

CLIENT QUESTIONNAIRE ON IMMIGRATION ISSUES

Instruction Sheet

To determine the immigration status of your client, including obtaining information that may be helpful to an immigration expert/attorney with whom you consult, you should ask the following questions:

- Full name, date of birth, place of birth: Place of birth information may be helpful in determining whether your client is eligible for certain forms of relief, including temporary protected status (TPS).

- Immigration Status: There are many different types of immigration status in the United States, one of which fits your client. The following are some types of immigration status: (1) legal permanent residents (green card holders); (2) nonimmigrant visa holders – persons in the United States on temporary visas, including students, tourists, and temporary workers; (3) asylum applicants; (4) NACARA applicants; (5) temporary protected status – many persons from conflicted countries have been granted what is called TPS; (6) undocumented – persons who entered the United States without inspection, the majority of whom crossed the southern border.

- Date(s) of entry into the United States: Be sure to ask your client when he or she first came to the United States, and how many times he or she has departed and reentered.

- Contact with Immigration: Has your client had any contact with the DHS? If your client is an LPR or has some other lawful immigration status, he or she has obviously had some contact with USCIS. However, this question may also apply to the undocumented person. Inquire if he or she has ever been detained or placed in immigration proceedings by USCIS. Ask for copies of any and all immigration papers, including a copy of his or her green card.

- Family in the U.S.: Get information regarding the immigration status of any immediate family members presently in the United States.

- Alien Registration Number or "A" Number: This number begins with an "A" and appears on your client's green card, his or her work authorization, and any other immigration documents.

- Prior criminal convictions or conduct: You should carefully question your client about past criminal conduct and convictions. This becomes important in determining whether or not he or she may be removable as a result of multiple convictions or having committed crimes of moral turpitude.

CHAPTER 18

SPEEDY TRIAL

The Supreme Court announced the basic principles governing the law of speedy trial in Barker v. Wingo, 407 U.S. 514 (1972). Rejecting per se rules, the Court considered four factors in determining whether a speedy trial was denied: (1) length of the delay; (2) reasons for the delay; (3) whether and how the defendant asserted the right to a speedy trial; and (4) the prejudice to the defendant due to the delay. Subsequent decisions have refined the analysis through application to specific situations, but the fundamental principles of speedy trial law have remained the same. Graves v. United States, 490 A.2d 1086 (D.C. 1984) (en banc), adopted the Barker analysis.[1] The D.C. Court of Appeals conducts the four-factor inquiry required by Barker in evaluating speedy trial claims. Parker v. United States, 745 A.2d 933, 936 (D.C. 2000).

I. THE SIXTH AMENDMENT RIGHT TO A SPEEDY TRIAL

The Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial is "triggered by arrest, indictment, or other official accusation." Doggett v. United States, 505 U.S. 647, 655 (1992). Doggett explicitly rejected the government's argument that the core concerns of the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial are implicated only after arrest or arraignment. Id. at 654-55;[2] cf. United States v. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. 302, 312 (1986) ("when defendants are not incarcerated or subjected to other substantial restrictions on their liberty, a court should not weigh that time towards a claim under the Speedy Trial Clause"); United States v. MacDonald, 456 U.S. 1, 8 (1982) (time after dismissal of charges under military law and before indictment for similar charges under civilian criminal law does not count toward speedy trial claim); United States v. Marion, 404 U.S. 307 (1971) (time of delay between end of criminal activity and indictment does not count toward speedy trial claim); United States v. (Norman) Day, 697 A.2d 31 (D.C. 1997) (pre-indictment delay does not implicate Sixth Amendment speedy trial right). If a charge is dismissed and then re-brought, the period between dismissal and re-filing does not count for speedy trial purposes. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. at 309-11; MacDonald, 456 U.S. at 8; Dickerson v. United States, 650 A.2d 680, 684 (D.C. 1994); Givens v. United States, 644 A.2d 1373 (D.C. 1994); Townsend v. United States, 512 A.2d 994 (D.C. 1986).

[1] A different set of considerations governs the speedy trial right in federal courts under the Speedy Trial Act, 18 U.S. §§ 3161 et seq., which does not apply to cases in Superior Court, see Walker v. United States, 481 A.2d 1308, 1309 n.2 (D.C. 1984); United States v. Alston, 412 A.2d 351, 356 n.10 (D.C. 1980), or to the pre-transfer period in cases originally filed in Superior Court and later transferred to federal court, United States v. Mills, 964 F.2d 1186 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (en banc). However, there is a statutory guarantee of indictment within 90 days and a trial within 100 days (subject to exceptions) for defendants preventively detained under D.C. Code § 23-1322(h)(1). See also Graves, 490 A.2d at 1109 (Ferren, J., dissenting). Yet another set of considerations governs respondents in juvenile cases. See In re D.H., 666 A.2d 462, 473 (D.C. 1995) ("a child has a due process right to a fair trial, including a speedy one, consistent with the statutory purpose of the juvenile code, and consonant with the protection of the child and the community"). For a more detailed discussion of the due process analysis, see infra Section II.

[2] Doggett relaxed the requirement that the defendant furnish affirmative proof of prejudice. 505 U.S. at 655. Doggett's inability to demonstrate actual prejudice did not defeat his speedy trial claim because the excessive delay between indictment and arrest (8.5 years) presumptively compromised the trial's reliability in unidentifiable ways. Id. See infra Section I.D.

Violation of the right to a speedy trial requires dismissal of the charges with prejudice. Strunk v. United States, 412 U.S. 434, 439-40 (1973); Turner v. United States, 622 A.2d 667, 673 n.8 (D.C. 1993). Because this is the sole remedy, courts are reluctant to find a denial of the right to a speedy trial absent a strong showing of prejudice. See Bowman v. United States, 385 A.2d 28, 32 (D.C. 1978).[3] Dissenting in Graves, 490 A.2d at 1108-09, Judge Ferren noted that the reluctance to dismiss charges following a conviction has resulted in appellate decisions that compromise the Sixth Amendment right. He suggests that trial courts take intermediate steps when a defendant asserts the right to a speedy trial. The court could advance the case on the trial calendar; advance other pre-trial proceedings, such as motions to suppress, to reduce delays due to pre-trial government appeals; or release the defendant from custody if the delay continues. See also Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. at 314 (quoting Barker, 407 U.S. at 522) (calling dismissal an "unsatisfactorily severe remedy").

None of the Barker factors has "talismanic qualities"; they are interrelated and "must be considered together with such other circumstances as may be relevant" in the "difficult and sensitive balancing process" by which a court determines whether a defendant's speedy trial right has been denied. Barker, 407 U.S. at 533;[4] see Moore v. United States, 359 A.2d 299, 302 (D.C. 1976); United States v. Brown, 520 F.2d 1106, 1110 (D.C. Cir. 1975). The trial court's factual findings will be rejected only if they are plainly wrong or without evidence to support them. Graves, 490 A.2d at 1091; see Jones v. United States, 483 A.2d 1149, 1153 (D.C. 1984); Reid v. United States, 402 A.2d 835, 837 (D.C. 1979).

[3] Local decisions containing a significant analysis of the issues include Dickerson, 650 A.2d 680; Turner, 622 A.2d 667; Gayden v. United States, 584 A.2d 578 (D.C. 1990); Sanders v. United States, 550 A.2d 343 (D.C. 1988); Wynn v. United States, 538 A.2d 1139 (D.C. 1988); Townsend, 512 A.2d 994; Jackson v. United States, 503 A.2d 1225 (D.C. 1986); Graves, 490 A.2d 1086; Head v. United States, 451 A.2d 615 (D.C. 1982); Parks v. United States, 451 A.2d 591 (D.C. 1982); Tribble v. United States, 447 A.2d 766 (D.C. 1982); Turner v. United States, 443 A.2d 542 (D.C. 1982); United States v. Ellis, 408 A.2d 971 (D.C. 1979); Bethea v. United States, 395 A.2d 787 (D.C. 1978); and Branch v. United States, 372 A.2d 998 (D.C. 1977). The defendants prevailed in Ellis, Bethea, and Branch. The critical factors in Branch were the government's failure to provide an adequate justification for the 16-month delay, incarceration during eight of the sixteen months, and assertion of the right while incarcerated. Ellis (22-month delay) and Bethea emphasized the uncomplicated nature of the cases and the anxiety of the defendants awaiting trial in misdemeanor cases for extraordinarily long periods.

[4] United States v. Bolden, 381 A.2d 624 (D.C. 1977), found reversible error when the trial court overemphasized the delay and largely ignored the other three factors. But see Ellis, 408 A.2d 971 (a superficial analysis of the other three factors was found adequate where the twenty-two month delay was exceptionally long for a simple misdemeanor).

Right to Speedy Trial:

- ✓ Triggered by arrest, indictment, or other official accusation
- ✓ Factors used in determining if right is violated:
  - Length of delay
  - Reason for delay
  - Whether and how defendant asserted right
  - Prejudice to the defendant
- ✓ Remedy: dismissal without prejudice
  - Requires strong showing of prejudice

A. Length of the Delay

Although there is "no constitutional basis for holding that the speedy trial right can be quantified into a specified number of days or months," Barker, 407 U.S. at 523, the "length of the delay [is] to some extent a triggering mechanism" and, "[u]ntil there is some delay which is presumptively prejudicial, there is no necessity for inquiry into the other factors that go into the balance." Id. at 530; see also Doggett, 505 U.S. at 652.

Benchmarks for Delays: Courts in the District of Columbia have developed benchmarks for evaluating the delay's significance. A delay of over six months warrants inquiry and justification. Branch, 372 A.2d at 1000 n.3 (citing United States v. Ransom, 465 F.2d 672 (D.C. Cir. 1972)); United States v. Lara, 520 F.2d 460, 464 (D.C. Cir. 1975). But see United States v. Bolden, 381 A.2d 624, 627 (D.C. 1977) (further inquiry not required unless delay is presumptively prejudicial). A claim based on delay of a year or more has prima facie merit. See Doggett, 505 U.S. at 652 n.1; Gayden, 584 A.2d at 583; White v. United States, 484 A.2d 553, 557 (D.C. 1984); Head v. United States, 451 A.2d 615, 620 (1982); Glass v. United States, 395 A.2d 796, 801 (D.C. 1978); Bethea, 395 A.2d at 790. Prejudice to the defendant is presumed and a heavy burden shifts to the government to justify the delay. Bolden, 381 A.2d at 627; Branch, 372 A.2d at 1000; see also Miller v. United States, 479 A.2d 862, 866 (D.C. 1984).[5] "A delay of [one year], of course, does not conclusively establish a speedy trial claim; rather it requires that the court analyze the three remaining Barker factors to determine if reversal is warranted." Townsend, 512 A.2d at 998. Where the delay is less than one year, no presumption attaches. Towles v. United States, 428 A.2d 836, 842 (D.C. 1981), rev'd on other grounds, 496 A.2d 560 (D.C. 1985); see Reese v. United States, 467 A.2d 152, 159 (D.C. 1983); Hilton v. United States, 435 A.2d 383, 391 (D.C. 1981).

[5] But see Wright v. United States, 513 A.2d 804, 810 n.8 (D.C. 1986) (one year plus two weeks "barely enough" for a presumptive violation); Reed v. United States, 383 A.2d 316, 319 (D.C. 1978) ("one-year delay period is a simple rule of thumb" that "simply triggers review" and attaches "no 'evidentiary' presumption to the delay"); Bowman, 385 A.2d 28, 30 n.3 (D.C. 1978). Indeed, Bowman took notice of the overwhelming volume of criminal cases in the Superior Court in concluding that "the passage of more than 365 days from arrest to trial (a period which certainly has no talismanic constitutional significance) may become the rule rather than the exception." Id.

The burden on the government to justify the delay varies according to the length of the delay and the seriousness of the offense; the longer the delay, the heavier the government's burden to justify it. See Doggett, 505 U.S. at 652; (Tony) Turner, 622 A.2d at 675; Jackson, 503 A.2d at 1228; Graves, 490 A.2d at 1091; United States v. Rucker, 464 F.2d 823, 825 (D.C. Cir. 1972); Day v. United States, 390 A.2d 957, 970 (D.C. 1978), overruled in part by Graves, 490 A.2d at 1095.

Conversely, the more serious and complicated the offense, the longer the allowable delay. "[T]he delay that can be tolerated for an ordinary street crime is considerably less than for a serious, complex conspiracy charge." Barker, 407 U.S. at 531; Gayden, 584 A.2d at 583; Branch, 372 A.2d at 1000; see also Hartridge v. United States, 896 A.2d 198 (D.C. 2006) (seriousness of premeditated murder charge one factor in finding no speedy trial right violation for 27 month delay); Akins v. United States, 679 A.2d 1017, 1024 (1996). Thus, in ordering dismissal in Bethea, the court relied heavily on the "uncomplicated nature of the case;" a nineteen-month delay in a simple misdemeanor "weigh[ed] heavily in favor of dismissal." 395 A.2d at 791; see Ellis, 408 A.2d 971 (D.C. 1979). Yet the court has frequently cautioned against placing undue weight on time alone without giving adequate consideration to the other factors. See, e.g., Akins, 679 A.2d at 1024 (court found no delay where the defendant was tried on the second scheduled trial date); Warren v. United States, 436 A.2d 821 (D.C. 1981).

2014 Supplement

Diggs v. United States*, 28 A.3d 585 (D.C. 2011). Seven-year delay between homicide and commencement of trial did not violate defendant's right to speedy trial where defendant's claims of prejudice were too speculative to show actual prejudice to his defense and where no showing was made that police acted with improper motivation or recklessness in not arresting defendant in a timely manner.

B. Reasons for the Delay

1. Delay Attributable to the Government

"[C]losely related to length of delay is the reason the government assigns to justify the delay . . . [D]ifferent weights should be assigned to different reasons." Barker, 407 U.S. at 531. The party responsible for the delay and the party's motivations are key elements. "[W]henever the government's action at any stage of the proceedings indicates bad faith, neglect or a purpose to secure delay itself or some other procedural advantage, the resulting delay is not justified." Lara, 520 F.2d at 464 (quoting United States v. Bishton, 463 F.2d 887, 890 (D.C. Cir. 1972); see also United States v. Perkins, 374 A.2d 882, 883-84 (D.C. 1977).

Intentional Delays: In Graves, the en banc Court of Appeals "refined the analysis" by dividing delay attributable to the government into three categories: intentional, neutral, and "significant." Id. at 1092. Intentional delay on the part of the government to: (1) hamper the defense; (2) gain some tactical advantage; or (3) harass the defendant cannot be justified. Barker, 407 U.S. at 531 n.32.

Neutral Delays: In contrast, delays caused by crowded court dockets and other institutional delays are assessed against the government but weigh less heavily in the balance. Id. at 531; see Sanders, 550 A.2d at 346; Warren, 436 A.2d at 834; Perkins, 374 A.2d at 883-84. Although such delays are attributable to the government, they are "neutral" and "may be easily out-weighed by an inadequate assertion of the speedy trial right or a low threshold of prejudice." Bethea, 395 A.2d at 791; see also Long v. United States, 910 A.2d 298, 303 (D.C. 2006); Akins, 679 A.2d at 1023; Gayden, 584 A.2d at 584; Head v. United States, 451 A.2d 615, 620-21 (D.C. 1982). Some neutral delays are given slightly more or less weight, which Graves termed "neutral +" or "neutral -." 490 A.2d at 1097 n.12; see also Turner, 622 A.2d at 677.

Significant Delays: Between intentional and neutral delays are "significant" delays for actions less culpable than deliberate foot-dragging to gain tactical advantage, but more culpable than the neutral category exemplified by failure to advance trial dates due to court congestion. Graves, 490 A.2d at 1092 (citing examples of "significant" delay); see also Hartridge, 896 A.2d at 210 (delay caused by government's desire for joinder of all defendants in the same proceeding is not neutral but does not weigh heavily against the government); Akins, 679 A.2d at 1023-24; Gayden, 584 A.2d at 583-84.

Furthermore,

> the passing of a considerable length of time, especially after an accused has asserted his speedy trial right, should motivate the government to seek a prompt trial. If the government fails to take the necessary steps to effect an immediate trial, then the delay must be accorded substantial weight in the speedy trial calculus.

Bethea, 395 A.2d at 791-92 (citation omitted). These categories are not rigid rules but "rough benchmarks to guide analysis." Graves, 490 A.2d at 1092.

The weight to be assigned to the government's negligent delay is assessed in relationship to the prejudice to the defendant's ability to present a defense. "[T]he weight we assign to official negligence compounds over time as the presumption of evidentiary prejudice grows." Doggett, 505 U.S. at 657.

2014 Supplement

Ward v. United States*, 55 A.3d 840 (D.C. 2012). In determining whether defendant was denied right to speedy trial, court employed a balancing test in which it did not weigh heavily against government the 33-month delay in bringing case to trial, even though shooting death seemed a simple offense, because government was investigating defendant's drug dealing and other possible RICO charges.

2. Delay Attributable to Defense

Delay caused by the defendant is excluded from the calculus. See Long, 910 A.2d at 303 (seeking new counsel and requesting continuance); Turner, 622 A.2d at 676; Sanders, 550 A.2d at 346 (seeking new counsel and taking interlocutory appeal); Wynn, 538 A.2d at 1142-43 (delay required by appointing new counsel at defendant's request); Cates v. United States, 379 A.2d 968, 972 (D.C. 1977); Chatman v. United States, 377 A.2d 1155, 1157 n.3 (D.C. 1977) (defense request for continuance).[6] Delay caused by actions of appointed counsel is attributed to defendant, not to the state, with the exception of cases evincing a "systemic breakdown in the public defender system." Vermont v. Brillon, 129 S. Ct. 1283, 1292 (2009) (internal quotations omitted). Delays due to change in appointed counsel might in some cases be charged to government, but not where changes came at request of defendant. Id. Mutually agreed upon continuances may also be disregarded. United States v. Calhoun, 363 A.2d 277, 280 n.3 (D.C. 1976). Furthermore, acquiescence in delay generally, evidenced by failure to object to continuances or to demand a speedy trial on such occasions, will result in minimal weight being accorded to the delay. Reed, 383 A.2d at 319; see also Head, 451 A.2d at 621.

Assessing delay attributable to a co-defendant is more difficult. Because joinder is initially within the discretion of the prosecution and is a procedural device designed primarily to further the government's interest in "economy and efficiency," Davis v. United States, 367 A.2d 1254, 1263 (D.C. 1976), delays caused by a co-defendant are not properly chargeable to the defendant. However, where a co-defendant becomes unavailable for trial, and the government desires joinder, the delay by a co-defendant does not weigh heavily against the government. See Hartridge, 896 A.2d at 210; Adams v. United States, 466 A.2d 439 (D.C. 1983). If there is no objection or request to sever, the delays caused by a co-defendant will be charged to the defendant. See (Jewel) Turner, 443 A.2d at 546. To protect the record when the co-defendant requests the continuance, counsel should request a severance so that the trial against the defendant may begin immediately. In Townsend, the government's investigation of the case against a co-defendant, and its desire to try the defendants jointly, caused a ten-month delay between arrest and indictment. 512 A.2d 994. The court held that the "proffered reason does not excuse the delay [n]or render it neutral" but added that, because it was not intended to gain a strategic advantage over the defendant himself, the time did not weigh heavily against the government. Id. at 999.

2014 Supplement

Silver v. United States*, 73 A.3d 1022 (D.C. 2013). No violation of right to speedy trial where 14 months of 22-month delay between indictment and trial were attributable to defendant who during that time requested three continuances, refused to comply with court orders to submit to writing exemplars pretrial, changed attorneys, and failed to appear for a trial date.

---

[6] In United States v. Calloway, 505 F.2d 311 (D.C. Cir. 1974), appellant requested and the court ordered a pre-trial mental examination. Delay in completing the examination and filing the report caused the trial date to be postponed for more than three months. Because the trial court ordered the report completed at a specified date that would have required no delay in the trial, and the actual delay in completing the report was not appellant's fault, the court held that even though appellant requested the examination, the delay should not be attributed to him. Id. at 316. On the other hand, delays that mental examinations cause "are not normally taken into account for purposes of determining the question of a denial of speedy trial since a principal cause of postponement [is] the deliberate pace of the system of safeguards designed to protect the accused." Shreeves v. United States, 395 A.2d 774, 784 (D.C. 1978). In spite of Shreeves, the issue of excessive delay that a court-ordered mental examination causes has not been carefully examined, and it appears that under appropriate facts, Calloway's rationale might be followed.

3. Pre-trial Appellate Delay

Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. at 314, specifically adopted the four-factor Barker analysis to determine "the extent to which appellate time consumed in the review of pre-trial motions should weigh towards a defendant's speedy trial claim." Delay from reasonable interlocutory appeals does not weigh heavily against the government. Id. at 315. In determining the reasonableness of an appeal, courts may look to the strength of the government's position and the importance of the issue, with the result that delay from a frivolous appeal will weigh heavily against the government. Id. at 315; cf. Gayden, 584 A.2d at 584 (delay not weighed heavily against government in part because of importance of issue appealed, even though government ultimately lost appeal). Additionally, the crime should be serious enough to justify the restraint imposed on defendant while awaiting the outcome of the appeal. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S at 316.

Because D.C. Code § 23-104(e) and Rule 4-III(a) require the government to expedite its interlocutory appeals, any unreasonable delay resulting from failure to expedite an appeal will be weighed "heavily" against the government. Sell v. United States, 525 A.2d 1017, 1023 (D.C. 1987). In Sell, fifty-one months elapsed between indictment and trial. The government failed to move to expedite either of its two interlocutory appeals or the remand from one of the appeals. The trial court found that each appeal should have taken six months rather than the one year each consumed. The Court of Appeals accepted that analysis and "heavily" charged the additional six months for each appeal to the government. Sell, 525 A.2d at 1022-23.

Delay resulting from a successful defense appeal from a conviction is not analyzed under the Sixth Amendment at all rather, the "proper evaluative frame-work is due process, not speedy trial." Alston, 412 A.2d at 354 (en banc). But see Warren, 436 A.2d 821. When Fifth Amendment due process analysis is applied, the outcome turns on a single factor: prejudice to the defendant. Specifically, the trial court must: "(1) evaluate the impact of the appeal period on the appellant;" then, if it determines that the "impact has been prejudicial, the court shall (2) decide whether the relationship between (a) the nature and severity of the prejudice and (b) the government's alleged responsibility for it by delaying the appeal, warrants dismissal of the information or indictment under the Fifth Amendment." Alston, 412 A.2d at 359 (ordering indictment reinstated).

Pre-trial Delay:

- ✓ Counsel should move for severance and immediate trial if a co-defendant requests a continuance (any delay caused by co-defendant's continuance may be counted against the client)
- ✓ Counsel should pay attention to docket entries
- ✓ Counsel should verify that the entries on the court jacket accurately reflect that the defense announced "ready" when a case was being continued and, where appropriate, that the defendant demanded a speedy trial or a severance from a co-defendant who had moved for a continuance (these should also be recorded in counsel's file so that the appropriate transcripts can be ordered in the event of appeal)

C. Assertion of the Right

The defendant must assert the right to a speedy trial. While failure to demand a speedy trial does not waive the right, early assertion carries "strong evidentiary weight" in subsequent litigation. Barker, 407 U.S. at 531; Head, 451 A.2d at 621. A delay in asserting the right, on the other hand, makes it "difficult for a defendant to prove that he was denied a speedy trial." 407 U.S. at 532. Delays in the absence of a speedy trial demand carry less weight than delays that follow assertion of the right. See Glass, 395 A.2d at 802; see also Moore v. United States, 675 A.2d 71, 75 (1996).

Counsel should demand a speedy trial early and often during the case. Courts will consider both the frequency and the force of the defendant's objections to delays, Barker, 407 U.S. at 528-29, giving tardy or less-than-explicit demands for a speedy trial less weight. See Dickerson, 650 A.2d at 685 (explicit speedy trial right assertion only upon appeal after 24-month delay); Sanders, 550 A.2d at 346 (demand made 21 months after arrest); Jackson, 503 A.2d at 1228 (no violation where motion to dismiss was filed 11 months after arrest); Miller, 479 A.2d at 866 (motion almost a year after arrest, and only a month before scheduled trial); Ball v. United States, 429 A.2d 1353, 1356-57 (D.C. 1981) (demand made 17 months after arrest and three days before trial).[7]

Counsel must make clear that the remedy sought is a speedy trial, not dismissal or release from detention. Although the judicial remedy for a completed violation of the speedy trial right is dismissal of charges, the constitutional guarantee is designed to protect defendants from unreasonable delays during prosecution, not from prosecution itself. Thus, courts will consider whether "a defendant has made merely pro forma objections or motions . . . or really seeks a prompt trial." Graves, 490 A.2d at 1098; see also Akins, 679 A.2d at 1024 (assertion of right to trial found explicit, not pro forma). Assertions that do not show a strong desire for a speedy trial receive less evidentiary weight. See Lemon v. United States, 564 A.2d 1368, 1378 (D.C. 1989) (demands made with more circumspection than zeal not as forceful as a direct request for a trial); Bolden, 381 A.2d at 628 (little indication of a strong desire for a speedy trial weakens speedy trial claim); Graves, 490 A.2d at 1101 (passivity during government's pre-trial appeal and failure to move for prompt trial as an alternative to dismissal weakened speedy trial claim).

Demands for a prompt trial must be explicit. The fact that a defendant is incarcerated, for example, does not weigh as heavily as an actual demand for a speedy trial. Graves, 490 A.2d at 1098-99.[8] Merely oral, indirect assertions of speedy trial right, or assertions prompted by judge rather than defendant, are accorded less weight than direct, written assertions of right. See Hartridge, 896 A.2d at 210-11. Motions for release, without further indication that a defendant

[7] See also Reed, 383 A.2d at 318-19 (objections to continuances were not effective speedy trial demands and delays after objections thus received less weight than if a demand had been made); Howard v. United States, 473 A.2d 835, 840 (D.C. 1984) (defendant waited fourteen months after arrest to demand a speedy trial); Taylor v. United States, 471 A.2d 999, 1002 (D.C. 1983) (delay of 22 months between arrest and assertion of right diminished weight given to assertion).

[8] Incarceration does not put the government on notice that the defendant desires a speedy trial where the detention is due to parole revocation, Jefferson v. United States, 382 A.2d 1030 (D.C. 1978), or to the pendency of other criminal charges, Bridgeford v. United States, 411 A.2d 633, 635 n.3 (D.C. 1980).

wants a speedy trial, also receive minimal weight as assertions of the right. They manifest a desire for immediate release, but not for a prompt trial. Graves, 490 A.2d at 1099. Acquiescence to a motion for a continuance by prosecution or a co-defendant may weigh against a defendant's speedy trial claim. Hartridge, 896 A.2d at 211. However, mere objections to continuances, like motions for dismissal that are unaccompanied by a request for immediate trial, receive less weight than explicit speedy trial demands. See Dickerson, 650 A.2d at 685; Turner, 622 A.2d at 678; Miller, 479 A.2d at 866.[9]

Counsel must be particularly diligent when a client who is not incarcerated wants a speedy trial. The government is not charged with knowledge that a defendant on release seeks a prompt trial unless the defendant makes this interest known. Day, 390 A.2d at 970. Indeed, absent a demand, the prosecution may assume that the defendant is "satisfied with the pace of litigation and not concerned with possible prejudice to his defense." Strickland v. United States, 389 A.2d 1325, 1331 (D.C. 1978). Courts look with disfavor upon defendants at liberty who do not demand a speedy trial until it appears tactically that they might succeed on a motion to dismiss due to the age of the case. See, e.g., Campbell v. United States, 391 A.2d 283, 286 (D.C. 1978).

Counsel must be careful not to undermine a client's ability to assert the right to a speedy trial, as the courts will look at the defendant's overall conduct. For example, perfunctory assertions carry less weight than demands showing concern with delays in the prosecution. Bethea, 395 A.2d at 792. Indisputably frivolous motions and petitions that contribute to delays will also undermine speedy trial claims. Loud Hawk, 474 U.S. at 314-15. Similarly, counsel must not appear to acquiesce to continuances where denial of a speedy trial is a concern.

[9] Indeed, an assertion of the right itself receives little weight when not made promptly. Courts consider delays unaccompanied by an assertion as probative of the defendant's lack of anxiety and concern with the case. Smith v. United States, 379 A.2d 1166, 1167 (D.C. 1977).

Assertion of the Right:

In arguing a motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds and raising the issue on appeal, the record is of paramount importance. Counsel must take care to protect the record by asserting the right at the earliest opportunity and renewing the claim often throughout the litigation. A speedy trial demand should be made at arraignment and renewed at each status call or continued trial date. Counsel should not lightly acquiesce in continuances because such acquiescence may ultimately require discounting of the affected time in the computation of delay.

When objecting to a continuance, counsel should move for an immediate or prompt trial. Counsel must explicitly request a speedy trial rather than dismissal of the charges or release from incarceration.

- ✓ Counsel should demand a speedy trial early and often during the case
- ✓ Counsel must make clear that remedy sought is speedy trial, not dismissal or release
- ✓ Demands for a prompt trial should be explicit
- ✓ Absent a demand, prosecution may assume defendant is satisfied with the pace

D. Prejudice

Factors: Prejudice is assessed in terms of the interests that the speedy trial right is designed to protect: (1) preventing oppressive pre-trial incarceration; (2) minimizing the defendant's anxiety and concern with the outcome of the case; and (3) limiting the possibility that the defense will be impaired.[10] Of these interests, the last is characterized as the most serious. Barker, 407 U.S. at 532.

Pre-trial incarceration may be oppressive even where commitment results from an unrelated criminal conviction. Delays in bringing the new charge to trial "may ultimately result in as much oppression as is suffered by one who is jailed without bail upon an untried charge." (Richard) Smith v. Hooey, 393 U.S. 374, 378 (1969). Prejudice results from the reduced possibility of serving concurrent sentences, decreased likelihood of parole due to the untried charges, increased anxiety from the pending charges, and difficulties in presenting a defense while incarcerated. Day, 390 A.2d at 972. Prejudice may also exist where delays render a defendant ineligible for sentencing under the Youth Rehabilitation Act, D.C. Code § 24-901(b). Dickerson, 650 A.2d at 686; Alston, 412 A.2d 351. Similarly, loss of employment and disruption of family life due to pre-trial incarceration can constitute prejudice. See Graves, 490 A.2d at 1105 (25-month incarceration not overwhelmingly prejudicial, though near the limit of constitutionality, where defendant was single and unemployed).[11]

[10] The prosecution may delay the trial of one defendant until another defendant is available to testify as a government witness. Crowder v. United States, 383 A.2d 336, 339-40 (D.C. 1978). Other results of a delay that expand or strengthen the prosecution do not present cognizable prejudice, unless a defendant presents some evidence that the government sought the delay for that purpose. Perkins v. United States, 473 A.2d 841, 844 n.3 (D.C. 1984).

Personal anxiety and concern with a pending case must have a specific impact on the defendant's "health or personal or business affairs." Gayden, 584 A.2d at 585 (quoting Graves, 490 A.2d at 1104). A mere assertion that one has been upset or concerned is not sufficient. Reed, 383 A.2d at 320; see also Moore v. United States, 675 A.2d at 75. A demand for a speedy trial adds weight to a claim of anxiety. See Miller, 479 A.2d at 867 (defendant's decision to go to trial without a defense witness shows he was suffering considerable anxiety from the delay). However, the individual circumstances ultimately determine whether or not anxiety is present. In Akins, 679 A.2d at 1017, for instance, the court attributed the defendant's anxiety to the fact that he was already incarcerated on another charge. Id. at 1024. In Sell, however, the defendant showed anxiety and prejudice where the charges were the only blemishes on a spotless employment record, the resulting stress required him to take sick leave, he was suspended from his job and could not find similar employment, began to drink heavily and use tranquilizers, started to see a psychiatrist, experienced marital problems, and was denied the opportunity to adopt a child as a result of the pending case.[12]

Impairment of the defense is the most serious type of prejudice because it "skews the fairness of the entire system." Barker, 407 U.S. at 532.

> [E]xcessive delay presumptively compromises the reliability of a trial in ways that neither party can prove or, for that matter, identify. While such presumptive prejudice cannot alone carry a Sixth Amendment claim without regard to the other Barker criteria, it is part of the mix of relevant facts, and its importance increases with the length of the delay.

Doggett, 505 U.S. at 655 (citation omitted).

A showing of actual prejudice is not required if the length of delay is presumptively prejudicial, in which case the burden shifts to the government to rebut the presumption of prejudice:

> When the government's negligence thus causes delay six times as long as that generally sufficient to trigger judicial review . . . and when the presumption of prejudice, albeit unspecified, is neither extenuated, as by the defendant's acquiescence, . . . nor persuasively rebutted, the defendant is entitled to relief.

Id. at 658.[13]

[11] A parole detainer also diminished the prejudice from pre-trial incarceration. Graves, 490 A.2d at 1104. Nor can prejudice be presumed where the defendant is incarcerated as a result of parole revocation, not the pending case. Jefferson, 382 A.2d at 1033.

[12] See also Bolden, 381 A.2d at 629 (defendant suffered little additional apprehension, anxiety, or community suspicion from a pending misdemeanor charge where he was also pending trial on a felony); United States v. Clark, 376 A.2d 434, 436 (D.C. 1977) (defendant must assert or show specific instances that the delay weighed heavily on him if prejudice is based on strain of being under indictment and facing a lengthy prison term).

[13] But see United States v. Taylor, 497 F.3d 673, 677-78 (D.C. Cir. 2007) (denying speedy trial claim where actual prejudice not shown and delay barely exceeds one year presumptive prejudice threshold); Hartridge, 896 A.2d at

In Doggett, the defendant left the country unaware that he was being indicted. The government made no effort to find him for more than eight years, though he had lived in the United States for six of those years. Pointing to the inverse relationship between protracted government negligence "and its consequent threat to the fairness of the accused's trial," the Supreme Court dismissed the charges. Id. at 657-58.

While "consideration of prejudice is not limited to the specifically demonstrable, and . . . affirmative proof of particularized prejudice is not essential to every speedy trial claim," id. at 655, counsel should be prepared to show as specifically as possible that the injuries are substantial and not mere speculation. See, e.g., Ferguson v. United States, 977 A.2d 993 (2009); Lemon, 564 A.2d at 1379; Asbell v. United States, 436 A.2d 804, 814 (D.C. 1981); Glass, 395 A.2d at 802; Head, 451 A.2d at 622. Counsel must make concrete proffers about the existence of missing witnesses and their testimony. Taylor, 471 A.2d at 1003; Reese, 467 A.2d at 160; Akins, 679 A.2d at 1024.[14] Failure to alert court pre-trial regarding defense's intention to call a particular witness at trial may weigh against a finding of prejudice to defense if witness is later unavailable due to delay. See Hill v. U.S., 959 A.2d 702, 712 (D.C. 2008). In Parker, the Court of Appeals found that "the government's unreadiness for trial on two occasions in a fairly uncomplicated case spanning twenty-one months between arrest and trial [gave them] substantial pause, at least enough to require careful attention to appellant's claim of prejudice from the delay." Parker, 745 A.2d at 937. The defendant argued that the unavailability of two defense witnesses was the result of the government's previous voluntary dismissals, and the court stated that "[i]f that assertion were true, there would be real substance to his speedy trial claim." Id. The court, however, found that the witnesses' unavailability was ultimately of the defendant's own making and held that, "[a]fter balancing the Barker factors, . . . appellant was not denied his right to a speedy trial. The delay of twenty-one months, even taxing the government significantly with eleven months of it, is not sizeable enough to warrant dismissal without evidence of prejudice not apparent on this record." Id.

Counsel must show that the delay in bringing the case to trial, not the failure to preserve previously available evidence, prejudiced the defense. See Gayden, 584 A.2d at 585 (no relevant prejudice from destruction of policeman's notes five and one half months after arrest where trial was 45 months after arrest); Wynn v. United States, 386 A.2d 695, 697 n.8 (D.C. 1978). Thus, to substantiate claims of prejudice from the delay, counsel must maintain contact with witnesses during the pendency of a case, Sell, 525 A.2d at 1026, and make a detailed record of the witnesses' recollection shortly after the incident. (Charles) Smith, 379 A.2d at 1167.[15]

211-13 (distinguishing Doggett based on lack of "serious fault" by government and requiring affirmative showing of prejudice even though 27-month delay presumptively prejudicial); Turner, 622 A.2d at 679 (distinguishing Doggett and denying a speedy trial claim based in part on appellant's inability to show prejudice).

[14] It is frequently difficult to assess how delay affects the ability to present a defense. The impact on the witnesses' recollection is often unknown until they testify at trial. Thus, counsel should renew the speedy trial motion after trial if prejudice to the defense becomes evident. See United States v. MacDonald, 435 U.S. 850 (1978).

[15] These requirements put defense counsel in a bind. No prejudice would result from the passage of time if a witness's memory is preserved. However, a speedy trial claim will also fail if counsel does not take reasonable steps to record a witness's recollection. Nonetheless, preservation is the safest route because only then can the issue be argued. Furthermore, counsel can argue that past recollection recorded in a written statement is not as effective as testimony based on current recollection. Counsel should be mindful of potential reverse-Jencks considerations.

Prejudice:

- ✓ Counsel must show that delay in bringing case to trial prejudiced the defendant
- ✓ To substantiate claims of prejudice counsel should maintain contact with witnesses during pendency of the case and keep detailed records of witnesses' recollection shortly after incident, and maintain
- ✓ A showing of prejudice is essential, and counsel's proffers of prejudice must be concrete and specific. This showing may include the personal anxiety inflicted on the client, but must include a specific impact on the defendant's health or personal affairs. Even more importantly, counsel should proffer specific ways in which the delay has prejudiced the defense (e.g., unavailability of witnesses, etc.)

PRACTICE TIP:

If the trial court grants a speedy trial motion, counsel should request that the court make complete findings of fact on each of the Barker factors. The Court of Appeals will not review de novo speedy trial claims where the trial court makes proper findings that have support in the record, Reid, 402 A.2d at 837; see D.C. Code § 17-305(a), even if the record in support of the trial court's decision is rather thin, see, e.g., Ellis, 408 A.2d 971 (D.C. 1979).

II. THE DUE PROCESS CLAUSE

Although the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial does not apply to delay prior to official accusation through indictment or arrest, the defendant may still "invoke due process to challenge the delay both before and after official accusation." Doggett, 505 U.S. at 655 n.2. References to "speedy trial" in this section are thus descriptive only and do not refer to the Sixth Amendment.

The Due Process Clause requires a showing of "actual prejudice." Marion, 404 U.S. 307. Actual prejudice makes the due process claim "concrete and ripe for adjudication, not . . . automatically valid." United States v. Lovasco, 431 U.S. 783, 789 (1977). Pre-indictment delay due to the prosecution's further investigation of the case "does not deprive [the defendant] of due process, even if his defense might have been somewhat prejudiced by the lapse of time." Id. at 796. The Court reasoned that investigative delay is unlike delay undertaken "to gain tactical advantage over the accused" because it is not as one-sided. Id. at 795. Full investigation serves the interests of justice and often those of the putative defendant, and thus fulfills rather than violates the requirements of the Due Process Clause. Id. at 795-96; see Johnson v. United States, 434 A.2d 415 (D.C. 1981); (Albert B.) Smith v. United States, 414 A.2d 1189 (D.C. 1980).

If the prosecution can provide a legitimate "investigative" justification for pre-indictment delay, Lovasco eviscerates the due process claim. See Day, 697 A.2d at 34. Further, if the prosecution has an investigative justification for dismissing initial charges for lack of evidence and later indicts the defendant on the same charges, the intervening period of delay will not be held against the government in a speedy trial analysis. But where such "neutral" reasons are not proffered and supported by the record, the Due Process Clause protects the defendant from prejudicial delay. See, e.g., United States v. Morrison, 518 F. Supp. 917 (S.D.N.Y. 1981).

"To prevail on his claim that he was denied a fair trial, appellant must show at a minimum that he was actually prejudiced and that the government's reasons for the delay were unjustified." Robinson v. United States, 478 A.2d 1065, 1066 (D.C. 1984) (citations omitted). See United States v. Donaldson, 451 A.2d 51, 56 (D.C. 1982) (accused must show substantial prejudice to the right to a fair trial and that delay was an intentional device to gain tactical advantage). Even where the government offers no neutral reason for pre-indictment delay, a court may decline to find the delay unjustified where it cannot ascribe to the government any "unseemly motives." Asbell, 436 A.2d at 812.

The issue of pre-arrest delay often arises in the context of arrests following the "surfacing" of an undercover narcotics agent, sometimes many months after the alleged sale that forms the basis of the charges. Ross v. United States, 349 F.2d 210 (D.C. Cir. 1965), held that a seven-month delay between a defendant's alleged sale of narcotics to an undercover officer and his arrest mandated reversal of the conviction. The only evidence against the defendant was the testimony of the undercover officer, based upon his notes rather than present recollection, and the defendant's proffered mistaken identification defense could not be bolstered with an alibi because he had no recollection of his activities on the date of the offense. Under these circumstances, prejudice to the defendant mandated dismissal of the indictment on due process grounds, even though the government brought the case well within the statute of limitations. See also Woody v. United States, 370 F.2d 214 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

The principle of Ross, however, has been closely circumscribed in subsequent cases, and retains little precedential value. See Harrison v. United States, 528 A.2d 1238, 1240-41 (D.C. 1987) ("to the extent that Ross is inconsistent with Lovasco and Marion, it can no longer be reliably cited as authority"). In cases decided since Ross, the District of Columbia Circuit has emphasized the necessity of balancing the reasonableness of the delay against prejudice to the accused. See, e.g., United States v. Rippy, 606 F.2d 1150 (D.C. Cir. 1979); United States v. Jones, 524 F.2d 834 (D.C. Cir. 1975). The court in recent cases has been much more willing to find a pre-arrest delay "reasonable" in the context of delayed prosecution of undercover narcotics buys.

Robinson, 478 A.2d at 1067 n.1, distinguished Ross on the facts and also questioned its precedential value in light of the Supreme Court's pronouncement "that prosecution following investigative delay is not a denial of due process even if the defense has been 'somewhat prejudiced by the lapse of time'" (quoting Lovasco, 431 U.S. at 796). Robinson noted that in Ross, the delay was found to be "purposeful" and the defendant was "continually available for arrest." 478 A.2d at 1067 n.1. In Robinson, such factors as the undercover officers' desire to purchase a greater quantity of narcotics from the suspect in an effort to identify suppliers in the distributive chain, and their inability to identify and locate the suspect despite their continuing efforts to do so, indicated that the delay was not intentional, reckless, or negligent. In Day, 697 A.2d at 31, the Court of Appeals clarified its holding in Robinson in which it found that, in the absence of severe prejudice, a defendant cannot prevail on a due process claim for post-arrest delay when the government conduct is "'negligent, but not reckless or intentional.'" Id. at 34 (quoting Robinson, 478 A.2d at 1066) (internal quotations omitted). The court held that "[u]nder Robinson, the legal equivalent of intentional delay would have to be recklessness." Id. at 34. Inability to recall one's whereabouts on the date in question is not likely to provide a sufficient basis for dismissal. See, e.g., Rippy, 606 F.2d at 1153; Robinson, 478 A.2d at 1067 (defendant's "general assertion that he cannot remember where he was on the day of the heroin transaction is not a definite enough showing of prejudice to warrant reversal"). The court in Robinson, however, noted that the defendant did not testify, whereas the defendant in Ross actually testified that he was unable to remember where he was on the day of the offense charged. 478 A.2d at 1067 n.1. But cf. Harrison, 528 A.2d at 1240 (no prejudice even though defendant testified, denied participation in drug transactions, but maintained no recollection of activities on the dates when the transactions occurred).

The "rough rule of thumb" giving prima facie merit to a claim of prejudice where the delay exceeds four months, see Jones, 524 F.2d at 840-41, also seems to have been abandoned. To prevail, the defendant must make a strong showing of a likelihood of prejudicial misidentification resulting from the delay. See Robinson, 478 A.2d at 1067 (no indication that delay posed a significant danger of misidentification where identification was based on three daylight encounters and procedure was not suggestive); Harrison, 528 A.2d at 1240 ("risk of misidentification was negligible" where undercover officer made purchases from defendant on three separate occasions and saw defendant on the street almost every day after final purchase, and defendant had an unusual scar on his chest).

Due Process Clause:

- ✓ Can challenge delays both before and after official accusation
- ✓ Requires a showing of actual prejudice

III. INTERSTATE AGREEMENT ON DETAINERS

The Interstate Agreement on Detainers (IAD),[16] D.C. Code §§ 24-801 to 805, was enacted to secure speedy trials for prisoners in one party state who have charges pending in another member jurisdiction. D.C. Code § 24-801, Art. I. Expeditious disposition of these cases seeks to eliminate uncertainties that interfere with prisoner rehabilitation programs. Kleinbart v. United [16] Almost every state has adopted the IAD. The agreement benefits all defendants in the District of Columbia, whether prosecuted by the Corporation Counsel or the United States Attorney. United States v. Bailey, 495 A.2d 756, 764 (D.C. 1985).

States, 426 A.2d 343, 356 n.12 (D.C. 1981), rev'd on other grounds, 553 A.2d 1236 (1989). Defendants waive speedy trial rights under IAD by voluntarily pleading guilty, Moore v. United States, 724 A.2d 1198, 1199 (D.C. 1999). Defendants benefit from the IAD's speedy trial rights only after the jurisdiction where the charges are pending (receiving state) lodges a detainer (e.g., an arrest warrant) based on those charges with the jurisdiction where the defendant is incarcerated (sending state). See Felix v. United States, 508 A.2d 101, 107 (D.C. 1986); (Albert F.) Smith v. United States, 470 A.2d 315, 318-19 (D.C. 1983); Bean v. United States, 409 A.2d 1064, 1065 (D.C. 1979). A defendant's rights under IAD are implicated only if she is "serving a term of imprisonment." See D.C. Code § 24-801; see also Moore, 724 A.2d at 1199 (IAD not applicable to defendant who was pre-trial detainee in Maryland, and transferred between jurisdictions prior to sentencing in Maryland).[17]

The IAD does not apply when the defendant's presence is secured solely by issuance of a writ of habeas corpus ad prosequendum. See United States v. Mauro, 436 U.S. 340 (1978). Articles III and IV of the IAD impose different time limitations, depending on whether or not a defendant demands a speedy trial. Failure to meet these restrictions results in dismissal of pending cases with prejudice. D.C. Code § 24-801, Art. III(d), Art. IV(e). These time requirements toll whenever the court with jurisdiction over the case finds that the prisoner is unable to stand trial. Art. VI(A).

Article III(a) applies if the prisoner requests transfer. The receiving state must bring the prisoner to trial within 180 days of receipt of notice by the demanding jurisdiction of the request for disposition, absent a continuance for good cause shown. Art. III(a); see also Fields v. United States, 698 A.2d 485 (D.C. 1997) (finding 180-day requirement not triggered if request gets lost in mail or is never delivered to 'receiving' state). The burden is on the defendant, however, to submit the request in writing to the warden of the facility where the defendant is confined. The warden must then forward the request to the authorities responsible for prosecuting the case in the District. D.C. Code § 24-801, Art. III(b); see Bailey, 495 A.2d at 759.

Article IV applies when transfer is made at the government's request. The receiving state must then take the prisoner to trial within 120 days after the transfer. D.C. Code § 24-801, Art. IV(a), (c). The defendant, however, must assert before trial that a speedy trial violation has occurred. Haigler v. United States, 531 A.2d 1236, 1238 (D.C. 1987).

Counsel should review the IAD carefully because violation of the provisions may result in dismissal of the charges. See Haigler, 531 A.2d 1236 (case dismissed with prejudice). Other cases exploring issues that arise under the IAD include Alabama v. Bozeman, 533 U.S. 146 (2001) (provision prohibiting return of prisoner to sending state before trial completed is absolute and cannot be disregarded even if deemed harmless or de minimus); Carchman v. Nash, 473 U.S. 716 (1985); Cuyler v. Adams, 449 U.S. 433 (1981) (right to pre-transfer hearing where transfer at the request of the government); *Baylor v. [17] Mere notice of a pending criminal charge is insufficient to invoke the provision of the IAD. For example, a warrant given to police in the sending state, not to corrections authorities, and at the request of officials in the sending state, rather than the receiving state, is not a detainer within the meaning of the IAD. Tucker v. United States, 569 A.2d 162, 166 (D.C. 1990).

Counsel should review IAD because violation of the provisions may result in dismissal.

CHAPTER 19

JOINDER AND SEVERANCE

When a client is charged with two or more crimes, or when there are co-defendants, counsel should consider a motion for relief from improper joinder and/or severance. Counsel should first consider whether the offenses or defendants are properly joined for trial under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 8. Even if joinder is proper, it may still unduly prejudice the client, thereby supporting a motion for severance under Super. Ct. Crim. R. 14.[1]

I. JOINDER UNDER RULE 8

Joinder of offenses and defendants is governed by Super. Ct. Crim. R. 8:

> (a) Joinder of Offenses. Two or more offenses may be charged in the same indictment or information in a separate count for each offense if the offenses charged, whether felonies or misdemeanors, or both, are of the same or similar character or are based on the same act or transaction or on 2 or more acts or transactions connected together or constituting parts of a common scheme or plan.
> (b) Joinder of Defendants.[2] Two or more defendants may be charged in the same indictment or information if they are alleged to have participated in the same act or transaction or in the same series of acts or transactions constituting an offense or offenses. Such defendants may be charged in 1 or more counts together or separately and all of the defendants need not be charged in each count.

Rule 8(a) governs joinder of offenses only when a single defendant is charged. This is the case even where a single defendant was originally charged as a co-defendant. Loukas v. United States, 702 A.2d 681 (D.C. 1997). In co-defendant cases, the more stringent Rule 8(b) standards govern joinder of defendants and offenses. See Loukas at 682; (Marvin) Taylor v. United States, 603 A.2d 451, 455 (D.C. 1992), cert. denied by Jones v. United States, 506 U.S. 852 (1992); Settles v. United States, 522 A.2d 348, 352 (D.C. 1987) (Settles I); Ray v. United States, 472 A.2d 854, 857 (D.C. 1984). Rule 8(a) permits joinder of similar offenses, offenses committed in a single act or transaction, or a series of offenses that are sufficiently connected to each other. Rule 8(b) permits joinder of transactionally related offenses only; similarity is insufficient. See, e.g., Byrd v. United States, 551 A.2d 96, 99 (D.C. 1988), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 968 (1989), Morris v. United States, 548 A.2d 1383, 1387 (D.C. 1988); Davis v. United States, 367 A.2d 1254, 1261 (D.C. 1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 847 (1977).

[1] Cases construing Fed. R. Crim. Proc. 8 and 14 are persuasive authority because the rules are identical in all material respects to the Superior Court rules. Joyner v. United States, 540 A.2d 457, 459 n.1 (D.C. 1988). If D.C. Code charges are joined with U.S. Code charges in a District Court indictment, severance will result in the D.C. Code charges being tried in Superior Court. United States v. Jackson, 562 F.2d 789, 800 (D.C. Cir. 1977).

[2] Super. Ct. Juv. R. 8(b) allows joint trial of co-respondents upon request by Corporation Counsel.

In determining whether counts are properly joined, the court looks to the allegations in the indictment and the facts to be adduced at trial. Roper v. United States, 564 A.2d 726, 730 & n.7 (D.C. 1989) ("as in most cases, the indictment alleges only skeletal facts about the charged crimes"); see also (Ronald) West v. United States, 599 A.2d 788, 791 (D.C. 1991) (although ordinarily court determines misjoinder motion on basis of indictment alone, "it is not impermissible to consider other facts in determining the joinder issue") (quoting Winestock v. United States, 429 A.2d 519, 524 (D.C. 1981).

2014 Supplement

Medley v. United States*, Nos. 11-CF-1670, 11-CF-1671 & 12-CF-7, 2014 WL 7202060 (D.C. Dec. 18, 2014). Application of "separate and distinct" test may apply only to cases joined pursuant to Super. Ct. Crim. R. 8(a) and not R. 8(b).

A. "Same or Similar" Offenses – Single Defendant Cases Only

Under Rule 8(a), charges against a single defendant may be joined if they involve similar but unrelated crimes – that is, if they "allege the same general kinds of crimes." (Ronald) West, 599 A.2d at 791 (quoting Winestock, 429 A.2d at 524); Sweet v. United States, 756 A.2d 366, 374 (D.C. 2000). This principle was addressed in Roper, which found error in the joint trial of an armed robbery and an unrelated weapon possession charge. The courts "have largely relied on common-sense definitions of the term 'same or similar,'" and "permit[] the joinder of offenses under the 'same or similar' provision only where there is a substantial degree of similarity among the crimes charged." Roper, 564 A.2d at 729. Looking to the offenses' "gravamen," "basic natures" and elements, the court found them dissimilar. Id. at 729-30 (collecting cases).

In cases where defendants have been joined under Rule 8(b) but where only one defendant remains by the time of trial, the less restrictive standard of Rule 8(a) will be applied to the issue of joinder of charges. Loukas, 702 A.2d 681.

B. Connected-Offense Joinder – Single and Multiple Defendant Cases

Both Rules 8(a) and 8(b) permit joinder of transactionally related offenses – those committed in a single transaction or in connected transactions. The "single act or transaction" test is relatively simple. For example, charges of burglary and assault arising from a break-in are joinable, no matter how many defendants are involved. Furthermore, "[w]hen two or more persons are charged with jointly committing a criminal offense, a strong presumption arises that they will be tried together." Johnson v. United States, 596 A.2d 980, 987 (D.C. 1991), cert. denied by Bullock v. United States, 504 U.S. 927 (1992) (citing Tillman v. United States, 519 A.2d 166, 169 (D.C. 1986)).

Joinable Series: Whether acts or transactions are sufficiently connected to constitute a joinable "series," on the other hand, has been extensively litigated. A joinable series exists if: (1) each offense was "committed to achieve a specific common end," or directed toward some shared common goal; (2) one caused or "le[d] logically" to the other(s); or (3) all were "part of a common scheme and are so closely connected in time and place that necessarily proof of the two crimes overlaps substantially." Ray, 472 A.2d at 858; accord (Marvin) Taylor, 603 A.2d at 455; Settles, 522 A.2d at 352; Davis, 367 A.2d at 1261. Joinder may also be proper when the indictment alleges a conspiracy linking the offenses. Ray, 472 A.2d at 858 n.7; see Coleman v. United States, 619 A.2d 40, 46-47 (D.C. 1993) (charge of carrying dangerous weapon sufficiently connected to charges relating to four previous robberies involving said weapon because proof of robberies tended to prove purpose in carrying weapon).

Improper Joinder: The definitions of transactionally related offenses are not the same under 8(a) and 8(b). Transactional relationship under 8(a) "is interpreted more liberally in favor of initial joinder," and "focus[es] on whether there is a substantial overlap of proof relevant to the offenses." Id. Davis found improper joinder of two defendants and charges arising out of seven rapes. Davis and Warren were jointly charged with four rapes; Davis alone was charged with three other rapes, allegedly committed with an unidentified assailant. Davis, 367 A.2d at 1260. The counts charging Davis alone were misjoined with those also charging Warren because they were not part of the "same series of acts or transactions." Id. at 1263. The court reasoned that Warren was unfairly prejudiced because the jury almost inevitably would conclude that he was the unidentified accomplice in two of the rapes for which he was not charged. Id. at 1263-64; accord Jackson v. United States, 623 A.2d 571, 579-81 (D.C. 1993), cert. denied, 510 U.S. 1030 (1993) (joinder of three robberies improper where "common goal" of obtaining property from others too broad, and robberies occurred at different stores on different dates with different victims, despite overlap of proof); (Michael) Smith v. United States, 561 A.2d 468, 473 (D.C. 1989) (joinder of three robberies involving two co-defendants improper; common goal of "obtaining property from others" is too broad, "each offense was not a logical or necessary continuation of the other," and, although robberies occurred within one hour and several blocks of each other, no substantial overlap of proof); Byrd, 551 A.2d at 98-99 (joinder of two shootings on one night, involving same automobile, improper because neither depended for its success or furtherance on the other and no overlapping testimony by government witness); Morris, 548 A.2d at 1386 (impropriety of joinder of two armed robberies conceded by government on appeal); Settles, 522 A.2d at 352-54 (improper joinder of two rapes occurring ten days apart).

Proper Joinder: However, joinder has been upheld where the second offense, committed by only one of the defendants, was a "sequel" to the first. See Crutchfield v. United States, 779 A.2d 307, 321-22 (D.C. 2001) (obstruction of justice arising from murder in Maryland properly joined with triple murder case in District of Columbia because D.C. murders provided motivation for Maryland murder/obstruction of justice); Sams v. United States, 721 A.2d 945, 954 (D.C. 1998), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 1135 (2000) (joinder of obstruction of justice charge of codefendant Reid with Sams under charge was proper where indictment alleged that Sams and Reid both participated in attack on complainant and Reid subsequently attempted to keep his girlfriend from talking to police); (Marvin) Taylor, 603 A.2d at 456 (joinder of initial assault offenses with perjury at grand jury by co-defendant who failed to implicate defendant in grand jury testimony). Similarly, in Sweet v. United States, 756 A.2d 366 (D.C. 2000), co-defendants were charged with two separate homicides and related offenses. The first homicide concerned the killing of a correctional officer who was a government witness, while the other involved a single gunman in a known drug area. The court held that the "circumstances demonstrate that the offenses are connected together within the meaning of [Rule 8(a)] because of the overlapping of proof." Id. at 375. The court also found a "further connection in that the indictment alleges that Sweet's motive for shooting and killing [the second victim] was to prevent her from providing information to law enforcement authorities concerning the [correctional officer's] murder." Id.

Other cases upholding joinder of transactionally related charges include (Charles) Johnson v. United States, 671 A.2d 428, 436 (D.C. 1995) (joinder of attempted robbery counts with other charges proper as "common scheme or plan" due to the "exceptionally close temporal and spatial relationship of these offenses and the necessary overlap of proof among them"); Joyner, 540 A.2d at 459 (drug and gun charges, based on contraband seized at one time and place); Washington v. United States, 434 A.2d 394, 395 (D.C. 1980) (en banc) (Bail Reform Act violation with underlying charges), and Grant v. United States, 402 A.2d 405, 407 (D.C. 1979) (same).

2014 Supplement

Ball v. United States*, 26 A.3d 764 (D.C. 2011). Joinder appropriate because all crimes of two co-defendants logically related where crimes stemmed from single series of events beginning with one co-defendant's reckless driving which led to high-speed chase then armed bailout of second co-defendant and subsequent resisting of arrest while armed.

Fadero v. United States*, 59 A.3d 1239 (D.C. 2013). Offenses that occurred on separate dates nearly two weeks apart properly joined because of "substantial overlap" in evidence where vehicle description from both dates matched and photo array from second date allowed victim to confirm earlier identification of assailant, and where items found on defendant provided motive for earlier offenses.

Vines v. United States*, 70 A.3d 1170 (D.C. 2013) (amended). Charges arising from two logically distinct sets of events were sufficiently 'connected together' to justify joinder as there was substantial overlap of evidence between the two sets of charges.

Ward v. United States*, 55 A.3d 840 (D.C. 2012). Trial court did not err in joining trials where it reasonably found that an initial murder by one defendant had led directly to charged conspiracy between co-defendants to commit another murder, an attempted murder, and an assault.

C. Raising Claims of Misjoinder

A motion for relief from misjoinder is an attack on the charging document, and must be filed within the time limits set out in Superior Court Criminal Rule. 47-I. Super. Ct. Crim. R. 12(b)(2); cf. (Marvin) Taylor, 603 A.2d at 455. Misjoinder is an error of law, subject to de novo review on appeal. Ray, 472 A.2d at 857. The trial court must grant a timely motion for relief from misjoinder when defendants or charges are improperly joined. Ward v. United States, 289 F.2d 877, 878 (D.C. Cir. 1961).

Misjoinder may, however, be harmless. United States v. Lane, 474 U.S. 438, 449 (1986); Settles, 522 A.2d at 354. While misjoinder creates a presumption of prejudice, Morris, 548 A.2d at 1387 (citations omitted), it may be "harmless when it does not result in actual prejudice, which is to say only if it has no substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict" – i.e., when: (1) "substantially all of the evidence of one offense would be admissible in a separate trial of the other," or (2) "the evidence of guilt . . . is overwhelming." Byrd, 551 A.2d at 99 & n.8 (citations and quotation marks omitted); see Jackson, 623 A.2d at 582 (finding misjoinder harmless due to both mutual admissibility and overwhelming evidence of guilt). In the mutual admissibility context, discussed infra Section II.A.1, the government must prove the defendant's connection to each crime by clear and convincing evidence. Thus, misjoinder cannot be deemed harmless if the defendant is acquitted of one misjoined charge and convicted of another. Roper, 564 A.2d at 731-32.

Claims of Misjoinder:

Although it is generally more difficult to show misjoinder under Rule 8 than severance under Rule 14, if there is a colorable argument for misjoinder it should be raised in a pretrial motion so as to ensure that the issue is not deemed waived.

II. SEVERANCE UNDER RULE 14

Severance of offenses and defendants properly joined under Rule 8 is governed by Rule 14:

> If it appears that a defendant or the government is prejudiced by a joinder of offenses or of defendants in an indictment or information or by such joinder for trial together, the Court may order an election or separate trials of counts, grant a severance of defendants or provide whatever other relief justice requires. In ruling on a motion by a defendant for severance the Court may order the prosecutor to deliver to the Court for inspection in camera any statements or confessions made by the defendants which the government intends to introduce in evidence at the trial.

Under Superior Court Criminal Rule 14 the court may grant severance if it appears that a defendant or the government is prejudiced by joinder. Moore v. United States, 927 A.2d 1040, 1056 (D.C. 2007). There is a "strong presumption" when two or more defendants are charged with jointly committing a criminal offense that they will be tried together. King v. United States, 550 A.2d 348, 352 (D.C. 1988). However, severance must be granted if prejudice to the defendant "outweighs the judicial economy to be denied from a joint trial," Jones v. United States, 483 A.2d 1149, 1157 (D.C. 1984), cert. denied by Britt v. United States, 471 U.S. 1118 (1985). The decision to sever is discretionary, though, and will be reversed "only upon a showing of the 'most compelling prejudice.'" Void v. United States, 631 A.2d 374, 379 (D.C. 1993); accord Dancy v. United States, 745 A.2d 259, 266 (D.C. 2000); Feaster v. United States, 631 A.2d 400, 412 (D.C. 1993).

Because this weighing process is discretionary, appellate reversals for failure to sever tell the court when it must sever, not when it should. Moreover, prejudice to the defendant may outweigh the presumption favoring joinder. See, e.g., McFerguson v. United States, 870 A.2d
